Yet not only Princes, but Princeſſes alſo may find in this Book examples both to avoid and to imitate. Queen Jezabel is a diſmal one both of impiety and puniſhment. And Queen Eſther is a rare one of all the perfections, and of all the rewards which can render the virtue and felicity of a great and holy Princeſs admir'd.

If great Perſonages find ſo great Examples here to lead them to avoid Vice, and embrace Virtue, there is no perſon of any condition whatſoever but may profit likewiſe by ſo uſeful a Book. 'Tis of general benefit for all, ſo proper to imprint a reſpect of the Divine Majeſty, by the view of ſo many effects of his infinite Power, and of his adorable Providence, that his heart muſt be very hard that is not affected therewith.

And how can Chriſtians but be mov'd with ſuch a holy reſpect, ſince the ſame Hiſtory teaches us, that thoſe illuſtrious and ſo celebrated Conquerors, Cyrus, Darius and Alexander, though Idolaters, could not forbear having a Veneration for the Majeſty and the Ceremonies of that Temple which was but a Figure of the Chriſtian Church.

But if this Hiſtory be ſo excellent in it ſelf, it muſt be confeſs'd that no man was ſo fit to write it, as he that gave it both to his own Age and to Poſterity. For who could be better inform'd of the Cuſtoms and Manners of the Jews, than a Jew? Who could be better inſtructed of all the Ceremonies and Obſervations of the Law, than a Prieſt? Who could better relate the Events of ſo many Wars, than a great Captain? And who could better comprehend things, and make judicious Reflections upon them, than a man of great Quality, and a great States-man? Now all theſe qualifications concenter in Joſephus. He was a Jew by birth. He was not only a Prieſt, but of the firſt of the four and twenty races of the Prieſts, who held the chief rank amongſt thoſe of their Nation. He was deſcended from the Aſmonæan Kings. His great Exploits in War had made him admir'd even by the Romans. And the ſeveral great Employments, of which he ſo worthily acquitted himſelf, leave no room to doubt of his experience in Affairs.

Laſtly, His Life written by himſelf, join'd with his Hiſtory of the Jewiſh Wars, make him ſufficiently known. And as for his manner of writing, I think it needleſs to commend it, ſince this Work manifeſts it ſo excellent everywhere; particularly in the Nineteenth Book, where he relates the Actions and Death of the Emperor Caligula, which no Roman Author has done ſo accurately; I think I may ſay without fear, that there is not in Tacitus any Hiſtory which ſurpaſſes that eloquent and judicious Narration. I know ſome will wonder, that after having mention'd the greateſt Miracles, he diminiſhes the belief of them, by ſaying, That he leaves every man at liberty to have ſuch opinion thereof as he thinks fit. But in my judgment he does it onely on this account, That having compoſ'd this Hiſtory chiefly for the Greeks and Romans, as 'tis eaſie to gather, by his writing the ſame in Greek, and not in Hebrew, he fear'd their incredulity would render it ſuſpected to them, if he affirm'd poſitively the truth of things which ſeem'd to them impoſſible.

But whatever Reaſon induc'd him to uſe that Caution, I pretend not to defend him either in thoſe places, or any others, where he is not conformable to the Bible. This alone is the Divine Fountain of written Truths, which cannot be ſought elſewhere without hazard of Error; and one cannot excuſe himſelf from condemning whatever is found contrary thereunto. I do it with all my heart; and there is no perſon but ought to do it, in order to read this excellent Hiſtory with ſatisfaction, and without ſcruple.

Neither yet do I pretend to juſtifie this Author, in ſome places where he ſpeaks of the ſeveral ſorts of Government; nor as to ſome other particular ſentiments, which no body is oblig'd to follow. Nor do I engage my ſelf in any matter of Criticiſm, the conteſts whereof I leave to ſuch as are exercis'd in that ſort of ſtudy.

If in ſome places, as amongſt others, in the deſcription of the Tabernacle, and of the Table of Shew-bread, ſome difference be found between this Tranſlation and the Greek, the cauſe thereof is, that thoſe paſſages are ſo corrupted in the Greek Text, that all I could do, was to bring them into the condition wherein they are.

II. Of the Hiſtory of the Jewiſh War againſt the Romans, &c.

If the Hiſtory of the Jews, advances its Author into the rank of the beſt Hiſtorians, 'tis plain that in that of their War againſt the Romans, he has ſurpaſs'd himſelf. Several reaſons have concurr'd to render this Hiſtory a Maſter-piece; the greatneſs of the Subject; the ſentiments excited in his breaſt, by the ruine of his Countrey; and the ſhare he had in the moſt conſiderable Events of that bloody War. For what other Subjects can equal this great Siege, which manifeſted to all the Earth, that one City alone would have been the Rock of the Roman Glory, had not God, for puniſhment of its ſins, overthrown it by the ſtorms of his wrath? What ſentiments of Grief can be more lively, than thoſe of a Jew, and of a Prieſt, who ſaw ſubverted the Laws of his own Nation, whereof no other was ever ſo jealous, and that magnificent Temple, the object of his devotion and of his zeal, reduc'd to aſhes? And what greater intereſt can an Hiſtorian have in his Work, than to be oblig'd to bring into it the principal Actions of his own Life; and to labour for his own Glory, by an unflattering advancement of that of the Conquerors; and by acquitting himſelf at the ſame time of what he ow'd to the generoſity of thoſe two excellent Princes Veſpaſian and Titus, to whom the honour of having finiſh'd this great War was due.

But foraſmuch as there are ſo many remarkable Occurrences in this Hiſtory, I think to do the Readers a pleaſure, in preſenting them here with an Abſtract thereof, from which general Idea they may afterwards proceed to the particulars depending thereupon. It is divided into ſeven Books.

The firſt Book, and the ſecond, to the twenty eighth Chapter, are an abridgment of the Jewiſh Hiſtory, from Antiochus Epiphanes King of Syria (who ſpoiled the Temple, and went about to aboliſh Religion) to Florus, Governor of Judea, whoſe avarice and cruelty were the chief occaſion of that War which they maintain'd againſt the Romans. This abridgment is ſo delightful, that Joſephus ſeems to have deſign'd to ſhew that he could, like excellent Painters, repreſent the ſame objects in different manners, with ſo much art, that it ſhould be hard to know to which to give the preference. For whereas theſe Hiſtories are ſometimes interrupted by the Narration of things hapned at the ſame time, they are here written in a continu'd ſeries, and give the Readers the pleaſure to behold in one Table, what they ſaw before ſeparately in ſeveral. From the twenty eighth Chapter of the ſecond Book to the end, Joſephus relates what paſs'd in conſequence of the troubles rais'd by Florus, till the defeat of the Roman Army commanded by Ceſtius Gallus, Governor of Syria.

In the beginning of the third Book, Joſephus ſhews the conſternation of the Emperor Nero upon this ill ſucceſs of his Arms, which was likely to be follow'd with a revolt of all the Eaſt; and how caſting his eyes on all ſides, he found only Veſpaſian fit to bear the weight of ſo important a War, and accordingly gave him the conduct thereof. He relates afterwards in what manner this great Captain, accompany'd with Titus his ſon, enter'd into Galilee, whereof our Author himſelf was Governor, and beſieg'd him in Jotapat; where, after the greateſt reſiſtance imaginable, he was taken and led Priſoner to Veſpaſian: and how Titus took divers other places, and perform'd actions of incredible valor.

The fourth Book brings in Veſpaſian conquering the reſt of Galilee; the Jews beginning to tumultuate in Jeruſalem, the Factious, who took the name of Zealots, becoming Maſters of the Temple under the conduct of John of Giſcala, Ananus the High-Prieſt ſtirring up the people to beſiege them there; the Idumæans coming to their aſſiſtance, exerciſing horrible cruelties, and afterwards retiring; Veſpaſian taking ſundry places in Judea, blocking up Jeruſalem, in order to beſiege it; and forbearing that deſign, by reaſon of the troubles riſen in the Empire, before and after the death of the Emperors Nero, Golba and Otho; Simon, ſon of Gioras, another Head of the Factious, receiv'd by the people into Jeruſalem; Vitellius, who had ſeiz'd upon the Empire after Otho's death, rendring himſelf odious and contemptible for his cruelty and debauchery; the Army commanded by Veſpaſian, declaring him Emperor: And laſtly, Vitellius aſſaſſinated at Rome, after the defeat of his Forces, by Antonius Primus, who had embrac'd Veſpaſian's party.

The fifth Book relates how a third Faction, of which Eleazar was Head, was form'd in Jeruſalem; That afterwards thoſe three Factions were again reduc'd to two, and in what manner they made War one againſt another. It contains alſo the deſcription of Jeruſalem, of the Towers Hippicos, Phazael and Mariamne, of the Caſtle Antonia, of the Temple, of the High Prieſt, and of ſundry other remarkable things; the Siege of that great City form'd by Titus; the incredible Works, and prodigious Exploits of Valor done on both ſides; the grievous famine wherewith the City was afflicted, and the ſtrange Cruelties of the Factions.

The ſixth Book repreſents the horrid miſeries whereinto Jeruſalem was reduc'd; the continuation of the Siege with the ſame ardor as before; and how, after many Fights, Titus having forc'd the firſt and ſecond wall of the City, took and ruin'd the Caſtle of Antonia, and aſſaulted the Temple which was burnt, notwithſtanding all this Prince could do to prevent it; and how at laſt he became Maſter of all the reſt.

In the ſeventh and laſt of theſe Books, 'tis ſhew'd how Titus caus'd Jeruſalem to be deſtroy'd, ſaving only the Towers Hippicos, Phazael and Mariamne: In what manner he commended and rewarded his Army; what Spectacles he gave to the Nations of Syria; what horrible Perſecutions were exercis'd upon the Jews in ſeveral Cities; with what incredible joy the Emperor Veſpaſian, and Titus, who was declar'd Cæſar, were receiv'd into Rome; what a magnificent Triumph they made; how the Caſtles of Herodion, Macheron, and Maſſada, the only places remaining to the Jews in Judea, were taken; and how thoſe that defended this laſt, all kill'd themſelves with their Wives and Children.

This is in general what this Hiſtory of the Jewiſh War againſt the Romans contains. And there are no ornaments wherewith this great perſon has not enrich'd it. He has omitted no occaſion of embelliſhing it, by elegant deſcriptions of Provinces, Lakes, Rivers, Fountains, Mountains, ſeveral Rarities, and Buildings, whoſe magnificence would ſeem fabulous, if what he relates thereof could be call'd in doubt, when we ſee no perſon found that has dar'd to contradict him, though the excellence of his Hiſtory rais'd no ſmall envy againſt him.

It may be ſaid with truth, that wheth[illegible] he ſpeaks of the Romans Military Diſcipline, or whether he repreſents Battels, Tempeſts, Shipwracks, a Famine or a Triumph, every thing is ſo lively ſet forth, that he charms the attention of his Readers. And I fear not to add that no other, not excepting even Tacitus himſelf, has excell'd more in Orations; they are ſo noble, ſtrong and perſuaſive, alwayes reſtrain'd within their own ſubject, and proportion'd both to the perſons to ſpeak, and to thoſe that are ſpoken unto.

Moreover, can the judgment and faithfulneſs of this Hiſtorian be too much commended, for the moderation which he uſes between the praiſes deſerv'd by the Romans for finiſhing ſo great a War, and thoſe due to the Jews for having withſtood the ſame, although vanquiſh'd at laſt, with invincible courage? ſo that neither his gratitude for the obligations he had to Veſpaſian and Titus, nor his love for his Countrey, biaſs'd him contrary to juſtice more on the one ſide than the other.

But that which I account moſt eſtimable in him, is, that he never fails upon any occaſion to praiſe Virtue, to reprehend Vice, and to make excellent reflections upon the admirable Providence of God, and upon the fear which we ought to have of his dreadful judgments.

It may be boldly affirm'd, That never was ſeen a greater example thereof, than the ruine of that ungrateful Nation, of that proud City, and of that venerable Temple; ſince although the Romans were Maſters of the World, and that this Siege was the work of one of the greateſt Princes they glory to have had for Emperors, the power of this victorious people, and the heroical valor of Titus, would have in vain undertaken this deſign, if God had not choſen them to be the executioners of his Juſtice. The blood of his Son ſhed, the moſt horrid of all crimes, was the onely true cauſe of the ruine of that unhappy City. The heavy hand of God upon that wretched people, caus'd that how terrible ſoever the War was that aſſaulted them without, it was yet much more dreadful within, by the cruelty of thoſe unnatural Jews, who more like Devils than Men, deſtroy'd by the Sword and the Famine, of which they were the Authors, 1100000 perſons; and reduc'd the remainder to that paſs, that they could hope for no ſafety but from their Enemies, by caſting themſelves into the arms of the Romans. Such prodigious effects of vengeance for the death of a God, might paſs for incredible with thoſe who have not th[illegible]pineſs to be enlightned with the light of the Goſpel, if they were not related by a Man of tha[illegible]ry ſame Nation as conſiderable as Joſephus was, for his Birth, for his quality of Prieſt, and for [illegible] Virtue. And methinks 'tis viſible, that God minding to make uſe of his teſtimony to authoriz[illegible] ſuch important truths, preſerv'd him by a miracle, when after the taking of Joſaphat, of forty which were retir'd with him into a Cave, the lot being caſt ſo often to know who ſhould be ſlain firſt, he only and one other remain'd alive.

This ſhews that this Hiſtorian is to be conſider'd with a different reſpect from all others, ſince whereas they relate only humane Events although dependent on the orders of the Supreme Providence, it appears that God caſt his eye upon him to make him ſubſervient to the greateſt of his deſigns.

For we muſt not only conſider the deſtruction of the Jews as the moſt dreadful effect that ever was of Gods juſtice, and as the moſt diſmal image of the vengeance which he will exerciſe at the laſt day againſt the Reprobate; we muſt alſo behold it as one of the moſt illuſtrious proofs which it hath pleas'd him to give Men of the Divinity of his Son; inaſmuch as this prodigious Event had been foretold by our Saviour in preciſe and intelligible terms. He had ſaid to his Diſciples, ſhewing them the Temple of Jeruſalem, That all thoſe goodly buildings ſhould be ſo deſtroy'd, that there ſhould not be left one ſtone upon another, S. Matth. 24. ver. 2. S. Mark 13. ver. 2. S. Luke 19. v. 44. And alſo, That when they ſhould ſee Jeruſalem encompaſs'd with Armies, they ſhould know that its deſolation was at hand, S. Luke 21. ver. 20.

He had mention'd particularly the dreadful circumſtances of this deſolation. He had ſaid to them, Woe to thoſe that ſhall be with child or give ſuck in thoſe dayes; for there ſhall be great diſtreſs in the land, and wrath upon this people. And they ſhall fall by the edge of the ſword, and ſhall be led away captive into all Nations, and Jeruſalem ſhall be troden down by the Gentiles, S. Luke 21. ver. 23, 24.

And laſtly he had declar'd, that the accompliſhment of theſe Propheſies was ready to come to paſs; That the time was drawing nigh that their houſe ſhould be left unto them deſolate: and that even ſuch as were then living ſhould ſee it, Verily I ſay unto you, All theſe things ſhall come upon this generation, S. Matth. 23. ver. 38, & 36.

All

All theſe things had been foretold by our Saviour, and written by the Evangeliſts before the revolt of the Jews, and at a time when there was not yet the leaſt appearance of ſo ſtrange a Revolution.

Now inaſmuch as Prophecy is the greateſt of miracles, and the moſt powerful way whereby God Almighty authorizes his doctrine, this Prophecy of Jeſus Chriſt, to which no other is comparable, may be juſtly accounted the chief and moſt irrefragable evidence to mankind of his Divine Birth and Miſſion. For as no other Prophecy was ever more clear, ſo neither was any more punctually accompliſht. Jeruſalem was deſtroy'd to the ground by the firſt Army that beſieg'd it; there remain'd not the leaſt footſtep of that proud Temple, the wonder of the Univerſe, and the object of the Jews vanity; and the calamities which ruin'd them, anſwer'd preciſely to that dreadful Prediction of our Saviour.

But to the end ſo great an Event might ſerve as well for the inſtruction of thoſe that were to be born in afier-times, as for thoſe that were ſpectators of it, it was neceſſary, as I have ſaid, that the Hiſtory ſhould be written by an irreprochable Witneſs. To which purpoſe 'twas fit the Writer ſhould be a Jew, and not a Chriſtian, leſt he might be ſuſpected to have accommodated the Events to the Propheſies. 'Twas fit he ſhould be a perſon of quality, to the end he might be fully inform'd of all things. 'Twas fit he ſhould ſee with his own eyes the wonderful things which he was to relate, to the end he might be capable of credit. And laſtly 'twas fit he ſhould be a Man, whoſe eloquence and judgment might be ſutable to the greatneſs of ſuch a ſubject.

All which qualifications, ſo neceſſary to render this Hiſtory compleat in all points, meet ſo perfectly in Joſephus, that 'tis evident God Almighty choſe him expreſly to perſuade all reaſonable perſons of the truth of this marvellous occurrence.

'Tis certain, that having contributed in this manner to the confirmation of the Goſpel, it appears not that he made any benefit thereof for himſelf, or that he had any ſhare in the bleſſings ſo plentifully poured down in his time upon all the earth. But if there be reaſon to commiſerate his unhappineſs in this point, there is ſome alſo to bleſs the Providence of God, who has made his blindneſs ſerve to our advantage; ſince the things he writes concerning his own Nation, are, in reſpect of the incredulous, incomparably of more force for confirmation of the Chriſtian Religion, than if he had embrac'd Chriſtianity: ſo that we may apply to him in particular what the Apoſtle ſaith of all the Jews.

III. Joſephus's Anſwer to Appion.

The next of the Works of Joſephus, beſides his Life written by himſelf, is an Anſwer in two Books to what Appion and ſome others had written againſt his Hiſtory of the Jews, againſt the Antiquity of their Race, againſt the Purity of their Laws, and againſt the Conduct of Moſes. Nothing can be more ſolid than this Anſwer, wherein Joſephus proves invincibly the Antiquity of his Nation by the Egyptian, Chaldean, Phenician, and even by the Greek Hiſtorians themſelves. He ſhews that all which Appion and thoſe other Authors have alledg'd to the diſadvantage of the Jews, are ridiculous Fables, as well as the plurality of their Gods; and he excellently ſets forth the greatneſs of the actions of Moſes, and the ſanctity of the Laws which God gave the Jews by his intervention.

IV. The Martyrdom of the Maccabees.

The Martyrdom of the Maccabees follows next. 'Tis a piece which Eraſmus, ſo famous among the Learned, calls a Maſterpiece of Eloquence: and I confeſs I underſtand not why having with reaſon ſo advantagious an opinion of it, he paraphras'd it, and not tranſlated it. Never was Copy more different from its Original. 'Tis hardly any of its principal Lineaments; and, if I miſtake not, nothing can more advance the reputation of Joſephus, than to ſee that ſo able a Man intending to embelliſh his Work, has, on the contrary, ſo much diminiſht the beauty of it, and thereby ſhew'd how much Joſephus is to be eſteem'd for writing, not after the manner of moſt of the Greeks in a long-winded ſtyle, but cloſely and compendiouſly, as affecting to ſay nothing but what is neceſſary. And I cannot ſufficiently wonder, that no perſon hitherto has made a Tranſlation of it from the Greek either into Latin or French, at leaſt to my knowledge. For Genebrard, inſtead of Tranſlating Joſephus, has only Tranſlated Eraſmus. For my part I have faithfully adhered to the original Greek, without following that Paraphraſe of Eraſmus any where, which invents names that are neither in Joſephus, nor the Bible, for the mother of the Maccabees. It ſhould ſeem Joſephus did not write this famous Martyrdom authoriz'd by the Holy Scripture, but to prove the truth of a diſcourſe which he makes in the beginning, to ſhew that Reaſon is the Miſtreſs of Paſſions; and he attributes to it a power over them, which there would be reaſon to wonder at, if it were ſtrange that a Jew ſhould be ignorant that this power belongs only to the grace of Jeſus Chriſt. He is contented to declare that he means only a Reaſon accompany'd with juſtice and piety.

V. The

V. The Embaſſy of Philo to C. Caligula the Roman Emperor.

This is a brief account of all the Works of Joſephus. Now becauſe Philo, although a Jew as well as he, writ alſo in Greek upon part of the ſame Subjects, but handles the ſame rather as a Philoſopher, than an Hiſtorian; and becauſe none amongſt all his Writings is ſo eſteem'd as that of his Embaſſage to the Emperor C. Caligula, of whom Joſephus ſpeaks particularly in the 10th Chapter of the 18th Book of the Jewiſh Antiquities, I conceiv'd that this Piece having ſo great affinity therewith, it would not be amiſs to ſhew by a Tranſlation of it, the different manner of writing of theſe two great Perſons. That of Joſephus is undoubtedly more compendious, and has nothing of the Aſiatic ſtyle; ſo that he expreſſes that in few words, which Philo doth ſometimes in as many lines. The Hiſtory of that Emperor may be made up from the Writings of theſe two famous Authors, inaſmuch as Philo relates as particularly and eloquently the Actions of his Life, as Joſephus has written nobly and excellently the paſſages of his Death. Both the one and the other were ſo extraordinary, that 'tis an advantage there remains ſuch Images thereof to Poſterity, to animate good Princes to merit by their Virtue as great affection for their Memory, as People have horror for thoſe who have ſhew'd themſelves unworthy of the rank which they held in the World.

It remains only to add, That as this Volume comprehends all the ancient holy Hiſtory, ſo the Readers are deſir'd to peruſe it not only for Divertiſement or Curioſity, but alſo with an aim to profit by the uſeful Conſiderations for which it affords ſo much matter. And that whereas the old Tranſlation of Doctor Lodge was, not undeſervedly, complain'd of on many accounts; much pains hath been taken in this Edition to amend it, as the Reader will eaſily find by comparing it with the former. If it be not ſo complete as could be wiſh'd, the Reader is deſir'd to accept candidly what has been done for his ſatisfaction; and to conſider, that though an old repair'd Building can hardly have all the beauty, yet it may have all the conveniency of a new Fabrick.

The Jews have two ſorts of years; the Civil, which begins in September; and the Sacred or Eccleſiaſtick, which begins in March.

They have twelve Months or Moons; and every third Year hath a thirteenth Month of 22 dayes; and the fourth hath a thirteenth Month of 23.

Before the Captivity of Babylon, they accounted the Months ſucceſſively by 1, 2, 3, &c. ſince their Return, they have named them rather after the manner of the Chaldees, than the Hebrews.

An Explication of the Coins and Measures mention'd in this Hiſtory.

S*Ath* was a meaſure containing about ſome ſeven quarts Engliſh.

The Epha contained three Saths.

The Core or Homer contained ten Epha's, that is to ſay, thirty Saths, and was the ſame meaſure both in dry and liquid things.

The Log contained a French meaſure.

The Hin contained twelve Logs.

The Bath contained as much as the Epha.

The Cad, was a kind of Pitcher, containing ſuch a quantity as a young Maid might well carry.

The common Sicle contained the weight of four ounces, whether it were of gold, ſilver, or any other metal.

The ſacred or holy Sicle weighed half an ounce of any metal whatſoever.

The common Sicle of ſilver was valued at about a ſhilling of our money.

The holy Sicle of ſilver was valued at about two ſhillings.

The common Drachm was the eighth part of an ounce.

The ſacred Drachm was the fourth part of an ounce.

The Pound weighed twelve ounces.

The ordinary Talent contained fifty four pounds eight ounces and a quarter of Troy weight in any metal: yet it was not minted money, but a maſs made up after the manner of an Ingot.

The ſacred Talent contained one hundred pounds.

Furthermore Note, That when Joſephus mentions the Olympiads, without any ſpecification of the years therein contained, he ordinarily means the ſpace of four years compleat.

The Stadium, Stade or Furlong, according to the Greeks account, (which I ſuppoſe Joſephus moſt reſpected in this Hiſtory) either of 600 Foot as the Olympique, that is of 120 paces; or as the Pyrrhique, which contained 1000 Foot, that is 200 paces.

The Life of FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS,

The Son of Matthias, Written by himſelf.

B Foraſmuch as I derive my Original, by a long ſeries of Anceſtors, from the Sacerdotal Race, I may, with ſome reaſon, value my ſelf upon the Nobleneſs of my Birth; ſince, as every Nation places the Grandeur of a Family in ſome certain marks of Honour that accompany it, ſo amongſt us 'tis one of the moſt ſignal to have the adminiſtration of Holy things. But I am not onely deſcended of the ſtock of the Prieſts; I am alſo of the Firſt of the Four and twenty Families of which it conſiſts, and whoſe Dignity is eminent above the reſt. To which I may add, That, by my Mothers ſide, I reckon Kings amongſt my Anceſtors. For the Branch of the Aſmoneans, from whom ſhe deſcended, for a C long time exerciſed both the High Prieſthood and Princely Power among our Nation. In this manner ſtands the order of the laſt of my Predeceſſors. My great Grandfathers Grandfather Simon, ſirnamed Pſellus, the ſtutterer, lived at ſuch time as Hircanus was High Prieſt, the firſt of that Name, and the Son of Simon the High Prieſt. This Simon Pſellus had Nine Sons: the one of which was Matthias, ſirnamed Aphlias. This Matthias took to Wife the Daughter of the High Prieſt Jonathan, by whom he had one Son, who was Matthias, ſirnamed Curtus, who was born in the firſt year of Hircanus's Prieſthood. Matthias begat Joſeph in the Ninth year of Alexander's Government; and of Joſeph came Matthias in the Tenth year of the Reign of Archelaus; and Matthias begat me in the Firſt year of the Empire of Caius Cæſar. I likewiſe have D Three Sons, mine eldeſt is Hircanus, who was born in the Fourth; my next Juſtus, who was born in the Seventh; and Agrippa my laſt, who was born in the Ninth year of Veſpaſian's Empire. This Genealogy of mine do I in this manner propoſe, according as I have found it written in the Publick Regiſters, to the end to confound the Calumnies of my Enemies.

Joſephus Lineage.

Joſeph the Son of Matthias was born in the firſt year of Caius Cæſars Empire, and the 4001 year of the world, and the 39 after Chriſts birth.

My Father Matthias was conſiderable for his Extraction, but more for his Juſtice and Authority in Jeruſalem, which is the Metropolis of our Countrey. My bringing up, during my tender years, was with Matthias, who was my Brother by the ſame Father and Mother; with whom I happily profited in all kind of Science, having a good Memory, and a quick Apprehenſion: ſo that, being yet a Child of Fourteen years of E Age, I was praiſed by all Men in regard of the good Affection I had to Learning; and the Prieſts and Nobleſt Citizens vouchſaf'd to ask my Opinion of things that concerned our Laws and Ordinances. About the Age of Sixteen years, my deſire was to have a ſearch and inſight into the Sects of our Nation, which are Three: The firſt of the Phariſees, which is the chiefeſt: The ſecond of the Sadduces: And the third of the Eſſeans. And this I did, to the end I might chooſe the better of the Three, when I underſtood them all. For which cauſe, with great Auſterities and Labours, I paſſed thorow them all: and not content with this Experience, after I had heard that a certain man called Banus lived in the Deſart, clothing himſelf with that which the Trees brought forth, and feeding on no other kind of meat, but what they freely yielded, F and waſhing himſelf oftentimes by day and night in cold water to keep himſelf chaſte, I began to imitate his courſe of Life: and after I had lived with him for the ſpace of Three years, and ſatisfied my deſires, I returned to the City at the Age of Nineteen years.

Joſeph from his infancy very ſtudious, and addicted to learning.

At this time I began to engage my ſelf in the exerciſe of a civil Life, following the Sect of the Phariſees, which very neerly reſembleth that Sect among the Grecians, who are called Stoicks. After I was Six and twenty years old, it was my fortune to repair to Rome upon this occaſion. Whilſt Fælix governed Judea, certain Prieſts, my familiars, men of much honour, and more virtue, were, upon ſome ſlight occaſion, bound and ſent to Rome by his commandment, to anſwer to what ſhould be objected againſt G them in Cæſar's preſence. Whereupon being deſirous to do them ſervice, and having ſpecial intelligence, that the Torments wherewith they were Martyred, leſſened not their Piety, but that they lived contentedly on Figs and Nuts: for this cauſe I departed for Rome, and was encountred with many great and grievous hazards by Sea. For the H ſhip, wherein I ſailed, was wrackt in the midſt of the Adriatick Sea, and about Six hundred of us were forc't to ſwim all Night long, and at Day-break, by God's Providence, a Cyrenian ſhip came in ſight, and both I and certain others, to the number of Fourſcore, out-ſwimming the reſt, were taken up into it, and ſaved. After I had in this ſort eſcaped, I came to Dicæarchia, which the Italians call at this day Puteoli, and grew acquainted with Aliturus a Jew born, who was a Comedian, and in good reputation with Nero; by whoſe means inſinuating my ſelf into the Empereſs Poppea's knowledge, I determined to beſeech her to procure the liberty of thoſe Prieſts with all expedition, which ſhe accordingly did; and being gratified likewiſe by her with many great gifts, I returned into my Countrey. There I found the Commonwealth I much diſquieted with Factions and Troubles, and divers too prone and ready to Rebel, and withdraw their Allegiance from the Romans. I inforced my ſelf to repreſs the ſeditious, and exhorted them to change their opinions, repreſenting, before their eyes, the quality of thoſe, againſt whom they enterprized War, with whom they could neither compare in experience of War, nor in good Fortune: For this cauſe I adviſed them, not to hazard the overthrow of themſelves, their Children, and their Countrey, by their raſhneſs and rage. To this effect I ſpake to them, and inſtantly intreated them to deſiſt from their unhappy reſolution, for that I foreſaw that the end of this War would prove to our utter Ruine, but I prevailed nothing with them. The fury of deſperate and diſſolute men prevailed above reaſon: for which cauſe fearing leſt by K continual inforcing of one thing, I ſhould grow into hatred and ſuſpition amongſt them, as if I favoured their enemies, and they ſhould put me to death; ſeeing that the Fort of Antonia was already ſeized upon by the ſeditious, I retired my ſelf into the Sanctuary. From whence, after Manahem, and the chiefeſt Revolters were put to death, I came out again, and join'd my ſelf with the Prieſts, and chiefeſt Phariſees; whom I found ſurprized with great fear, when they ſaw the People in Arms, and uncertain what to do, wanting the means to pacifie theſe mutinies. But apparently perceiving the danger, both I and the Phariſees feign'd our ſelves of their mind, and counſelled them to contain themſelves in peace, and let the Roman Forces depart, in hope, that Geſſius would, with all expedition, draw out great Forces, and chaſtiſe theſe L Peace-breakers. But as ſoon as he arrived, and fought with them, he was overcome, and a great number of his men ſlain; whereupon follow'd the utter ruine of our whole Nation. For ſuch as deſired the War, were puffed up with that Victory, and conceived aſſured hope that in the end they ſhould overcome the Romans. Beſides, this enſuing occaſion preſented it ſelf: The Inhabitants of the Cities that border upon Syria, laid hands on thoſe Jews that dwelt among them, and ſlew them, with their Wives and Children, without any juſt cauſe or crime committed by them. For they had not conſpired any ways, or intended to revolt from the Romans, or to uſe any Hoſtility, or any ſecret Conſpiracy againſt any of thoſe, with whom they were converſant.

But amongſt all the reſt, the Citizens of Scythopolis, exceeded all other in M impiety and wickedneſs. For being beſieged by certain of the Jews, they inforced thoſe Jews that inhabited amongſt them to take Arms, and fight againſt thoſe of their own Nation (which is expreſly prohibited by our Laws) and having overcome, by their aſſiſtance, they, by a deteſtable perfidiouſneſs, forgot the obligation they had, the faith which they had engag'd to them, and ſlew every one of them, to the number of many Thouſands. The like miſfortune alſo fell upon thoſe Jews that inhabited Damaſcus. But of this we have more amply ſpoken in thoſe our Books, which we have written of the Wars of the Jews: and at this preſent I make mention hereof, onely to ſignifie to the Reader, that our Nation became engaged in War with the Romans, not out of voluntary intent and purpoſe, but in great part by neceſſity and conſtraint. N

The Jews conſtrained by neceſſity to make War.

After that Geſſius was overcome (as is before declared) the chiefeſt men of Jeruſalem perceiving that the Seditious were ſtrongly armed and provided, they began to fear leſt if they ſhould be found diſarmed, they ſhould ſuddenly be overthrown by their enemies (as in effect it fell out afterwards) and hearing that all Galilee was not as yet wholly revolted from the Romans; but that a part thereof as yet remained in peace, they ſent me with two other Prieſts, Joazar and Judas, who were both virtuous and honourable men, to perſuade the mutinous to lay down their Arms, and to let them know that it was more advantagious for the Nation, that ſuch Men as were in Authority and Reputation, ſhould have the keeping thereof. The reſolution that was taken O by them was, that they had them always ready upon all occaſions, but that they expected until they were certified, what the Romans intended to do.

With

A With this Commiſſion, and the like Inſtructions, I repaired into Galilee: where I found the Sephorites were ready to come to a Battel with the Galileans, for that theſe latter had threatned to ravage their Countrey, in regard of their league of friendſhip with the Romans, contracted and ratified by Senius Gallus, Governor of Syria. But I delivered them from that fear, and appeaſed the Common people, by permiting them to ſend at all times when they pleaſed, their Hoſtages to Geſſius, who lay at Dora a City of Phœnicia. I found likewiſe that the Inhabitants of Tiberias were already in Arms upon this occaſion: There were in that City three different Factions, the one of the Nobility, whoſe Chief was Julius Capella, to whom were joined Herod the Son of Miarus, Herod the Son of Gamal, and Compſus the Son of Compſus. For Criſpus the Brother of Compſus, who in times paſt had been made B Governor of the City for Agrippa, ſirnamed the Great, was in his own poſſeſſions on the other ſide of Jordan. All theſe, I ſay, were of opinion to remain under the Romans authority, and to obey their King. But Piſtus alone of the Nobility, would no ways accord to this advice, by the perſuaſion of his Son Juſtus. The ſecond Faction was of the common ſort, who concluded upon War. Juſtus, Son of Piſtus, who was the Ringleader of the third Faction, carried himſelf very doubtfully touching the War; yet notwithſtanding he ſecretly thirſted after Innovation, hoping that by a change he ſhould encreaſe his power. “Preſenting himſelf therefore in the midſt of the multitude, he endeavored to perſuade them that their City was always one of the chief of Galilee; and that during the days of Herod the Tetrarch, who founded the ſame, it was the C chiefeſt City, whoſe pleaſure it was that the City of Sephoris ſhould yield obedience to that of Tiberias. That they had not loſt that preheminence in the time of King Agrippa the Father, but had continued the ſame, till Fælix obtained the Government of Judæa. But for the preſent ſince they had been given by Nero to the younger Agrippa, they had fallen from and loſt their Superiority. For the City of Sephoris obtained the Soveraignty of Galilee, after that ſhe acknowledged the Roman Government, which had removed the Treaſure of the Charters and the Receipts of the Kings Money. By theſe words, and others of like nature againſt King Agrippa, he incited the People to Rebellion, ſignifying to them, “That an opportunity invited them to take Arms, to the end that being aſſociated with the Galileans, they might recover the advantages which D they had loſt unjuſtly. To which purpoſe, all the Province would willingly join with them, through the hatred they bare the Sephorites, on whom they would revenge themſelves with great power, becauſe they continued in their Allegiance, which they promiſed to the Romans.

The Oration of Juſtus, Piſtus's Son, to the multitude.

Juſtus incites the people to Rebellion.

By theſe words he won the Peoples hearts to him: for he was a Man very eloquent, and by his ſubtilty and politick diſcourſe, eaſily overthrew all that which his Adverſaries produced againſt him. He was alſo skilful enough in the Greek Language, to attempt the writing of the Hiſtory of thoſe Tranſactions, to the end to diſguiſe the truth thereof. But in the proceſs of this diſcourſe, I will ſhew more particularly what his ill deſigns were, and how by his and his Brothers means, he wanted little of utterly over- E throwing his Countrey. When therefore this Juſtus had perſuaded the Citizens of Tiberias to take Arms, and had conſtrained divers Men likewiſe, who were of the contrary opinion, to do the like, he iſſued out with them, and burnt the Villages of the Gadarenians and Hippenians, that are ſcituate in the Confines of Tiberias and Scythopolis. In this eſtate was Tiberias: And as for Giſchala, their Affairs were brought to this paſs; John the Son of Levi ſeeing ſome of the Citizens reſolv'd upon a Revolt from the Romans, laboured to reſtrain them, and required them to continue in their Allegiance: but notwithſtanding all his perſuaſion and diligence, he could not contain them. For the Nations round about them, as the Gadarenians, Gabarenians and Tyrians, aſſembled a great Army, and with the ſame aſſailed Giſchala, and took it by force: and after they had con- F ſumed by fire and utterly deſtroyed the ſame, they returned home. John being much diſpleaſed with this act, armed all thoſe that were with him, and ſet upon the above-named Nations; and having obtained the Victory, he Re-edified Giſchala in better ſort than it was before, incloſing it with a Wall, to the intent it might be the better fortified againſt future Invaſions.

Juſtus the offspring of War.

Giſchala burned and ſpoiled.

But thoſe of Gamala perſevered in their faith towards the Romans, as I ſhall now declare. Philip the Son of Jacim, who governed under King Agrippa, eſcaping beyond all opinion, from the Royal Palace of Jeruſalem at ſuch a time as it was beſieged, fell into another great danger, to wit, to be ſlain by Manahim, and thoſe Seditious that were with him: but certain Babylonians his Kinſmen being at that time in Jeruſalem, hindered the G Revolters from executing their purpoſe at that time. When therefore Philip had lay hid there for the ſpace of four days, on the fifth he fled away diſguiſed in a falſe hair, for fear he ſhould be diſcovered. And as ſoon as he arrived in a Village, which was of his own poſſeſſion, ſcituate near Gamala, he ſent for certain of his Subjects to repair unto H him. But God, for Philip's greater good, croſſed the ſcope of his intent, which otherwiſe had been the ruine of many: for being ſurprized by a ſudden Fever, he committed certain Letters of his written to Agrippa and Bernice, who were yet but young, to one of his Freed-men, commanding him to deliver them to Varus, who was put in truſt, by the King and Queen, to adminiſter the affairs of that Kingdom, whilſt they were gone to Beryth to meet with Geſſius. Varus receiving Philip's Letters, and underſtanding that he was eſcap't, was ſorry for it, becauſe he thought the King and Queen would have leſs uſe of him after Philip was arrived. He therefore made the people believe that this Freed-man was a Traytor, and brought them forg'd Letters, it being certain that Philip was in Jeruſalem with the Jews, who were revolted againſt the Romans: and ſo he commanded him to be ex- I ecuted. Philip being ignorant of the cauſe why his Freed-man did not return, ſent another with Letters, to the intent he might diſcover what was become of his firſt Meſſenger, and for what cauſe he ſtayed ſo long. But Varus accuſing his ſecond Meſſenger alſo after the ſame manner, commanded him to be executed, as he had done the firſt. The Syrians that inhabit Cæſarea, had puffed him up, by telling him that Agrippa ſhould be put to death by the Romans, for the Rebellion of the Jews, and that he who was Royally deſcended, ſhould poſſeſs his Government. And indeed Varus was of the Blood-Royal, deriving his Pedigree from Sohemus King of Libanus. For theſe cauſes, he retained Philip's Letters, hoping by theſe means that the King ſhould have no knowledge thereof; and he ſet watch in every paſſage, for fear leſt any man ſhould flie, and certifie the King of what had hap- K ned; and to give the Syrians the better content who dwelt in Cæſarea, he put divers of thoſe Jews that dwelt among them to death. He intended alſo to undertake a War againſt the Jews of Bathanæa, who were called Babylonian Jews, by confederating himſelf with the Trachonites of Barthanæa. For which cauſe, ſending for twelve of the Jews of moſt eſtimation amongſt the Inhabitants of Cæſarea, he enjoined them to repair to Ecbatane, and ſignifie to thoſe of their Nation there, that Varus underſtanding that they pretended to take Arms againſt their King, and ſcarcely believing it, had ſent them thither, to perſuade them to lay down their Arms. And that this ſhould be a certain proof, by which they might perfectly clear their innocence, that ſeventy of the chiefeſt of them ſhould be ſent to him. Theſe twelve arriving in Ecbatane, and being entertained by thoſe of their L Nation, found that they neither imagined nor intended any commotion: for which cauſe, they perſuaded them to ſend their ſeventy men; which they did, little ſuſpecting what would happen.

Varus killeth the ſeventy Jews with the Ambaſſadors. The Jews retire themſelves into the Fortreſs of Gamala, and thither reſorteth Philip alſo.

Gamala ſtill faithful to the Romans.

As ſoon therefore as theſe, with the other twelve Ambaſſadors, came to Cæſarea, Varus having notice of their coming, met them on the way with the Kings Forces, and ſlew them, together with the aforeſaid Ambaſſadors, and took his way towards the Jews of Ecbatane. But one of the ſeventy who had eſcaped, reſorted thither with all expedition, preventing Varus, and certified the reſt what had hapned. Whereupon, they incontinently fell to Arms, and with their Wives and Children retired themſelves to the Fort of Gamala, abandoning their Villages, with all their Goods, and great numbers of M Cattel. When Philip had tidings hereof, he repaired alſo to the Fort of Gamala. The people rejoycing at his coming, exhorted him to take the Soveraignty, and to make War againſt Varus, and the Syrians of Cæſarea. For they had intelligence that the King was ſlain. But Philip, to moderate their impetuoſity, recounted to them what benefits the King had beſtowed on them, and of what power the Romans were, againſt whom it was but a folly for them to take Arms; and in the end, he perſuaded them to Peace. In the mean time, the King underſtanding that Varus was determined to kill all the Jews that were in Cæſarea, with their Wives and Children, all in one day, he ſent Equus Modius to ſucceed him, as it hath been, by us, declared in another place. And Philip kept the Fort of Gamala, and the Countrey thereabouts, in their fidelity and loyalty to the Romans. N As ſoon as I arrived in Galilee, and learned all occurrences that had hapned, by thoſe who reported the ſame to me, I preſently ſignified the whole matter by Letters, to the Council at Jeruſalem, deſiring to know what their pleaſure was I ſhould do. They gave me this anſwer, that I ſhould remain where I was, and retain my Collegues that I had with me, if they thought good to take charge of Galilee. But they, after they had gather'd great Sums of Money for the Tenths and Tithes that were due to them, reſolved with themſelves to return to their own houſes. But for that I entreated them to remain with me, till ſuch time as we had ſetled affairs, they willingly conſented unto me. I therefore departed with them to the City of Sephoris, and came into a Borough called Bethmaus, diſtant from Tiberias ſome four Furlongs, and from thence I ſent a Meſ- O ſenger to the Council of Tiberias, deſiring the chiefeſt among the people, to come and ſpeak with me: They came, accompanied with Juſtus; I told them, that I was ſent Ambaſſador

A baſſador to them, with my Collegues, by the Commonalty of Jeruſalem, to perſuade them to deface that Palace that was erected by Herod the Tetrach, wherein divers figures of living Creatures were painted; for that our Law forbad ſuch things; and I exhorted them to ſuffer us to ſet about that execution as ſoon as poſſible.

Capella, and thoſe of his party, did for a long time refuſe to conſent thereunto: but in the end, we preſs'd them ſo much, that they condeſcended. Now whilſt we debated this matter, Jeſus the Son of Saphias (of whom we have ſpoken heretofore, declaring how he was the Chief of the Faction of Sailers and poor men) took with him certain Galileans, and ſet fire on the Palace, in hope to get great Riches thereby (for that there B were certain Roofs of the Houſe covered with Gold) and they pillag'd many things againſt our conſent. After we had thus conferred with Capella, and the chiefeſt Tiberians, we retired from Bethmaus into the higher Galilee. In the mean time, Jeſus's Men ſlew all the Greeks that remained there, and all who before the War had been their Enemies. Which when I was certified of, I was much diſpleaſed, and went down to Tiberias, to ſecure the King's Moveables, for fear they ſhould be carried away by the Robbers; and having recovered divers Candleſticks of Corinthian work, rich Tables, and no ſmall quantity of maſſive Silver, I reſolved with my ſelf to reſerve it to the King's uſe. Calling therefore ten of the chiefeſt Senators, and Capella, Son of Antillus, to me, I delivered the Veſſels into their hands, charging them to deliver the ſame to no Man C but my ſelf.

The Palace ſet on fire that was in Tiberias.

Joſeph procureth the ſafety of the King's goods.

From thence, with mine Aſſociates, I went to John at Giſchala, to know what his mind and reſolution was, and I preſently diſcover'd, that he affected Innovation and Tyranny. For he deſir'd me to grant him liberty to Tranſport Cæſar's Wheat that was ſtored up in the Villages of higher Galilee, telling me, that he would beſtow the price of the ſame, in re-edifying and repairing the Walls of his City. But I perceiving his drift, denied him that liberty. For I thought that that Wheat would either ſerve the Romans, or the Province, the care of which was committed to my hands by the City of Jeruſalem. When therefore he could get nothing at my hands, he addreſſed to my Companions, of whom not foreſeeing thoſe Troubles that were likely to come, and greedy of D Rewards, he obtained a liberty to diſpoſe of all the Corn that was in the Province, in that I my ſelf was unable to contradict them both. After this John uſed another ſubtlety: for he ſaid that thoſe Jews, who inhabited Cæſarea Philippi, being by the Command of their King, reſtrain'd within their Walls, and wanting Virgin oyl, deſired to buy the ſame of him, for fear leſt contrary to their Cuſtom, they ſhould be compelled to uſe that of the Greeks. This he ſaid, not out of reſpect to Religion, or Devotion, but for his filthy lucres ſake. For knowing that among the Cæſareans, two ſextaries were ſold for a drachm, and that at Giſchala eighty ſextaries were ſold for four drachms, he ſent all the oyl that was in that Town to them, pretending my permiſſion. I dar'd not withſtand the ſame, leſt the People ſhould ſtone me to death. By this craft, John ga- E thered a great Sum of Money.

John's acts in Giſchala, and his covetouſneſs.

From this place, I diſmiſſed my Companions back to Jeruſalem, employing my ſelf wholly afterwards in preparing Arms, and fortifying Cities. In the mean time, calling the ſtouteſt Libertines before me, and having in vain exhorted them to quit their Arms, I perſuaded the People to pay them Contribution, which was more advantagious for them, than to ſuffer their Countrey to be ſpoiled by their Excurſions. And thus having taken their Oaths, I diſmiſs'd them, on condition that they ſhould not come into our Region, except they were called, or wanted their due pay, nor ſpoil either the Lands of the Romans, or the Inhabitants of the Countrey. But above all things, my care was to keep Galilee in peace. To which purpoſe, I got ſeventy pledges of their F Loyalty, choſen out amongſt their Nobility under pretext of friendſhip. I made them my Companions and Fellow-Judges, and decreed many things according to their opinions, having eſpecial care, leſt through raſhneſs I ſhould injure Juſtice, or for Rewards ſtain mine incorrupted Honour. I was now Thirty years old; and though a man who bridles himſelf from unlawful affections, can hardly eſcape the poyſoned ſting of detraction, eſpecially if great authority be annexed to his green years; yet none ever durſt ſay, that I ſuffer'd Violence to be done to any Woman, or receiv'd a Bribe from any Man; yea, I refuſed thoſe Tenths, which in right of Prieſthood I might have receiv'd. Yet after the Conqueſt of the Syrians, I took part of the ſpoil, which, I freely confeſs, I ſent to Jeruſalem to my Kinſmen. And though at two times I forcibly over- G came the Sephorites, the Tiberians four times, and the Gadarenians once, and had brought John under my ſubjection, who had oftentimes ſought to entrap me; yet could I not endure to revenge my ſelf on him, or any of the abovenamed People, as in the ſequel H of this ſtory I will make manifeſt.

For which cauſe I ſuppoſe, that God, who is the Tryer, and Searcher of all hearts; both delivered me at this time out of the hands of mine Enemies, and afterwards many times from ſeveral dangers and misfortunes, as hereafter ſhall appear. But ſo great was the fidelity and benevolence of the common People of Galilee towards me, that their Cities being overthrown, and their Families led into Captivity, they were leſs toucht with their own Calamities, than concern'd for my preſervation. Which when John perceived, he began to envy me. And he writ to me, that I would give him licence, for his health-ſake, to bathe himſelf in the hot bathes of Tiberias: I ſuſpecting no Treaſon, willingly granted him that which he demanded. Moreover, I wrote to thoſe, I to whom I had committed the truſt and adminiſtration of the City, to prepare him a Lodging, and to furniſh him, and all his Followers, with things neceſſary for Diet and Entertainment. In the mean ſpace, I paſt my time in a certain Village of Galilee, called Cana. But after that John came to Tiberias, he perſuaded the Townſmen to forget their faith and duty to me, and revolt unto him; many of them lent a willing ear to his Entreaties, eſpecially ſuch as were prone to change, and deſirous of diſſention; and in particular Juſtus, and his Father Piſtus, willingly entertained this occaſion to revolt from my obedience, and to ſubmit themſelves to John; yet was this Conſpiracy of theirs prevented by my ſpeedy acceſs. For a certain Meſſenger came to me from Silas, whom I had formerly preferred to the Government of Tiberias, who certified me of the K Citizens intent, and exhorted me in all haſte to repair thither, otherwiſe the City would ſhortly fall into another mans hands. As ſoon as I had peruſed Silas's Letters, I Travelled all night with Two hundred choſen Men; and ſending a Meſſenger before me, to ſignifie my approach to the Citizens, I neither loſt time nor way: and in the morning when I drew near the City, the People came out to meet me, and amongſt the reſt, John; who, after he had ſaluted me with a ſuſpitious Countenance, fearing leſt his Treaſon being diſcovered, he ſhould come in danger of his life, he ſpeedily retired himſelf into his Lodging. When I came to the great Piazza, and had diſmiſs'd all my Train but one ſervant, and retained only Ten armed Soldiers with me, I began to repreſent to the Tiberians, from a certain high place, from whence I might be heard, how L important it was for them to remain faithful, ſince otherwiſe I could no longer truſt them, and they would one day repent that they had fallen from their duty.

John ſeeketh to betray and murther Joſeph.

Scarcely had I ſpoken this, but one of my Friends advertis'd me to deſcend, telling me that this was no time to reconcile the Tiberians, or to perſuade them, but rather to ſeek mine own ſecurity, and how I might eſcape mine Enemies. That John having learned that I was deſtitute of Followers, had ſent a Thouſand of his choſen Soldiers to kill me; that they were at hand, and ready to commit the Murther; which they had done, had I not ſpeedily leapt down with the help of my ſervant Jacob, and Herod the Tiberian, who carried me to the Lake; where finding a Bark by M chance, and putting forth to Sea, I eſcaped, contrary to mine Enemies expectation, and came to Taricheas.

The Galileans require that they may invade Tiberias.

As ſoon as the Inhabitants of that City underſtood how perfidiouſly and trayterouſly the Tiberians had dealt with me, they were much diſpleaſed, and betaking themſelves to their Weapons, perſuaded me to lead them forth againſt them, telling me, that they would revenge the injury that was offered unto their Governor, of which they ſent advice thorow all Galilee. Hereupon, a great number of armed Galileans came to me, and perſuaded me to attaque Tiberias, and deſtroy it, and ſell the Inhabitants, with their whole Families, under the Spear. The like did my Friends, who eſcaped with me out of the City, perſuade me. But I, in no ſort, would admit N their advice, out of fear to revive a Civil War, and judging it beſt to accommode the matter. To which end, I ſhew'd them, that ſuch revenge would be prejudicial to themſelves alſo, if the Romans, at their coming, ſhould find them in Civil diſcords. By this diſcourſe, at length, the Galileans rage was appeaſed.

John excuſeth himſelf to Joſeph.

But when John ſaw that he had failed of his purpoſe, he began to fear for himſelf, and taking with him thoſe armed Men that he had about him, he left Tiberias, and went to Giſchala, from whence he wrote Letters to me, excuſing the Fact, as if he had been no ways guilty thereof, and deſiring me not to ſuſpect him; and he confirmed his words with execrable Oaths, to the end to get more credit to them. O But the Galileans who were gathered in great multitudes from all parts of the Region,

A gion, knowing that he was a wicked and perſidious Man, preſs'd me to lead them forth againſt him, promiſing me to ruine both him, Giſchala, and all his Countrey. After I gave them Thanks for their love towards me, and promiſed them that mine offices of love ſhould be anſwerable to their kindneſs. But I pray'd them to reſtrain themſelves, and to allow me to appeaſe this Trouble without effuſion of Blood.

This Requeſt of mine the Galileans granted: Whereupon we preſently went to Sephoris. But the Townſmen, who were reſolved to continue faithful towards the Roman people, fearing my approach, endeavor'd to divert me elſewhere. To which purpoſe, ſending a Meſſenger to Jeſus the Captain of eight hundred B Thieves, that kept upon the Confines of Ptolemais, they promiſed him a great Sum of Money, if with his Army of eight hundred Men, he would make War againſt me. He, allur'd by their promiſes, reſolv'd to ſurprize me unawares: to which end, he deſir'd me, by a Meſſenger, to grant him leave to come and ſalute me: which when he had obtained, for that I was wholly ignorant of his Treaſon, he took with him a Troop of his Thieves, and haſted ſpeedily towards me: yet failed he of his purpoſed Treaſon; for when he was not far off from me, a certain Fugitive of his Troop diſcovered his intent towards me. Which when I heard, I went out into the Market-place, feigning that I knew nothing of his ſecret Fraud, being attended with a multitude of armed Galileans, and among them with C certain Tiberians. I ſent abroad certain parties to guard the Highways, and commanded the Keepers of the Gates, that they ſhould onely ſuffer Jeſus to enter with the foremoſt of his Company, and exclude the reſt: and if they attempted to break in by force, they ſhould beat them off. Jeſus entering with a few, was requir'd, by me, preſently to lay down his Weapons, except he deſir'd to be ſlain; he, ſeeing himſelf invironed with armed Souldiers, obeyed. Whereupon, they that follow'd him, and were excluded, perceiving that their Captain was apprehended, ſuddenly betook themſelves to flight; and leading Jeſus apart, I told him I was not ignorant of thoſe Treaſons which he intended againſt me, nor by whoſe provocations he attempted the ſame. Yet I told him that I would pardon him, if ſo D be by changing his manners, he would be faithful to me hereafter. He promiſed me all that I demanded, and I diſmiſſed him with his Weapons: yet threatned to puniſh the Sephorites, except hereafter they deſiſted from their Treaſons. About the ſame time there came to me two Noblemen, who were Subjects to the King of Trachonites, bringing with them both Horſemen, Armor, and Money: whom when the Jews would have conſtrain'd to be circumciſed, if ſo be they would remain amongſt them; I would not permit them to be troubleſom to the Trachonites, alledging, that every Man ought to ſerve God according to his own mind, and not by other Mens impulſion: and that it was not to be ſuffer'd, that they, who for their ſecurity fled unto us, ſhould repent themſelves of the truſt they put in us. And E thus having perſuaded the multitude, I freely and abundantly furniſhed theſe Men with all things neceſſary.

In the mean ſpace, Agrippa ſent out his Forces under the Conduct of Equus Modius, to take the Caſtle Magdala by force; which for that they durſt not aſſault, they beſet the ways, and only troubled Gamala by placing Forces upon the Avenues. But Ebutius Decadarcus, who had the Government of the great Plain, hearing that I was come to a certain Village called Simonias, ſcituate on the Confines of Galilee, and diſtant from the ſame ſome ſixty furlongs, took with him by night an hundred Horſe that attended him, and about two hundred Footmen, with certain Inhabitants of the City of Gaba their Aſſociates, whom he conducted by F night, and beſet the Borough where I was. Againſt whom after I had drawn forth a valiant Band of Men, Ebutius laboured all he could, to toul us into the Field, for that he truſted very much in his Horſemen: but I would not give him that advantage, conſidering we were but Footmen, and reſolv'd to fight in the place where we were, and accordingly Ebutius charged us for awhile very valiantly. At length, perceiving that he had no uſe of his Horſemen in that place, he ſounded a Retreat, and departed back again with loſt labour to Gaba, having onely loſt three Men in the Battel. But I preſently purſued him with two thouſand Men: and when I came to Beſara, which is ſcituate on the Confines of Ptolemais, ſome twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius encamped at that time; I G beſet all the paſſages with Corps of Guard, whereby we might be more ſecure from the Excurſions of our Enemies, till we had carried out the Wheat, whereof there there was a great quantity ſtored up in that place, which was gathered out of H els and Aſſes, which to that end I had brought with me, I ſent the ſame into Galilee. Having finiſhed this buſineſs, I offered Ebutius Battel: and whereas he detracted the ſame, being terrified by our boldneſs, I took my courſe to encounter with Neopolitanus, who (as it was reported) was in the Territory of the Tiberi- ans, and foraged there. This Neopolitanus was a Captain of Horſemen, and had undertaken to defend Scythopolis againſt their Enemies. I hinder'd him from doing any wrong in the Countrey belonging to the Tiberians, and provided for the ſecurity of Galilee.

John maligneth Joſeph's good ſucceſs.

But John the Son of Levi, who (as I ſaid) lived at Giſchala, after he heard I that all things fell out fortunately with me, that I was loved by the People, and feared by mine Enemies, he conſider'd my good fortune as an obſtacle to his own, and being filled with no ſmall envy, and greater hope to hinder my good ſucceſs, if ſo be he could bring me in hatred with the People; he ſollicited thoſe of Ti- berias and Sephoris, and the Gabarenians, to revolt to him; which Cities are the chiefeſt in Galilee. For he told them, that under his Conduct, they ſhould be more happily govern'd. But amongſt the reſt, the Sephorites gave leaſt ear unto him, and neglecting us both, onely held for the Romans.

The Gabarenians revolt upon John's perſuaſion.

The Debarittenians ſpoil Ptolomy's Wife.

As for the Tiberians, they would not conſent to Rebel: yet promiſed him ſome friendſhip. But the Gabarenians wholly addicted themſelves to John, by the means K of one Simon, a principal Citizen, who was John's friend. Yet did they not openly declare for him, becauſe they feared the Galileans, whoſe good will towards me they were long time aſſured of, but privily they ſought other means to entrap me. And truly I fell into great danger upon this occaſion. For when certain De- barrittenians (being audacious young Men) had intelligence that Ptolomy's Wife the Kings ſteward, was Travelling along the great Plain with a great Equipage, out of the Kings Countrey into the Roman Government, they ſuddenly ſet upon her, and putting the Woman to flight, they ſeized on all the Baggage which ſhe carried with her. Which done, they came to Taricheas, where I then was, with four Mules laden with Apparel, and Houſhold-ſtuff of divers ſorts: among which were L divers ſilver Veſſels, and five hundred pieces of Gold. Intending therefore to reſerve theſe things for Ptolomy, as being a Jew (becauſe our Law permitteth not to take any from thoſe of our own Nation, though they be our Enemies) I told thoſe that brought the Goods, that the ſame ſhould be kept to be ſold, and the price beſtowed upon repairing the Walls of Jeruſalem. This motion of mine, the young men interpreted very hardly, becauſe they were depriv'd of the prey which they hoped for. For which cauſe, diſperſing themſelves in the ſtreets of Tiberias, they ſpread a rumor, that I deſign'd to betray the Countrey to the Ro- mans, and that I onely feigned that the prey was deſtinated to repair the Walls of Jeruſalem; but the truth was, I kept the ſame, to the intent to reſtore it to Pto- M lomy. In which matter they were not deceived. For after the departure of the young Men, I called to me two chief Citizens, Daſſian and Jannæus the Sons of Levi, true Friends to the King, and commanded them, to take the Houſhold-ſtuff, and convey it to the King, threatning them with death, if they revealed this ſecret to any Man.

Joſeph laboureth to reſtore Ptolomy to his Goods.

But when the rumor was ſpread thorow Galilee, that I would deliver the Province into the hands of the Romans, all the People were incens'd againſt me, and reſolv'd to deſtroy me. They of Taricheas alſo giving credit to the young Mens feigned ſpeeches, perſuaded my Guard, and the reſt of the Soldiers, to take a time whilſt I was aſleep, and come to the Horſe-race; there to conſult with others N how to effect their deſign. At the appointed place, they found many others aſſembled: and all of them determin'd with one conſent, to treat me as a Traytor to the Commonwealth. But he that moſt of all incited them to this, was Je- ſus the Son of Saphias, who at that time was a principal Judge in Tiberias, a Man given over to all Wickedneſs, and born to breed Troubles and Sedition.

Sedition againſt Joſeph. Jeſus the Son of Saphias, conſpireth againſt Joſeph.

This Man, holding the Law of Moſes in his hand, in the midſt of the Aſſembly, ſpake thus with a loud voice: If (ſaid he) you be touched with no care of your ſelves, yet at leaſt contemn not theſe Sacred Laws, which that perfidious Joſeph your Governor, hath not feared to violate, and for ſo great a Crime cannot be too ſeverely O puniſht.

After

A After he had thus ſpoken, and ſaw he was approved by the acclamations of the people, he took ſome armed men with him, and repaired to the houſe where I lodg'd, with intent to put me to death. I ſuſpecting nothing of all this Tumult, and tired with labor, was at reſt; when ſuddenly Simon, one of my Guard, who at that time only remained with me, ſeeing this furious Troop of people, came and awakened me; and certifying me of the imminent peril, he counſel'd me rather generouſly to kill my ſelf, than ſhamefully die by mine Enemies hands. I recommended my ſelf to God, and putting on a black Garment to diſguiſe me, and having onely my Sword by my ſide, I went forth, and paſs'd through the midſt of theſe people, and ſo went ſtrait to the Hippodrome by a by way. There falling proſtrate on my face, in view of all the people, I water'd the earth with my tears, B to move all men that beheld me to compaſſion. And when I perceived the people begin to melt, I laboured all I could, to divide them in opinion, before the armed Soldiers returned from my houſe. I confeſs'd that I had kept the booty for which I was accus'd, but I deſir'd them to hear to what uſe I had reſerved it; after which, if they pleas'd, they might kill me. Hereupon the multitude commanded me to ſpeak; and the armed men being returned back at the ſame time, and beholding me, would have fallen upon me to murther me: but they were reſtrained by the peoples exclamations; and they ſuppos'd that after I had confeſs'd that I deſign'd to reſtore the booty to the King, I ſhould paſs for a Traytor, and they might kill me without oppoſition.

Simon, one of Joſephs guard, awaketh him.

Joſeph moves the people to compaſſion.

Now ſilence being made to hear me, I ſpake thus: If in your opinion I deſerve death, C I refuſe not to die: yet permit me, before my death, to certifie you of the whole truth; When I obſerved that this City was moſt commodious and fit to entertain ſtrangers, and that many forſaking their own Countries, came to dwell here, and were willing to partake with you in all ſorts of Fortune; I reſolved to employ this money to build you Walls to your City, for which being thus deſtinated to do you good, your indignation is provoked againſt me. Upon theſe words, the Taricheans and ſtrangers cried out, that I deſerv'd thanks, and wiſh'd me to be of good courage. But the Galileans and Tiberians continued in their animoſity, ſo that they fell to diſſent betwixt themſelves, the one threatning me with puniſhment; the other, contrariwiſe, willing me to aſſure my ſelf of ſecurity. But after I had promiſed the Tiberians, and thoſe of other Cities, that I would D build their Walls, where it was convenient, they credited my words, the multitude ſeparated, and I, beyond all expectation, having eſcap'd ſo great a peril, with certain of my Friends, and ſome twenty Soldiers, returned to my houſe.

But once again the Authors of this Sedition, fearing leſt they ſhould be puniſhed for their offence, begirt my Lodging with ſix hundred armed men, intending to conſume it with fire. Of whoſe arrival, as ſoon as I had intelligence, imagining with my ſelf that it would be much diſhonor for me to flie, I reſolved to uſe valor and courage againſt them: for which cauſe, commanding the Gates to be ſhut, I required them from the top of the houſe, to ſend in ſome of them to me, to receive that money, for which they had been drawn into this mutiny: whereby they might have no further cauſe to be incenſed againſt E me. Which done, laying hold of one of the moſt troubleſom Fellows, that with the reſt came into me, I cauſed him to be beaten with many grievous ſtrokes, and his hand to be cut off, and hung about his neck; and thus handled, we thruſt him out of doors, to return to thoſe that had ſent him. So bold an action made them wonderouſly afraid, and ſuſpecting I had a great number of armed Soldiers in my houſe, they ſuddenly all of them fled away: And thus by my reſolution and addreſs I eſcaped this ſecond danger. Yet wanted there not ſome, who incited the people once more againſt me; ſaying, that the two Lords, who fled to me for refuge, ought not to live, except they ſubmitted themſelves to their Laws and Cuſtoms, from whom they required protection. They likewiſe accuſed them, that they were of the Roman Faction, and priſoners; and preſently the people began F to mutiny, being deceived by their words, who laboured to flatter them. Which when I heard, I once more informed the people, that they ought not to perſecute thoſe who reſorted unto them for ſuccor: that the poyſoning they ſpoke of, was a Fancy, and a Chimera, and that the Romans would not vainly nouriſh ſo many thouſands of Soldiers, if they pretended to make away their Enemies with poyſon. Being by theſe words ſomewhat pacified, they had ſcarcely withdrawn themſelves awhile, but that by certain outcaſts and wicked men, they were incited againſt the two Lords, ſo that with Weapons they went to their Lodging, intending to murther them. Which when I heard, I was afraid, that if this wickedneſs ſhould be committed, no man hereafter would dare to truſt his life in my hand. For which cauſe, being aſſiſted by divers others, I preſently reſorted G to their Lodging, and ſhut up the Gates: and cutting a Trench betwixt it and the Lake, I called for a Bark, and entring into the ſame with them, I conducted them to the Confines of the Hippenians: and furniſhing them with money to buy them Horſes, becauſe Another Sedition.

Joſeph privately diſmiſſeth the Taricheans.

cauſe they could not tranſport their own with them in their flight, I diſmiſſed them, deſi- H ring them to bear their preſent misfortune with a conſtant mind. But indeed it troubled me, that I was once more forced to expoſe thoſe men in the Enemies Countrey, who had committed themſelves to my truſt: yet thinking, that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that they fell into the Romans hands, they would be ſafer, than if by ſuffering them to remain in my Countrey, I ſhould ſee them oppreſt: I adventured them thus. Yet were they ſaved, and the King pardon'd them. And this was the end of this Tumult.

The Tiberians Letters to Agrippa. Seven ſtadia maketh almoſt a German mile.

Sedition and Rebellion in Tiberias.

Joſeph in danger for the Tiberians ſake.

Joſeph saileth to Tiberias.

But they of Tiberias wrote to the King, deſiring him to ſend a Garriſon into their Countrey, on which condition they would ſubmit to him. As ſoon as I knew of it, I went to them, and they deſired me that I would build them thoſe Walls which I had pro-miſed them: for they had already heard that Tarichea was invironed with Walls. Where- I unto I condeſcended, and gathering Materials, I ſet the Workmen to their task. But ſome three days after, departing from Tiberias toward Tarichea, which was thirty ſtades diſtant from thence, by chance a Troop of Roman Horſmen were diſcovered, not far from the City, which the Inhabitants believ'd were the Kings Army: Whereupon they preſently began to utter many things in honour of the King, and more in my reproach. And pre-ſently a certain friend poſted to me, and told me what their mind was, and how they intended to revolt from me. Which when I underſtood, I was wonderouſly troubled: For I had ſent back my men of War from Tarichea to their houſes, becauſe the next day was the Sabbath: for I would by no means, that the Citizens of Tarichea ſhould be charged or troubled with entertaining Soldiers. And at all times, when I remained in that City, I took K no care of the guard of mine own perſon, having had often proof of the affection of the Inhabitants towards me. Being therefore at that time attended only with ſeven Soldiers, and a few of my Friends, I knew not what to determine. For I thought it not fit to call back my Forces, becauſe the day was well nigh paſt; and although they ſhould have been with me the next morning, yet they might not have taken Arms, becauſe our Laws forbid the ſame, how great ſoever the occaſion be that is offered. And although I ſhould have drawn forth the Taricheans, and the ſtrangers that were retired thither, and, under hope of prey, have led them forth, yet I ſaw that they were too feeble to reſiſt the enemy. On the other ſide, I already perceived, that if I ſtayed over-long, the Army which was ſent by the King, being already entred the City, would have excluded me. I therefore determined to L uſe this ſtratagem; I preſently ſet a Guard at the gates of the City, conſiſting of my moſt truſty Friends, ſuffering no man to paſs out of them: and aſſembling the chief of every Family, I commanded them to lanch their Boats into the Lake, and to follow me with the Maſters of their ſhips. After which, both I and my Friends, and ſeven other Soldiers, betook us to a Bark, and ſailed toward Tiberias. But when the Tiberians ſaw that no Forces were come from the King, and that the whole Lake was covered with Barks; amazed, and fearing the ruine of their City, for that they ſuppoſed the ſhips to be full of Soldiers, they changed their ſentiments. And laying by their Weapons, themſelves with their Wives and Children came forth to meet me, and receiv'd me with joyful acclamations, (for they thought I had had no notice of their intents) beſeeching me that for the ſafety M of their City, I would enter the ſame. But I drawing near the City, commanded the Maſters of the Barks to caſt Anchor far off the ſhore, leſt the Townſmen might perceive that the ſhips were empty: And I my ſelf drawing near with mine own Bark to them, reproached them, that, contrary to their Oaths, they had been ſo fooliſhly induced to revolt. After which, I promiſed them pardon, if ſo be they would deliver me ten of their chiefeſt Nobility: which when they had incontinently performed, I ſhipt them in a Bark, and ſent them Priſoners to Tarichea. Then I demanded ten more, and I continu'd to uſe the ſame artifice, till I had by little and little got all the Senate of Tiberias, and many of the chiefeſt Citizens, and ſent them thither.

At length, the reſt of the multitude, perceiving in how great danger they were, they N beſought me that I would puniſh the chief Author of this Conſpiracy, who was called Clytus, a bold and raſh young man. I was unreſolv'd what to do, being loth to kill one of my own Nation, and yet it was expedient to puniſh him; wherefore I commanded Le-vias, one of my Guard, to ſeize on him, and cut off his hand. Levias not daring, for that he was alone, to enter into ſo huge a multitude, I, for fear leſt his Cowardiſe ſhould be diſ-covered by the Tiberians, called Clytus unto me, and ſaid unto him:

Ungrateful and perfidious man, as thou art, ſince thou deſerveſt to loſe both thy hands, I charge thee to become thine own Executioner, leſt through delay thou procure thy further puniſhment. And whereas with many prayers he beſought me to grant him one of his hands, I hardly con-deſcended. At length, of his own accord, for fear he ſhould loſe both, he took a Knife, O and cut off his left hand: and thus was this Tumult appeaſed.

A As ſoon as I returned to Tarichea, and the Tiberians underſtood what ſtratagem I had uſed with them, they were all amazed, ſeeing how I had puniſhed their ingratitude and diſobedience without any bloodſhed. Afterwards I ſent for ſuch of the people of Tiberias as were in Priſon, amongſt whom was Juſtus and his father Piſtus, and invited them to ſup with me: and during the repaſt, I told them that I was not ignorant, that the Roman Army excelled all Men of the world in power and force: notwithſtanding, that I kept my ſelf ſilent, in the reſpect of the Seditious that were round about, and I counſelled them that they alſo would do the like in expectation of better days; and yet that in the mean time they would not think amiſs of my Government, becauſe no other could treat them better. I reminded Juſtus alſo, that before I came from Jeruſalem, the Galile- B ans had cut off his Brothers hands, accuſing him to have forged falſe Letters before the War; and that after Philip's departure, the Gamelites, being at odds with the Babylonians, ſlew Cares, Philip's own Kinſman; whereas I had moderately puniſhed his Brother-in-law Jeſus, who had married his Siſter. After this diſcourſe during ſupper time, I ſet Juſtus and his Friends, early in the Morning, at liberty. But before this came to paſs, it hapned that Philip the Son of Jacim departed from the Fort of Gamala upon this occaſion: As ſoon as he underſtood that Varus was revolted from King Agrippa, and that Modius Equus, who was his Friend, was ſent to ſucceed him, he certified him of his eſtate by his Letters: which when he had received, he highly rejoyced at Philip's ſafety, and ſent thoſe Letters to the King and Queen, who lived at Berytus. Whereupon the King underſtand-C ing the falſe rumor that ran touching Philip, that he was the Chieftain of the Jews Army, who undertook the War againſt the Romans; ſent certain Horſemen to Philip to bring him to his preſence: before whom he no ſooner arrived, but he embraced him very kindly, and ſhewed him to the Roman Captains, telling them, that that was Philip of whom it was commonly reported, that he was in Rebellion againſt the Romans. After which, he ſent him with a party of Horſemen, in all diligence to the Fort of Gamala; to draw his houſhold ſervants from thence, and re-eſtabliſh the Babylonians in Batanæa, and travel, to his uttermoſt power, that the Subjects might be continued in obedience and peace.
After Philip had received this commandment from the King, he haſted to perform the ſame.

D But one Joſeph a pretended Phyſitian or Treacle-ſeller, gathering together a ſort of bold young Men, and inciting the Nobility of Gamala, perſuaded the People to fall from the King, and take Arms, for recovery of their former liberty. Having thus drawn many to his party, he fell to killing of all thoſe that durſt contradict him. Amongſt theſe, died Cares, Jeſus his Kinſman, and the Siſter of Juſtus the Tiberian, as we have heretofore declared. After this, they requeſted me by Letters, that I would ſend them aid, and Labourers to build Walls for their Town. To both which Requeſts of theirs, I eaſily con-deſcended. About this time the Countrey of Ganlonitis, as far as the Borough of Solyma, rebelled againſt Agrippa. I alſo incloſed with Walls Seleucia and Sogon, which were two ſtrong places unacceſſible, and fortified by Nature; I did the like alſo by Jemnia, E Ameritha, and Charabe, a Borough of higher Galilee, although they were ſcituated among the Rocks. I fortified in like ſort Taricheas alſo, and Tiberias, and Sephoris, Cities of Galilee; and the Cave of the Arbalians, Berſobe, Selamen, Jotapa, Capharath, Comoſogona, *Ne-laid up much of Armor and Munition for defence.

Many Jews revolt from the Romans.

Mean-while, John the Son of Levi, increaſed his hatred daily more and more towards me, being greatly grieved to ſee my proſperity: and whereas he was fully reſolved to rid me of my Life, after he had encompaſſed his Countrey Giſcala with Walls, he ſent Simon his Brother with an hundred Soldiers to Jeruſalem, to Simon the Son of Gamaliel, deſiring him to labour the matter in ſuch ſort with the City, that my Authority might be F diſannulled, and that John, by common conſent, might be ordained Governor of Galilee in my place. This Simon was born in Jeruſalem, Noble in Birth, and in Sect a Phariſee, (which Sect, of all other, is moſt ſtrictly obſervant in the Laws of our Countrey) a Man of excellent wiſdom, who, by his counſel, was able to repair the decaying Ruines of his Countrey, and who of long time had made uſe of John's friendſhip, becauſe he was at that time mine Enemy.

John laboureth to ſupplant Joſeph in his Government.

This Man, ſollicited by the interceſſion of his Friends, perſuaded the High Prieſt Ananus, and Jeſus the Son of Gamala, and other of his Faction, to ſtop my increaſing honors, before I attain'd to a higher degree of power. For it ſhould be very advantagious for them alſo, if I were removed from the Government of Galilee. Further, he told Ananus, G and the reſt, that they were not to delay the matter; leſt upon diſcovery of their coun-ſel, I ſhould attack the City with an Army. Ananus the High Prieſt replied, That it could not eaſily be done, for that divers Prieſts and Governors of the People bare witneſs for me, that I behaved my ſelf honeſtly in that Government; and that it was ill done to bring an Accuſation againſt a Man, who could not be charged with any Miſdemeanor. When Simon heard what Ananus ſaid, he pray'd him, and the reſt, at leaſt, to ſpeak nothing thereof, nor to make his motion known; for he himſelf would undertake the execution of it. And calling unto him the Brother of John, he charged him to tell his Brother that the way to accompliſh his deſign, was to ſend Preſents to Ananus. For (ſaid he) they will work ſo much with him, that they will make him change his opinion. In the end, Simon obtained that which he long time ſought after. For Ananus and his Adherents being corrupted with Money, accorded to remove me from the Government of Galilee, without the conſent or allowance of any other of the Citizens. For which cauſe they thought good to ſend certain perſons Noble in Birth, and no ways inferior to one another in Learning, whereof two were of the common ſort, and Phariſees; the one called Jonathas, the other Ananias; the third was Jozarus of the Tribe of Levi, who was alſo a Phariſee, and of the race of the Prieſts. To theſe they joined Simon, who was alſo deſcended of the High Prieſts, and the youngeſt of them all. Theſe they commanded to call together a Council of the Galileans, and demand of them, why they loved me ſo well? If they anſwered that it was becauſe I was of Jeruſalem, they ſhould ſay that Jeruſalem was their Countrey likewiſe. But if they ſaid it was becauſe of my knowledge in the Law, they were willed to ſay, that they underſtood the ſame as well as I. If they ſaid it was in regard I was a Prieſt that they loved me, they ſhould likewiſe averr, that two of them were Prieſts. Being thus inſtructed, and receiving forty thouſand ſilver drachms of the Publick treaſure, with their Fellow and Collegue Jonathan, they ſet forwards.

Simons ſecond counſel againſt Joſeph.

Ambaſſadors with Soldiers ſent to Joſeph.

And for that at the very ſame time a certain man called Jeſus, of Galilee, was come to Jeruſalem with a band of ſix hundred Soldiers, they ſent for him, and hired him, and gave him three Months pay, commanding him to follow Jonathan, and his Companions, and to do as they ſhould command them: and to theſe they adjoined three hundred Citizens, whom they hired with Rewards. With this preparation the Legates ſet forward, being accompanied with Simon, John's Brother, who had one hundred Soldiers with him, with Commiſſion from thoſe that ſent them, that if I willingly laid down Arms, they ſhould ſend me alive to Jeruſalem: and if I reſiſted, by their Authority, they might lawfully kill me. They had Letters alſo directed to John, which incited him to make War againſt me. Moreover, they charged the Sephorites, Gabarites, and Tiberians, to maintain John againſt me. After I had intelligence hereof, by my Fathers Letters, who had notice thereof by Jeſus the Son of Gamala, one of thoſe who were preſent at the deliberation, and who intirely loved me. I was much grieved, ſeeing with how much ingratitude my Countreymen requited me, and of malice had decreed my death; and for that my Father invited me by moſt affectionate Letters to draw my ſelf homeward, telling me how much he deſired to ſee me, who was his Son, before he left this life. I imparted theſe things to my Friends, and certified them, that within three days I would forſake their Countrey, and retire my ſelf into mine own. Whereupon they were ſurprized with great ſadneſs, and beſought me with tears, that I would not forſake them; for that they ſhould be utterly overthrown, if ſo be they were left deſtitute of my conduct. But whereas they could by no means perſuade me, and the care of mine own ſecurity prevailed very much with me; the Galileans fearing leſt I ſhould leave them, and by that means the Thieves ſhould be encouraged to ſet upon them, they ſent Meſſengers thorow all Galilee, to ſignifie unto them the reſolution of my departure. Whereupon divers underſtanding the news, reſorted unto me from all parts, bringing with them their Wives and Children; not ſo much, as I ſuppoſe, for the ſorrow they conceived at my departure, as the fear that they had for themſelves. For they perſuaded themſelves, that if I remained among them, there could no miſchief befall them. They aſſembled therefore in a great Plain, called Aſochim, where I remained.

Joſeph's Father ſignifieth all theſe News unto him.

Joſeph reſolveth to return home.

That night in my ſleep I had a ſtrange dream. For lying in my bed, and being wholly diſconſolate and troubled with the News I had received, methought a certain Man from above ſpake unto me after this manner: Comfort thy ſelf, and fear not. For the diſtreſs in which thou art, ſhall be the cauſe to make thee great and happy, beyond thine expectation. For not only theſe things ſhall turn to a fortunate iſſue, but alſo many other. Be not thou therefore diſmayed, but remember the advice that I give thee to make War againſt the Romans. After this dream, I awak'd; and as I prepared to go down into the Plain, the people of Galilee, with their Wives and Children, humbling themſelves to the earth, and weeping, beſought me that I would not leave them for a prey to their Enemies: or abandon their Countrey to their diſcretion. But ſeeing that I made ſmall reckoning of their prayers, they uttered a thouſand curſes againſt the people of Jeruſalem, that envied them the peace and happineſs which they enjoyed under my conduct.

Placidus againſt Joſeph.

A After I had heard theſe words, and ſeen the deſolation of the People, my heart was melted with compaſſion, and I reſolved in my ſelf, that in reſpect of ſo great a multitude, my life could not be better hazarded than for their preſervation. I therefore gave my conſent to remain with them, and gave order that five thouſand of the beſt Soldiers, with fit proviſions, ſhould attend me: as for the reſt, I ſent them back to their own houſes. When theſe five thouſand preſented themſelves, I join'd them to the other three thouſand that I had with me, and drew out with them fourſcore Horſemen, and marched on towards Chabalon, a Borough upon the marches of Ptolemais, where I undertook to prepare them for the Battel, expecting ſome aſſault from Placidus, who was come with two Companies of Footmen, and one of Horſemen, ſent by Ceſtius Gallus to B burn the Countrey-towns of Galilee, and other little Boroughs that border on Ptolemais. And for that he was entrenched before the City of Ptolemais, I encamped my Army likewiſe not far from the Borough Chabalon, ſome ſixty ſtades off: and divers times drew I out my Forces to bid him Battel, but there paſs'd nothing but skirmiſhes. For Placidus, perceiving my forwardneſs to fight, was diſmay'd thereat, and retired himſelf: yet he departed not from Ptolemais.

Jonathan's Letter to Joſeph.

A Horſeman brought the Letters.

Joſeph's policy.

Joſeph's anſwer to Jonathan.

About this time came Jonathan, with the other Ambaſſadors, who (as we have heretofore declared) were ſent by Simon, and the High Prieſt Ananus; they labour'd to entrap me by policy, for that they durſt not aſſail me in open field. To which purpoſe they writ a Letter to me to this effect: Jonathan and the Ambaſſadors with him, who C are ſent by thoſe of Jeruſalem, to Joſeph, Greeting. The chief Men of Jeruſalem being informed, that John of Giſchala hath oftentimes ſought to betray you, we are ſent to repreſs his malice, and to exhort him hereafter to ſubmit himſelf unto you. And being deſirous to confer with you, touching what concerneth the publick good, we pray you to reſort to us as ſoon as you can, with ſome few Attendants, becauſe the Borough is not able to entertain many. To this effect they writ to me, hoping that one of theſe two things would fall out: either that coming diſarmed, I ſhould be eaſily ſurprized by them; or elſe bringing with me a great Company, I ſhould be condemned for an Enemy to my Countrey. The Meſſenger that brought me this Letter, was a valiant young Man, mounted on Horſe-back, and had in times paſt born Arms for the King. The time at which he came to me, was two hours within night, D when I was banquetting with my Friends, and the chief Governors of Galilee. After that, one of my Houſhold Servants had certified me, that a certain Jew on Horſeback was come to ſpeak with me, I commanded he ſhould be brought in; who ſaluted me but coldly, and delivering me the Letter, ſaid unto me, They that are come from Jeruſalem, ſend you this Letter; give them a ſpeedy anſwer: For I am commanded to make a ſpeedy return. They that ſate at the Table with me, were amazed at the Soldiers inſolence. But for my ſelf, I willed him to ſit down, and ſup with us: but he refuſing the ſame, I open'd the Letter without the obſervation of any preſent, and having ſeen what it contain'd, I folded it up again, and held it in my hand, in ſuch manner as I had received it, and began to talk with my Friends of other affairs: and not long after riſing from Supper, and diſmiſſing the reſt E to their repoſe, I only retained with me ſome of my moſt intimate Friends, and gave order that the Soldier ſhould receive twenty drachms to bear the charges of his Voyage. He having received the ſame, and giving me thanks, I perceived well that he lov'd Money, and conſequently might eaſily be wrought upon with it. Whereupon I ſaid unto him, if thou wilt drink with me, thou ſhalt have a drachm for every glaſs thou drinkeſt. To this the Soldier liſtned willingly, and having drunk good ſtore of Wine, to get the more Money, he became drunk; ſo that he was unable any longer to conceal his ſecrets: but of his own accord he declared the Treaſon that was prepared, and how the ſentence of death was given by them againſt me. Which when I underſtood, I anſwer'd them to this effect: Joſeph to Jonathan, and thoſe that accompany him, Health. I am F very glad to hear that you are arrived in Galilee in good health, eſpecially becauſe I may now deliver into your hands the government of the affairs thereof, to the end (according as I have long time deſired) I may return into my Countrey. I am willing not only to come to you at Xallon, but to any further place alſo, though you ſhould not ſend for me. But you will pleaſe to pardon me, though I come not at this preſent: for I am now at Chabalon, to attend Placidus, who pretendeth to invade Galilee. Reſort you therefore unto me, after you ſhall have read theſe my Letters. Farewel.

After I had written this anſwer, and deliver'd it to the Soldier to carry it to them, I ſent with him thirty of my moſt approved Friends of Galilee, commanding them to ſalute the Deputies, without any further ſpeech of any buſineſs whatſoever. I aſſigned alſo to G each of theſe, one of my moſt reſolute and beſt Soldiers, to watch carefully if any of thoſe I ſent ſhould confer with Jonathan's Men. They therefore ſet forward on their way: and Jonathan and the other ſeeing their firſt purpoſe failed them, they ſent me another Jonathan's Meſſage and Letter to Joſeph.

The Ambaſſadors of Jeruſalem coldly entertained in Galilee.

Letter to this effect: Jonathan and his Company to Joſeph, Health. We command you that H within three dayes, you make your appearance before us, without any of your Soldiers, in the Borough of Gadara, to the end we may take cogniſance of the Crimes whereof you have accuſed John. As ſoon as they had written this, and received thoſe Galileans whom I had ſent, they went to Japha, which is the greateſt Town of Galilee, fenced with ſtrong Walls, and peopled with many Inhabitants. The People of that City, with their Wives and Children, came forth to meet them, exclaiming againſt them with loud cryes, and charging them to return back, and not to deprive them of the good Governor they had. Jonathan and his Companions though diſpleas'd with theſe words, yet durſt not make any open ſhew of their diſpleaſure, but without returning them any anſwer, they reſorted to o- I ther Towns, where they met with no leſs peremptory Exclamations from the Multitude, who proteſted plainly, that they would have no other Governor but Joſeph. Whereupon Jonathan with his Followers departed without any further ſpeech, and went to Sephoris, the greateſt City of Galilee. The Inhabitants thereof being affected to the Romans, went forth to meet them: but they ſaid nothing at all concerning me. Departing from Sephoris, they went to Aſochim, where the Citizens ſung the ſame Song that the Japheans did. Whereupon they being unable to contain their diſpleaſure, commanded their Soldiers to beat with their Truncheons thoſe that exclaimed againſt them, and deſir'd me for their Governor. And when they drew near Gabara, John came out to meet them, accompanied with 3000 Soldiers: and I having intelligence by their Letters, that they were reſolved to make War againſt me, departed from Chabalon, accompanied with 3000 Soldiers; and K having committed the Camp to the charge of one of my truſtieſt Friends, I went to Jotapata, becauſe I would be within forty ſtades of them, and ſent them this Letter: If your will be that I muſt needs come unto you, there are in Galilee two hundred and four Cities and Boroughs, I will meet you in any one of them, which you pleaſe, except Gabara and Giſchala: for that the one is the place of John's Nativity, and the other is Confederate with him.

Joſeph writeth again to them.

The conſultation of the Ambaſſadors againſt Joſeph.

Joſeph beſetteth the wayes of Galilee.

After Jonathan had received this anſwer, he replied no more, but ſought means to entrap me. John was of the opinion to write to all the Cities and Boroughs of Galilee, ſuppoſing that without queſtion there were one or two in them that were mine Enemies, whom they might incenſe againſt me, as againſt their common Enemy. He gave order alſo, L that this his reſolution ſhould be ſent to Jeruſalem, to the end that thoſe of the City underſtanding that I was adjudged an Enemy by the Galileans, might in like ſort confirm that their decree by their opinion. For he ſaid, that by this means it would come to paſs, that the Galileans, who were well affected towards me, would forſake me, for the fear they ſtood in of them. This advice of Johns greatly pleaſed them all, and was preſently brought unto me about the third hour of the Night, by one Saccheas, who flying from them, came and brought me the News, and particularly related to me their intent. For which cauſe, perceiving that the time requir'd no longer delay, I commanded Jacob, who was one of my moſt aſſured and truſty Servants, to take two hundred Men with him, and to beſet the wayes between Gabara and Galilee, and to ſend me thoſe Paſſengers whom he ſhould take, and eſpecially thoſe that carried Letters. I ſent Jeremy alſo, who was one M of my Friends, to the marches of Galilee, with ſix hundred Men at Arms, to keep the paſſages that way toward Jeruſalem, commanding him to ſeize on all thoſe that carried Letters, and to commit the Men to Priſon, and to ſend me their Packets.

After I had in this ſort inſtructed thoſe whom I ſent, I commanded the Galileans the next day following to take their Arms, and to furniſh themſelves with Victuals for three dayes, and to attend me at the Borough of Gabaroth. Thoſe Soldiers that I had, I diſtributed into four Companies, and kept thoſe with me, in whom I repoſed moſt confidence, for the guard of my perſon: and having appointed Captains over them, and commanded them to be careful, I charged them to ſuffer no unknown Soldier to enter in among them. The next day I came to Gabaroth, at the fifth hour of the day, where I found all the N fields about the City full of armed Galileans, who reſorted thither to aſſiſt me, according as I had commanded them. Thither alſo came a multitude of other Men from other Boroughs. As ſoon as I came amongſt them, and was ready to ſpeak to them, all of them began to cry out, calling me their Benefactor, and the Maintainer of their Countrey. After I had ſolemnly given them thanks for this favor they ſhewed me, I charged them to do no wrong, nor attempt any ſpoil in the Countrey, but to encamp amidſt the fields, contenting themſelves with that proviſion they had brought with them, becauſe I was deſirous to extinguiſh theſe Troubles without effuſion of blood. It hapned the ſame day, that Jonathan's Meſſengers and Letters fell into their hands, who had the guard of the paſſages by my appointment; and, according to my direction, the Men were put in cuſtody, O as I gave order: and finding the Letters that were brought me, to be full of nothing but ſlanders and lyes written by the Ambaſſadors; I ſaid not a word to any Man, but

A but thought it beſt policy to march towards them. But Jonathan's Soldiers having intelligence of my coming, retir'd, and with them John alſo, to Jeſus's houſe, which was a great Tower, nothing different from a Cittadel, in which they lodg'd a good number of Soldiers, and locked up all the other gates ſave one; expecting that I ſhould come that way, to ſalute them. In a word, they had commanded their Soldiers, that when I ſhould enter, they ſhould ſuffer no Man elſe to enter with me, but exclude all the reſt; For they made no other account, but that by this means they might eaſily ſeize on me. But they were deceiv'd of their hopes: For having notice beforehand of their intent, as ſoon as I came thither, I entred into a Lodging that was right over againſt theirs, and feigned that I went to take my reſt. Whereupon Jonathan's Soldiers ſuppoſing that I was B indeed aſleep, and ſafe, went forth in all haſte into the Plain, and labour'd to diſſuade my Soldiers from their fidelity, becauſe of my ill Government. But all things fell out contrary to what they hop'd: for as ſoon as they were diſcovered, the Galileans gave a great ſhout, teſtifying the good will they bare to me their Governor, and they blamed the Ambaſſadors, that without any cauſe of injury, they were come to diſturb the Publick peace, and requir'd them to be gone, for that they would admit no other Governor. When theſe things were ſignified unto me, I made no doubt to adventure my ſelf forth among them, to hear what theſe Ambaſſadors had to ſay againſt me. Upon my arrival, the whole Troop ſhouted for joy, and applauded me with a loud voice, giving me thanks for my juſt and peaceable Government.

John and the Ambaſſadors Forces retire to Jeſus's houſe.

Joſeph preſenteth himſelf among his Enemies.

C Jonathan and his Adherents hearing this, were afraid, leſt the Galileans ſhould ſet upon them, and they ſhould be in danger of their Lives; and ſo they began to bethink themſelves how they might eſcape. But perceiving that they could not retire, becauſe I requir'd them inſtantly to ſtay, they were ſo confounded, that they ſeem'd out of their ſenſes. I therefore commanded the People to ceaſe their ſhouting, and planted the Soldiers of greateſt truſt in every paſſage, to prevent John from charging them unawares. After this, I exhorted the People to betake them to their Weapons, to the end that if the Enemy ſhould ſuddenly aſſail them, they might not be put into diſorder. This done, I firſt of all began to rip up to Jonathan and his Followers, what Letters they had written, and how they had certified me, that they were ſent by the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, to D make an end of thoſe differences that were between me and John, and how they had requir'd me to come unto them. Afterwards in the ſequel of my diſcourſe, I produc'd their Letters in open view, to the end they might not deny any thing, ſeeing themſelves convicted by their own hand-writing; and ſpake thus, addreſſing my ſpeech to Jonathan.

Joſeph objecteth treachery againſt the Ambaſſadors.

If being accuſed by John, I ſhould produce two or three witneſſes that were men of reputation, to teſtifie the ſincerity of my action, is it not evident that you, O Jonathan, and you his Collegues, could not but acknowledge mine innocency, and acquit me of that whereof I am accuſed? But to the intent you may know that I have faithfully governed the eſtate of Galilee, I am not contented to produce three witneſſes, but I produce all theſe whom you ſee before you. Enquire of them how I have lived, and whether I have governed this Countrey in all honeſty and juſtice? I ad-
E jure you all therefore, who are my Fellows and Friends of Galilee, that you hide nothing of the truth; but that before theſe men, as if they were Judges, you declare if I have done any thing that is contrary to right.

In the mouth of two or three witneſſes conſiſteth truth.

After I had ſpoke after this manner, all of them, with one accord, called me their Benefactor and Defender, and gave teſtimony of my forepaſſed Government, and exhorted me to continue the ſame hereafter. And all of them affirmed by Oath, that I had carefully prevented leſt any Woman ſhould be violated, or any Man by my means drawn into any injury or inconvenience. This done, I publickly read the two Letters in the preſence of all the Galileans, which were taken from Jonathan's Meſſengers, by thoſe who were appointed by me to beſet the ways, and were by them ſent to me; which let-F ters were full of injuries and falſhoods, accuſing me that I had behaved my ſelf rather like a Tyrant, than a Governor, towards them: beſides that, there were divers other things in them written and urged very falſly. Theſe Letters (ſaid I) were voluntarily offered me by thoſe that carried the ſame. For I was unwilling that mine Adverſaries ſhould know that I had beſet the wayes, leſt they ſhould forbear to write hereafter.

The Galileans teſtimony of Joſeph's good Government.

Joſeph openly readeth Jonathan's Epiſtles.

The People having heard this, were diſpleaſed and animated againſt Jonathan and his Followers, and preſs'd on to murther them; as they had ſurely done, had I not pacified the diſpleaſure of the Galileans. As for the Ambaſſadors that accompanied Jonathan, I told them all, that I pardoned whatſoever was paſt, provided they would change their demeanor, and upon their return into their Countrey, truly report unto thoſe who had G ſent them, how all things had paſt under my Government. This they promiſ'd, and I diſmiſſed them; notwithſtanding that I knew they would perform nothing of that which they had promiſed. But the whole multitude continuing their fury againſt them, deſired me to give them leave to puniſh with all rigor thoſe who had committed this H ſlanderous act. But I laboured all I could to perſwade them to lay no hands upon them, knowing full well that whatſoever Mutiny it be, it cannot but breed prejudice to the Commonweal. This notwithſtanding, the multitude would by no means be ſatisfied, but all of them ran in crouds with great fury to the Lodging, where Jonathan and the Embaſſadors were. Whereupon ſeeing that it was impoſſible to reſtrain their fury, I incontinently betook me to my Horſe, and commanded the People to follow me to Sogan a Borough of the Arabians, diſtant from thence ſome 20 ſtades. By this means I brought to paſs, that the beginning of a Civil War might not be imputed to me.

Joſeph pacifieth Sedition without bloodſhed.

When I arrived at Sogan, I made a halt, and admoniſht my Followers not to give way to their froward diſpleaſures, nor entertain any deſire of revenge: and I commanded I them to chooſe out an hundred of the chiefeſt and eldeſt amongſt them, who ſhould repair to the City of Jeruſalem, and there complain unto the People againſt thoſe that had kindled Sedition in their Province. And I ſaid unto them, If the People be favourable and liſten to your diſcourſe, you ſhall perſuade them to write unto me, that by their authority I remain in Galilee; and that John and his Followers depart from hence. After I had given them this charge, and that they were furniſhed with all things neceſſary for their journey, with all expedition on the third day I diſpatched them, and ſent five hundred armed Men with them. I writ alſo to my Friends in Samaria, ſo to provide for their paſſage, that they might finiſh their journey in all ſecurity. For Samaria was already in ſubjection to the Romans; and it behoved my Men of neceſſity, in order to make a ſhort K journey, to paſs that way. For, from Galilee, by this means a man may in three days arrive at Jeruſalem. Furthermore, I conducted the Ambaſſadors my ſelf as far as the Frontiers of Galilee, ſetting Guards upon the ways to the end that none might eaſily know of their departure. Which done, I ſojourned for a certain time at Japha.

Joſeph ſends one hundred Ambaſſadors to Jeruſalem.

But Jonathan and his Companions having failed of their purpoſe intended againſt me, diſmiſſed John to Giſchala: as for themſelves they went to Tiberias, hoping to bring the ſame under their obedience; for that Jeſus, who was Preſident at that time, had writen to them, and promiſed them to perſuade the People to entertain them, and to take their part if they came: in which hope they retired thither. Sylas, who (as I declared) was left by me as Agent in Tiberias, certified me of all this by his Letters, adviſing me to return in all diligence: L in doing which, I was brought in danger of my life, upon this occaſion that enſueth; Jonathan and his Followers being come to Tiberias, perſuaded divers who were mine Enemies to revolt from me; but after they were certified that I was there in perſon, they were afraid, and came unto me; and ſaluting me, told me, that they reputed me happy, in that I had ſo wiſely behaved myſelf in Galilee: and they rejoyced alſo in appearance, that I was returned with honor; telling me that they participated in that honor as being their Fellow-Citizen. And they proteſted to me that the friendſhip which I bore them, was more conſiderable to them than that of John; and deſired me to return, promiſing very ſhortly to deliver John into my hands: and theſe ſpeeches of theirs they ſeconded with dreadful Oaths, which made me think that I had no cauſe to disbelieve them. Furthermore, they M prayed me to take up my Lodging in another place, becauſe the Sabbath being near, it were an inconvenience that the City of Tiberias ſhould be drawn into trouble on that day. I who ſuſpected nothing, repaired to Tarichea, leaving notwithſtanding certain of my Friends behind me in Tiberias, who might curiouſly obſerve what the common talk was of me: and all along the way betwixt Tarichea and Tiberias, I laid certain Men in wait, who from one to another might certifie me of that which was diſcovered by them who remained in the City. The next day therefore they all aſſembled in the Proſeucha or Oratory, which was a large houſe, wherein they prayed, and capable of a great Multitude.
When Jonathan was entred into this place, he durſt not openly ſpeak to them of a revolt, but only told them that their City had need of a better Governor. But the Preſident N Jeſus, without diſſembling, ſpake plainly after this manner unto them; It were better for you (my Friends) that you were ſubject to four Men of Nobility and great wiſdom, than to one: and thereupon he pointed to Jonathan and his Collegues. Juſtus ſtood up, and praiſed this advice and drew ſome of the people to his opinion. But the greater part aſſented not, and there had preſently followed a mutiny, had not the Aſſembly been diſmiſſed, by reaſon it was mid-day, which is the ordinary hour amongſt them to take their repaſt. Thus did Jonathans conſorts remit the determination of the matter until the next day, retiring themſelves without any good done. Which being reported to me, I reſolved with my ſelf the next morning to repair to the City of Tiberias: and accordingly arriving there very early I found the People already aſſembled in the place of O prayer; but they knew not the cauſe why they were aſſembled. Jonathan and his Collegues ſeeing me there, contrary to their expectation, were very much troubled, and bethought

A bethought themſelves of this ſubtilty. They told the Multitude that a certain Friend of theirs had inform'd them, that he had diſcovered certain Roman Horſemen upon the Frontiers of that Territory, ſome thirty ſtades from the City, in a place called Homonæa.
Whereupon they cry'd out, that they ought not to endure their Countrey to be pillag'd by the Enemy in their ſight. They uſed this Speech, ſuppoſing that under pretext of reſcuing the Countrey, they might ſend me abroad, and ſo remain Maſters of the City, by getting the affection of the Inhabitants to my prejudice.

Jonathan and his Aſſociates ſubtilty.

Now although I knew very well their intent, yet I gave ear to them, leſt I ſhould bring the Tiberians into an opinion, that I was negligent and careleſs of their ſecurity. I therefore rode out, and came to the place of which they had ſpoken, where finding no footſtep B or appearance of an Enemy, I returned ſpeedily without delay to Tiberias. When I came there, I found the whole Council aſſembled with a Multitude of People, and Jonathan making againſt me a very vehement Invective, that I made no account to relieve them in their Wars, and ſtudied nothing but mine own pleaſure. And whil'ſt they ſpake theſe words, they produced four Letters, as written unto them by thoſe who live upon the Marches of Galilee, requiring ſuccor of them, for that the Roman Horſemen and Footmen would within three days forage and ſpoil their Countrey. The Tiberians hearing theſe Allegations, and ſuppoſing them true, cryed out, ſaying, That it behoved them not in that manner to delay time, but to go and ſuccor their Countreymen invironed with great dangers. Whereupon I anſwer'd, That I was ready to obey them, and promis'd to C march forth againſt the Enemy with all expedition. Now I knew well the pretence of Jonathan, and declar'd my opinion, that ſince thoſe Letters ſaid, that the Romans gather'd head in divers places, it was requiſite to divide our Power into five Companies, appointing every one of them a Chieftain over them, each of the Ambaſſadors to command one.
For it is an honor for good Men not only to give counſel, but alſo when need requireth, to be firſt in action: and it lay not in my power to lead any more than one Company.
This my advice was pleaſing to all the People, who preſently conſtrain'd theſe Men to march out to the War: whereby it came to paſs, that they were greatly confuſed to ſee that they could not finiſh that which they had imagined, becauſe I croſſed all their Enterprizes.
Hereupon, one of their Party call'd Ananias, a wicked and ſubtle Man, counſelled D the People to celebrate a ſolemn Faſt the next day, and gave direction at the ſame hour, that all of them ſhould gather together in that place without Arms, to teſtifie before God, that without his ſuccors and aſſiſtance, they were able to do nothing. He ſpake this, not for any Piety that was in him, but to the end to ſurprize both me and my Followers unarm'd. To this advice of his I was conſtrain'd to condeſcend, to the end it might appear that I contemned not that which had ſo great an appearance of Religion.
As ſoon therefore as we retired every one to our ſeveral Lodgings, Jonathan and his Collegues writ to John, to reſort unto them early in the Morning with his Men of War, and all the Power he could make; for that they might eaſily lay hands on me, and accompliſh that which they had ſo long time long'd for. He receiving this Letter, willingly E obey'd. The next day I commanded two of my ſtouteſt and faithfulleſt Soldiers to hide their ſhort Swords under their Gowns, and to attend me, to the end that if in any ſort we were aſſailed by the Enemy, we might defend our ſelves. I put on my Curets alſo, and girt my Sword by my ſide, in ſuch ſort, as no Man might perceive the ſame, and came with them to the place of Prayer.

But Jeſus, as ſoon as I was entred with my Friends, having the guard of the gate, would our Prayers, according to the cuſtom of the Countrey, Jeſus riſing up, demanded of me put the ſame into the hands of* Capella, and ten of the chief Nobility of Tiberias, and willed him to ask them whether it were true that I ſpake? He did ſo, and they confeſſed that they had it. But what (ſaid he) is become of thoſe twenty pieces of Gold, that you receiv'd by the ſale of a certain weight of maſſive ſilver? I anſwer'd him, *That I had deliver'd the Jonathan and his Collegues ſaid, *That I had done amiſs, in employing the Publick Treaſure to ſaw that a Commotion was likely to ariſe, I thought beſt to animate the People the more part, and onely the Council to ſtay, for that it was unpoſſible to examine matters diſ-creetly, where ſo much trouble and turmoil was. The People cryed out, That they would not leave me alone among them. Whereupon there came one to Jeſus, who ſecretly informed him, that John with his armed Men was at hand. Jonathan being unable to contain and conceal his joy, and God ſo providing for the conſervation of my life (ſince otherwiſe, John and his Followers had certainly deſtroy'd me.) Forbear (ſaid he) ye Tibeter ; but becauſe he affecteth the Tyranny, and by his words hath deceived the People of Galilee, and gotten the Sovereignty to himſelf. As he ſpake theſe words, he and thoſe of his Faction I offer'd to lay hands on me, intending to murther me. But thoſe two, whom I had with me, perceiving their intent, drew their Swords, threatning thoſe who attempted to offer me violence. The People likewiſe gather'd ſtones to caſt at Jonathan ; and pull'd me away violently from mine Enemies. As I was getting away, I ſaw John coming with his Troops ; whereupon croſſing down a private way that led me to the Lake, I got into a Boat, and went by water to Tarichea, avoiding this danger beyond all hope.

Joſeph certifieth the Galileans how trayterouſly Jonathan and the Tiberians had dealt with him.

There immediately I ſent for the chiefeſt Men of Galilee, and told them, how contrary to all right, I had almoſt been murther'd by Jonathan and the Tiberians. The Galileans were highly incens'd againſt them, and conjur'd me, without delay, to make War againſt them; K or if I liſt not my ſelf, to ſuffer them with all expedition to cut off both John and Jona- than, with all their Followers. I reſtrain'd them the beſt I could, and repreſented to them that it was beſt to expect till ſuch time as we knew what News our Ambaſſadors, that were gone to Jeruſalem, would bring. To the end to do nothing without their approbation and conſent ; and by theſe means I perſuaded them. But The hundred Amdaſſadors return from Jeruſalem.

An Aſſembly in Arbela.

The Council held againſt Joſeph by Jonathan and his Companions.

Some few days after, our Ambaſſadors return'd from Jeruſalem, and certifi'd us that the People of Jeruſalem were much diſpleas'd with Ananus the High Prieſt, and Simon the Son of Gamaliel, that without their conſent, they had ſent Deputies into Galilee, to L diſpoſſeſs me of the Government there ; and their diſpleaſure was ſo great, that they were ready to ſet their Houſes on fire. They brought me alſo Letters, by which the Governors of Jeruſalem, upon the inſtant Requeſt that the People made to them, confirmed me in the Government of Galilee, and commanded Jonathan and his Aſſociates to return back again with all expedition. After I had receiv'd theſe Letters, I repair'd to the Borough of Arbela, where I aſſembled the Galileans : before whom I commanded the Ambaſſadors to report how much the People of Jeruſalem were diſpleaſed at thoſe things which Jonathan had done againſt me ; and how they confirm'd me in the Government of this Countrey, and recall'd Jonathan and his Confederates back again to Jeruſalem : After this, I ſent them that Letter that was directed to them, commanding the M meſſenger to obſerve very carefully both their actions and countenance. They were greatly troubled, and ſent for John, and thoſe of the Council of Tiberias, with the Governor of Gabara, and conſulted with them what was beſt to do. The Tiberians opinion was, that Jo- nathan and dis Collegues ſhould continue to take care of affairs, and not forſake the City which had put itſelf into their hands, eſpecially becauſe I would attack them: for that I had ſo threatned them, they were not aſham'd to feign and imagin. This advice not only pleaſed John, but he further gave this counſel, that two of the Ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent from them to the People of Jeruſalem, to accuſe me that I had unjuſtly govern'd Galilee ; which they might very eaſily perſuade the People to believe, both in regard of their Authority, as alſo for that the common People are by nature variable and inconſtant. This counſel N that John gave, was allow'd by them all : and it was thought fit that Jonathan and Ana- nias ſhould in perſon repair to Jeruſalem, and the other two remain at Tiberias ; and for their Convoy they gave them an hundred armed Soldiers.

The Tiberians intend War againſt Joſeph. Jonathan with his Followers taken and kept captive.

The Tiberians after this provided for the reparation of their Walls, gave commandment to all the Citizens to take Arms, and ſent for ſome ſupplies to John, who was at Giſchala, to ſtrengthen their Gariſon, if they ſhould any ways be aſſaulted by me. Jona- than travelling onwards of his Journey, came to Dabaritta, a City ſituated upon the ut-termoſt Borders of Galilee in a great Plain: there he met about Midnight with ſome of my Troops that kept the Watch, who commanded them to lay by their Arms, and kept them Priſoners, as I had commanded them. Hereof Levi, who had the charge of this O Quarter, certifi'd me by his Letters. I diſſembling the matter for two days, ſent Letters to

A to the Tiberians, by which I counſelled them, to lay their Arms aſide, and diſmiſs every one to his own dwelling place. But they returned me an injurious anſwer: for they ſuppoſed that Jonathan and his Train were already arrived in Jeruſalem. But I ſetting light by their Injuries, reſolved to uſe Cunning, rather than Force: for I thought it a dangerous matter to kindle a Civil War. Being therefore willing to draw them out of their walls, I choſe out ten thouſand of my beſt Soldiers, whom I diſtributed into three Bands, and lodged one Company of them ſecretly at Dora, in ambuſh. I placed another thouſand in a certain Borough ſcituate in a mountainous place, ſome four ſtades from Tiberias; commanding them, that as ſoon as I gave them a watch-word or ſign, they ſhould break forth: as for my ſelf, I drew into the open field, and there quarter'd.
B Which when the Tiberians ſaw, they made continual Excurſions towards me, uſing many bitter and injurious Taunts againſt me: and ſo great Folly poſſeſſed them, that they laid a Coffin in the open Plain, and going round about the ſame, they ſcornfully ſeemed to lament me, as dead, whil'ſt in the mean time I took pleaſure to laugh at their follies.

The Tiberians ſcoff very bitterly againſt Joſeph.

But being deſirous to ſurprize by ſome policy Simon and Joazar the two other Collegues, I ſent to deſire them that they would march forth a little without their walls, attended by their Friends, and a Guard for their ſecurity; for that I was minded to confer with them upon a Peace, and to ſhare the Government with them. Simon blinded with Ambition, was ſo weak as to come forth with all expedition: but Joazar ſuſpecting ſome ſtratagem, would not adventure without the walls. As ſoon as I ſaw Simon, C I went out to meet him, and embraced him kindly, giving him thanks for that he was come down; and after walking along with him, as if I intended to communicate ſomewhat with him in ſecret, I withdrew him from his Friends; and laying hands on him, I deliver'd him to my Friends to lead him into the Borough, and gave a ſign to my Soldiers to come forth, and with them I aſſaulted the City of Tiberias. There was a ſharp ſkirmiſh on both ſides, and the Tiberians had well nigh gotten the Victory: for my Soldiers began to flie; but perceiving how the matter went, I animated thoſe of my Company, and gave a valiant onſet on the Tiberians, who almoſt had the better, and chaſed them into their City, and ſent another Company by the Lake, to ſet fire on thoſe Houſes which they ſhould firſt light upon. Hereupon the Tiberians thinking their City was D taken by force, caſt down their Weapons for fear, and pray'd me to have compaſſion on their Wives and Children, and to pardon their City. Accordingly, being moved with compaſſion, I reſtrained the fury of my Soldiers; and becauſe it was late, I ſounded a Retreat, both to ſpare the City, and relieve my wearied and wounded Soldiers. I ſent for Simon to come and ſup with me, and comforted him in his misfortune, promiſing him to ſend him to Jeruſalem with all ſafety, and to furniſh him for his ordinary expences with all things neceſſary. The next day, with ten thouſand Soldiers, I entred into Tiberias, and having aſſembled the chiefeſt Citizens in the Hippodrome, I commanded them to diſcover to me who had been the Authors of that Rebellion. They ſatisfied me, and I laid hands on them, and bound them, and ſent them incontinently to Jotapata. As for Jonathan E and his Conſorts, I gave them Money for their charges, and ſent them back to Jeruſalem with Simon and Joazar, and five hundred Soldiers for their Guard. Hereupon the Tiberians re-aſſembled themſelves before me, beſeeching me to pardon their miſdeeds, promiſing me to recompence by their future fidelity their former defection: and deſiring me to reſtore thoſe Goods to the Citizens, which in way of pillage were taken from them. Whereupon I gave command, that all the prey ſhould be brought and laid before me: and whereas the Soldiers delayed to perform the ſame, I eſpying one of thoſe Soldiers that ſtood by me, better apparelled than he was wont to be, asked him where he had gotten that Garment? who confeſſing that he had taken it in the ſpoil of the City, I caus'd him to be well-cudgel'd, and threatned a worſe puniſhment to all thoſe that F would not reſtore what they had taken away. By which means, recovering a great part of the prey together, I gave every Citizen that which belong'd to him.

In this place I cannot forbear to reprehend Juſtus, and others, for foul dealing. For having ſpoken of this buſineſs in their Hiſtories, they are not aſham'd to gratifie their paſſion and hatred by delivering it to Poſterity otherwiſe than indeed it was. In which they differ nothing from Counterfeiters of Evidences, and Razers of Records, but that theſe Men are more encourag'd by impunity. For Juſtus, to the end he might ſeem to employ his time well, undertaking to ſet down the events of this War, hath belyed me in many things, and hath been no leſs guilty of falſities in matters relating to his own Countrey.
For which cauſe I am neceſſarily enforced in this place to diſcover that G which hitherto I have concealed, and to reprove that which he hath falſely teſtified of me: neither is it to be wondered at, that I have ſo long deferred it.

A Reproof of Juſtus the Hiſtoriographer, that falſely accuſed Joſeph.

For whoſoever writes a Hiſtory, though oblig'd to ſpeak the Truth; yet is not bound H to inveigh againſt the wickeder ſort too vehemently; not for that they are worthy of this favour, but that he may keep himſelf within the bounds of prudence and moderation.

Tell me therefore Juſtus (for thou deſireſt to be held for the man of greateſt credit amongſt all other Hiſtorians) tell me, I pray thee, in familiarity (for I muſt ſo talk with thee as if thou wert preſent before me) how I and the Galileans were the Authors of that Rebellion, which thy Countrey began both againſt the Romans, and their King. For before I was choſen Governor of Galilee by the People of Jeruſalem, both thou and all the Tiberians were not only up in Arms, but had already made War againſt thoſe of Decapolis in Syria.
Thy ſelf hadſt burnt their Villages, and one of thy Servants dyed in that encounter. Yet I not I alone witneſs this, but it is extant alſo in writing in the Records of the Emperor Veſpaſian, how the Inhabitants of Decapolis ſupplicated Veſpaſian then in the City of Ptolemais, that thou mighteſt be puniſhed, as the Author of their miſchiefs: and aſſuredly thou hadſt been puniſhed by the Emperor, had not Agrippa, who received Commiſſion to execute thee, upon the inſtant requeſt of his Siſter Bernice, ſpared thy life, and kept thee bound in Priſon for a long time. But the ſequel of thy actions ſufficiently ſhews what the reſt of thy life hath been, and how thou didſt cauſe thy Countrey to rebel againſt the Romans: whereof I will produce hereafter moſt evident Arguments, and for thy cauſe will I urge ſomewhat againſt thoſe other Tiberians, and will make it plain to ſuch as ſhall read theſe Hiſtories, that thou haſt been no friend to Rome, nor faithful to thy King. And I firſt inſtance in the greateſt K Cities of Galilee, Sephoris and Tiberias, in which thou Juſtus wert born. The former is ſcituate in the heart of Galilee, having round about it a number of Villages, and being eaſily able to make a revolt at pleaſure; yet notwithſtanding the Citizens thereof reſolved to obſerve their faith to the Romans, and would not receive me, nor take Arms for the Jews.
And through the fear they had of me, the Inhabitants ſurpriz'd me by their artifices, and oblig'd me to encompaſs their City with a wall: and that done, they willingly entertained a Gariſon which was ſent them from Ceſtius Gallus, who was General of the Roman Legions in Syria, and deny'd me entrance, becauſe at that time he had a great power, and terrifi'd the Countrey round about. Yea, when our great City of Jeruſalem was beſieged, and the Temple common to all our Nation, was in danger to fall into the Enemies hands, the Sephorites L ſent no ſuccors, to the end it might not be ſaid that they took Arms againſt the Romans: But thy Countrey, Juſtus, being ſcituate upon the Lake of Genazareth diſtant from Hippos thirty ſtades, from Gadara ſixty, from Scythopolis ſixſcore, in a Countrey obedient to the King, having not any City of the Jews round about it, might have very eaſily kept their faith to the Romans, if they had pleas'd. For both the City and People were furniſhed with Munition in all abundance. But as thou ſayeſt, I was the cauſe at that time. And who afterwards?
For thou knoweſt that before the ſiege of Jeruſalem, I was in the Romans hands; and that Jotapata was taken by force, and divers other Caſtles; and that a great number of Galileans had been loſt in divers Battels. At that time ſhouldeſt thou have delivered thy ſelf of that fear thou hadſt of me, laying thine arms aſide, and preſenting thy ſelf to the M King and the Romans, if thou tookeſt Arms not of thine own accord, but enforced. But the truth is, you expected Veſpaſian's coming, even until ſuch time as he begirt your City with a ſiege, and then laid you your Arms aſide for fear of danger: yea, even then had your City been overthrown, except the King in excuſe of your folly, had obtained your pardon at Veſpaſian's hands. It was not therefore my fault, but your own, that you behaved your ſelves like Enemies to the Roman Empire. Do not you remember how often I obtained the victory againſt you, and how ſeldom you could complain of Bloodſhed? But you falling at diſſention one with another, became the inſtruments of your own ruine; and not for the love you bare either to the King, or the Romans, but of your own malice you ſlew an hundred eighty five Citizens, at ſuch time as I was beſieged by the Romans in Jotapata. Nay more, is it not true, N that during the ſaid ſiege of Jeruſalem, there were more than two thouſand Tiberians ſlain, or taken Priſoners? But perhaps thou wilt alledge, that at that time thou wert no Enemy, becauſe thou wert fled to the King: but I tell thee that thou fleddeſt thither for the fear thou hadſt of me. I am a wicked man, as thou ſayeſt: but what art thou? whom King Agrippa delivered from puniſhment, at ſuch time as thou wert condemned by Veſpaſian to loſe thy head; whom he made Priſoner twice, and as many times paſt the ſentence of Baniſhment againſt, and once commanded to be thine own Murtherer, ſpar'd thy life upon the importunate ſollicitation of his ſiſter Bernice. And after ſo many Crimes committed by thee, having entertained thee for his Secretary, when he found thy corruption in that office, he baniſhed thee from his preſence. O Tiberias Juſtus Countrey. Sephoris and Tiberias two chief Cities of Galilee.

Juſtus condemned to death.

A But I will ſay no more of theſe matters; notwithſtanding I wonder at thine impudence, that haſt openly proteſted, that thou haſt written more exactly and perfectly of this matter, than any man; whereas thou art utterly ignorant of thoſe things that were done in Galilee. For at that time thou wert at Berytum with the King, and kneweſt not what the Romans ſuffer'd at the ſiege of Jotapata, ſeeing thou didſt not follow us. Neither couldſt thou be able to learn how I behaved my ſelf therein, for that there was not one of thoſe that helpt me to defend it left alive to give thee certain intelligence. Thou wilt perhaps ſay, that thou haſt carefully deſcribed that which hapned during the ſiege of Jeruſalem. And how is this poſſible? For thou wert neither agent nor ſpectator in that War; neither haſt thou read the Commentaries of Veſpaſian: Which I clearly affirm, becauſe thou haſt written clean contrary to that which is contained therein. B And if thou art ſo confident, that thy Hiſtory is truer than others, why didſt thou not publiſh it during the lives of Veſpaſian and Titus, who were the Generals of that War; or during the life of King Agrippa, and his Relations who were all of them very expert in the Greek tongue? For thou haſt kept it written by thee above twenty years, and mighteſt have produced witneſs of thine exact diligence before them, who were privy to all things. But now when they are dead, and thou thinkeſt that no man liveth that may reprove thee, thou haſt taken the boldneſs to publiſh thy Work. I have uſed no ſuch policy in my Books, but preſented them to the Emperors themſelves, who were eye-witneſſes and actors thereof. For I knew in mine own ſoul that I had ſet down all things truly: Whereupon I obtained my expected approbation. Moreover, I communicated the ſame Hiſtory with divers others, whereof C ſome of them were preſent in the War, as was King Agrippa, and ſome of his kindred. And Titus the Emperor himſelf was ſo deſirous that poſterity ſhould learn the truth of that Hiſtory out of theſe Books, that he placed them in his Library, and cauſed them to be publiſhed, being ſubſcribed with his own hand. "As for King Agrippa, he ſent me ſeventy two Epiſtles, "teſtifying the truth of my Books, whereof two are ſubjoin'd, to the end that the truth may "appear thereby. King Agrippa to his dear friend Joſeph, Health: I have with great "contentment read the Book, wherein thou ſeemeſt in my opinion to have handled this matter "more exactly, than any other. For which cauſe I pray thee ſend me the reſt. Farewel my "friend. King Agrippa to Joſeph his dear friend, Health: I perceive by thy writings that "thou needeſt no information from me, how matters paſſed from the beginning: yet when we D "meet next, I will between me and thee tell thee certain things which thou knoweſt not. Thus was he a witneſs of the truth of my Hiſtory: not flattering me, for it became him not; neither deriding me, for far was it from ſo noble a mind to be ſubject to ſo ſervile a folly: but onely to this end, that the truth of my writings might be commended to the Reader by his teſtimony. And thus much have I thought good to ſet down by way of anſwer to Juſtus.

Juſtus knew nothing of the Wars of the Jews.

Juſtus publiſhe his Book when Titus and Veſpaſian were dead.

Manifeſt Teſtimonies of the truth of Joſephus Hiſtory.

The firſt Epiſtle.

The ſecond Epiſtle.

Now as ſoon as I had pacified theſe troubles in Tiberias, and had eſtabliſhed a council of ſuch as were well affected towards me, I bethought my ſelf of what concerned me to do in reſpect of John. All they of Galilee were of the opinion, that I ſhould gather together all the forces of my Government and march againſt John, and do juſtice upon E him, as he that had been the Author of all this miſchief. But for mine own part, I miſliked their counſels, becauſe my deſire was to extinguiſh theſe Troubles without blood-ſhed; and for that cauſe I injoyn'd them with all diligence poſſible, to learn the names of all thoſe who ſerved under him: which being done, I publiſhed a Proclamation, by which I promiſed ſafety and pardon to all thoſe, that ſhould forſake John, aſſigning them the term of twenty daies, to determine of that which ſeemed beſt for their own ſecurity: and I threatned to ſet fire on their houſes, and confiſcate their goods, except they quitted their Arms. They hearing theſe things, were greatly troubled, and forſook John; and after they had laid down their Arms, they came unto me to the number of four thouſand: ſo that only about fifteen hundred Men remained F with John, either of Citizens, or ſtrangers of Tyre. When John perceived that he was circumvented by this policy, he ever after remained quiet in his Countrey in great fear.

At that time the Sephorites grew ſo bold, that they took Arms in confidence of the ſtrength of their walls, and for that they ſaw me diſtracted with other buſineſs. They ſent to Ceſtius Gallus Governour of Syria, praying him to repair to them with all expedition, and take poſſeſſion of their City, or ſend them a Garriſon at leaſt. Gallus promiſed to come to them, but he ſet down no certain time of his approach. Whereof when I was advertiſed, I took the Men of War I had, and marched againſt the Sephorites, and took their City by force. The Galileans very glad of this opportunity, and ſuppoſing the time was come wherein they might ſatisfy the inſatiable hatred G they bare againſt that City, omitted nothing that might wholly ruine the City, with all the Inhabitants. They ſet fire on the houſes which they found deſolate: for the Inhabitants were fled away for fear, and retired into a Fortreſs. They plundred the

Sephoris ſpoiled.

Town, and left nothing unſpoiled; neither was there any kind of miſery which they H inflicted not on their Countrymen. Which when I ſaw, I was much grieved, and commanded them to give over; telling them it was impiety in them, to ſhew themſelves ſo ſavage towards their Countreymen. And ſeeing that neither by any prayer or command I could draw them to obedience, for that their animoſity was ſo violent, I commanded thoſe that were about me, and whom I moſt truſted, to ſpread a rumor that the Romans were entring on the other ſide of the City with a great Army. All which I did, to the end that by this rumor, I might reſtrain the fury of the Galileans, and ſave the City of Sephoris. And this policy took good effect; For when they heard this news they were afraid, and forſook their pillage, to truſt to their heels, becauſe I who was their General did the like. For I made a ſhew, that I believed the rumor to be I true, as well as they: and by this ſtratagem the City Sephoris was ſaved beyond all hope.

Tiberias in danger of ruine.

Tiberias alſo hardly eſcaped from being ſpoiled by the Galileans, through this occaſion which enſueth: The chiefeſt of their Council writ to the King, to deſire him to come and take poſſeſſion of their City. The King promiſed to ſatisfie them very ſhortly, and deliver his Letters to one of his chamber, called Criſpus a Jew born, to carry the ſame to the Tiberians. The Galileans took this meſſenger on the way, and brought him unto me: which when the common people underſtood, of meer ſpleen they fell to Arms, and the next day divers of them aſſembled themſelves from all parts, and came to the City of Aſoch where I made my abode, and made great exclamations, calling the Tiberians traitors, and the Kings friends, and demanding of me K liberty to repair to Tiberias, and raze it to the ground, being as much diſpleaſed againſt the Tiberians, as they were againſt the Sephorites.

Joſeph conſulteth with himſelf.

The Galileans wrath pacified, conceived againſt the Tiberians.

Which when I heard, I ſtood in great doubt how to deliver the Tiberians from that diſpleaſure, which the Galileans had conceived againſt them: for I could not deny but that the Tiberians had written and ſent for the King: for the anſwer which he made them, did evidently expreſs the ſame. Having along while debated the matter with my ſelf, I ſaid unto them; I know as well as you that the Tiberians have offended; neither will I hinder you from ſpoiling their City, but you muſt proceed to the execution thereof with ſome prudence. For the Tiberians alone do not betray the publick liberty, but others alſo, who are more accounted of in the Countrey of Galilee. Stay L therefore until ſuch time as I am throughly informed, who they be that are Authors of this Treaſon; and then you ſhall have them all under your hands, with all ſuch you paticularly think worthy puniſhment. By this diſcourſe I appeas'd the People, who departed from me contented. As for the meſſenger that was ſent by the King, I cauſed him to be impriſoned, having reſpect to an urgent neceſſity of mine own, which conſtrained me to depart out of the Kingdom within a little while. And calling Criſpus ſecretly unto me, I charged him to make the Soldier drunk, who had the charge of him, to the end that he might in all ſecurity flie back to the King. Thus Tiberias being ready to be deſtroyed the ſecond time, by my government and providence, avoided a great and fatal danger. M

Juſtus deſireth to command Galilee.

At the ſame time Juſtus, the ſon of Piſtus, fled to the King without my knowledge; the cauſe of which flight, I will orderly expreſs. As ſoon as the Romans had begun the War againſt the Jews, the Tiberians concluded to obey the King, and in no ſort to rebel againſt the Romans. But Juſtus perſuaded them to take Arms, thirſting after alteration, and hoping to uſurp the Government of Galilee, and of his own Countrey: but his hope failed him; for the Galileans being enviouſly bent againſt the Tiberians, for thoſe injuries they had ſuffered at their hands before the War, would not allow Juſtus to be their Governor. My ſelf alſo, whom the People of Jeruſalem put in truſt with the Government of Galilee, was oftentimes ſo much moved, that I failed little of killing Juſtus; ſo intolerable was his perfidiouſneſs. He therefore fearing leaſt my diſpleaſure ſhould ſhorten his days, went N to the King, ſuppoſing that he might live more freely and ſecurely with him.

Joſeph aſſailed the walls of Sephoris.

The Sephorites beyond their expectation having eſcaped this firſt danger, writ to Ceſtius Gallus the ſecond time; deſiring him to come to them, to the end he might ſeize their City; or elſe ſend them Forces to withſtand the incurſions of their enemies. And they wrought ſo much, that Gallus ſent them a Body of Horſemen, and after them Footmen, who came by night, and were received into their City. But ſeeing that the Country round about was but in poor eſtate, by reaſon of the Roman Horſemen, I drew my Forces together and came to Garizim, where I encamped ſome twenty ſtades from Sephoris; and by night I approached the ſame, and ſet Ladders to the wall, with which I entred a great number of my Soldiers, and became Maſter of the better part of the City; from O whence notwithſtanding we were afterwards conſtrained to retire, becauſe we knew not all the ways, killing before our departure twelve Roman Footmen and two Horſemen, A men, with ſome Sephorites, with the loſs of one of ours. Afterwards a Fight hapning between us and their Horſemen in open field, we fought for a long time with diſadvantage: For the Romans having invironed me on all ſides, my Reerward, through the fear they conceived, began to retire. In this skirmiſh I loſt one of my Guard, called Juſtus, who in times paſt had ſerved in the very ſame place under the King. After this, the King's Forces both of Horſe and Foot came thither, under the Government of Silas Captain of the Guard, who encamping ſome five ſtades off from Julias, beſet the Highways that lead towards Cana with Men of War, and the Fort of Gamala, to hinder the Inhabitants from receiving any Commodities from the Countrey of Galilee.

Silas Captain of the King's Guard.

As ſoon as I received News hereof, I ſent out two thouſand Soldiers under the com- B mand of Jeremy, who lodging themſelves within a ſtade of Julias, near the River Jordan, offered nothing elſe but light skirmiſhes, until ſuch time as I had gathered three thouſand Soldiers more, and came to them. The next day, having planted an Ambuſh in a certain Trench near the encloſure of their Camp, I touled out the King's Soldiers to skirmiſh, having firſt forewarned my Soldiers to feign a flight, till they had drawn their Enemies as far as the Ambuſh; which they cunningly executed. But Silas ſuppoſing that our Men fled for Cowardice, ſet forward to follow them as faſt as he could: but they that lay in Ambuſh charged him on the back, and diſcomfited his Army: and I preſently turning, and making head againſt them, conſtrained the King's Forces to truſt to their heels; and I ſhould have got a ſignal Victory, had not Fortune croſs'd my C ſucceſs. For the Horſe whereon I rode, falling into a certain Bog, caſt me on the ground: whereby my hand being put out of joint about the wriſt, I was carried to the Borough of Cepharnom. My Soldiers hearing hereof, and fearing leaſt ſome worſe Misfortune had befaln me, than indeed there had, reſtrained themſelves from purſuing the Enemy any further. Having therefore ſent for Phyſitians, and cauſed my ſelf to be dreſſed, I ſtayed there for that day; and being ſeiz'd with a Fever, I was carried by Night to Tarichea, according to the advice of my Phyſitians.

Joseph putteth the King's Soldiers to flight.

Silas and his Soldiers having News of my accident, recovered their courages; and underſtanding that we kept but ſlender watch in our Camp, they laid an Ambuſh by Night on this ſide Jordan, with their Horſemen; and as ſoon as the day appear'd, he in- D vited out our Soldiers to fight, who willingly condeſcended thereunto; and being come into the Plain, they perceiv'd the Men that lay in Ambuſh; by whom they were put to flight, and ſix of our Men were ſlain. But they purſued their Victory no further: For having News that certain Troops were coming from Tarichea to Julias, they were afraid, and returned back.

Joſeph's miſfortune animateth the Enemy.

Not long after, Veſpaſian arrived at Tyre, accompanied with King Agrippa. Againſt whom the Tyrians began to utter many reproaches, telling Veſpaſian, that the King was an Enemy both to the Tyrians and the Romans; and that Philip his General, had betray'd the King's Palace and the Roman Army in Jeruſalem, and that by the King's Commiſſion. Which when Veſpaſian underſtood, he reprov'd this impudent boldneſs of the Tyrians, E for blaming a King of that power, and a Friend to the Romans: and adviſed the King to ſend Philip to Rome, to give account of his actions. But notwithſtanding that Philip was ſent thither, yet he preſented not himſelf before Nero; for finding him extremely buſied with Troubles and Civil Wars, he return'd to the King without doing any thing. When Veſpaſian was arriv'd at Ptolemais, the Inhabitants of Decapolis accuſed Juſtus the Tiberian, for burning their Boroughs. Veſpaſian therefore deliver'd him bound to the King, as being his Subject, that he might be puniſhed. And the King before that time, unwitting to Veſpaſian, kept him Priſoner, as it hath been heretofore declared. The Sephorites alſo reſorted to Veſpaſian to ſalute him, and receiv'd a Gariſon from him, with their Commander Placidus, againſt whom I made War, until ſuch time as Veſpaſian arriv'd in F Galilee: of which arrival I have amply ſpoken in my Books of the Wars of the Jews, how he came, how he fought againſt me, the firſt time near the City of Tarichea; how I departed from thence to Jotapata; how I fell into the hands of the Romans; how I was afterwards ſet at liberty; and, in a word, all my actions and fortunes during the Wars of the Jews, and the ſiege of the City of Jeruſalem. But now it ſeemeth neceſſary that I deſcribe other things exploited by me during my life-time in other places, than in the Wars of the Jews. After the ſiege of Jotapata was ended, I was Priſoner with the Romans, and kept very carefully: notwithſtanding Veſpaſian did me much honour. For by his commandment I married a Virgin, that was one of thoſe that had been taken captive in Cæſarea. But ſhe remain'd not long with me: for after I was ſet at liberty, and G that I follow'd Veſpaſian to Alexandria, ſhe left me. After which, I married another Wife in Alexandria, from whence I was ſent to Titus to the ſiege of Jeruſalem, where I was oftentimes in danger of death. For the Jews labour'd what they could to deſtroy me:

Veſpaſian and Agrippa arrive at Tyre.

Of Veſpaſian's arrival, and the ſiege of Jotapata, read Joſephus l. 4. c. 5. of the Wars of the Jews.

me: and the Romans ſuppoſing that as often as the lot of Arms was not favourable to H them, it was by my Treaſon, cryed out continually to the Emperor to execute me for a Traytor. But Titus well-experienc'd in the Chances of War, pacified the violence which his Soldiers intended againſt me, by his ſilence. And after the City of Jeruſalem was taken, Titus often ſollicited me to take what I lik'd among the Ruines of Jeruſalem, promiſing to give it me. But I making ſmall account of any thing after the Ruine of my Countrey, pray'd him onely to give me the liberty of ſome perſons, and the Sacred Bible, which I receiv'd for a great conſolation in my miſeries. All which he graciouſly granted me. Not long after, having beg'd my Brother, and fifty other of my Friends, they were given me; and I was refuſed in nothing. Entring into the Temple by Titus's permiſſion, I found a great number of Priſoners ſhut up therein; and all thoſe Women I and Children of my Friends and Familiars, whom I knew, I deliver'd, to the number of 190, without paying any Ranſom: and I reſtor'd them to their former free condition. Being ſent with Cerealis and a thouſand Horſe into the City of Tecoa by the Emperor Titus, to ſee if the place were fit for a Camp; in returning from thence, I ſaw divers Priſoners Crucifi'd, amongſt which, were three of my Familiars; whereat I was griev'd in my Soul, and I came and ſignifi'd the ſame to Titus with tears: who incontinently commanded that they ſhould be taken down, and as carefully dreſt and cured as might be: two of which dyed, notwithſtanding the utmoſt diligence of the Phyſitians, and the third ſurviv'd.

Joſeph repaireth with Titus to Rome, and is honorably entertained by Veſpaſian.

Joſeph envied and ſlandered.

Joſeph's third Wife.

The perpetual favor of the Cæſars towards Joſeph.

After Titus had appeas'd the Troubles of Judea, conceiving with himſelf that the K poſſeſſions which I had about Jeruſalem, would yield me but little profit, by reaſon of the Roman Gariſon that ſhould be placed there, he gave me Lands a greater diſtance: and intending to embark himſelf for Rome, he took me with him in his own ſhip, and did me great honour. As ſoon as we came to Rome, Veſpaſian had great care of me; for he lodg'd me in his own houſe, where he liv'd before he was Emperor, and honour'd me with the title of a Citizen of Rome, and gave me an annual Penſion; and as long as he lived, continued his good affection towards me, omitting no kind of bounty which he might uſe towards me. Whereupon I was ſo much envied, that I came in danger thereby to loſe my life. For a certain Jew called Jonathan, having ſtirred up a ſedition in Cyrene, and gathered about him ſome two thouſand Inhabitants of the Countrey, who L were all ſeverely puniſht; and himſelf being ſent bound by the Governor of that Countrey, to the Emperor, he accus'd me that I had ſent him Arms and Money. But Veſpaſian knew his falſhood, and cauſed his head to be cut off. After this, my Enemies objected divers Crimes againſt me, in regard that I was in good Reputation: but God deliver'd me from them all. Moreover, I received in gift from Veſpaſian, an ample poſſeſſion in Judæa; and about the ſame time I forſook my Wife, becauſe her manners pleaſed me not, although ſhe was the Mother of my three Children, of whom two are deceaſed, and the third, called Hircanus, is yet alive. After this, I married a Wife that was born in Candy, by Nation a Jew, and by Birth Noble, and one of the greateſt Reputation amongſt the Inhabitants, endow'd with as laudable manners, as any other Woman M whatſoever. By her I had two Sons, Juſtus, who was the eldeſt, and Simon, who was alſo ſirnamed Agrippa. Thus far touching my domeſtical affairs. To which I muſt add, that I have always continu'd to be honour'd with the good-will of the Emperors. For after Veſpaſian's death, Titus, who ſucceeded him in the Empire, continued the ſame favor which his Father had ſhew'd me. For although I was oftentimes accuſed, yet were not my Adverſaries believ'd. Domitian, who ſucceeded him, augmented my Honors. For he puniſh'd thoſe Jews that accuſed me, and gave order that the Eunuch and ſlave whom I kept to teach my Son, and by whom I was accus'd, ſhould be puniſhed. He granted me exemption alſo from all the Tributes of Judæa, which is one of the greateſt Honors that a Man can receive. And as for Domitia the Emperor's Wife, ſhe always continued N her good affection towards me. Behold here the ſhort Recital of my whole Life: whereby let each Man conjecture of my Manners. As for you, O thrice excellent Epaphroditus, after I have dedicated to you the Continuation of my Antiquities, I will forbear to ſay more thereof.

THE HISTORY OF THE

The Preface of Joſephus.

THey who apply themſelves to write Hiſtory, have not all one and the ſame intent and motive, but oftentimes very different cauſes of their labours.
For ſome are led to this ſtudy, by a deſire to ſhew their Eloquence, and to gain Reputation: Others do it, to oblige the perſons whoſe actions they relate; and they ſtrive to the uttermoſt to pleaſe them. Others engage upon it, becauſe having born a part in the Events which they deſcribe, they are willing that the Publick ſhould have knowledge of the ſame. Laſtly, D others employ themſelves this way, for that they cannot ſuffer that things worthy to be known by all the world, ſhould remain buried in ſilence. Now of theſe forenamed cauſes, the two laſt are theſe that incited me to write. For on the one ſide, in regard I was an Actor in the War againſt the Romans, and a Witneſs of the Actions which paſs'd therein, and alſo know what were the ſeveral Events thereof, I conceiv'd my ſelf oblig'd, and, in a manner, forc'd to write the Hiſtory of the ſame, to the end to manifeſt the unfaithfulneſs of thoſe, who having written concerning this Subject before me, have diſguis'd and perverted the Truth. And on the other ſide, I have reaſon to believe that the Greeks will be well pleas'd with this Work, becauſe it will afford them an Account of the Antiquity of our Nation, and the Form of our Commonwealth, Tranſlated out of Hebrew into their own Tongue. When I began the Hiſtory of the E foreſaid War, I purpoſed to lay open to the World, How and whence the Jews had their firſt original;
What alterations in Fortune they had fall'n into; By what Lawmaker they had been inſtructed in Piety, and incited to the exerciſe of Virtue; What Wars they ſuſtained through ſeveral Ages; and finally, How, againſt their will, they became engaged in this laſt againſt the Romans. But for that this Subject was too ample and copious, to be treated only in paſſing, I thought fit to make a ſeparate Work after it, and accordingly ſet upon this Treatiſe. Afterwards (as it uſually hapneth to thoſe that attempt matters of great difficulty) I fell into a certain ſlothfulneſs, which made me very backward to reſolve upon the Tranſlation of ſo long a Hiſtory, into a Foreign Language. Yet ſome there were, who inflamed with a deſire of knowledge, animated me to this action; and eſpecially Epaphroditus, a man enamor'd of all Learning, F and particularly Hiſtory; which is not to be wonder'd at, ſince himſelf hath had very conſiderable Employments, and experienc'd ſeveral Accidents of Fortune; in all which he hath ſhewed a marvellous magnanimity of courage, with an unmoveable reſolution to follow Virtue. Being thus perſuaded by him, who is accuſtomed to encourage thoſe whom he perceives diſpos'd to perform things profitable and honeſt; and (which is more) being aſhamed in my ſelf, that I ſhould rather take delight to follow idleneſs, than addict my ſelf to ſo laudable an exerciſe; I reſum'd my Work, and with ſo much the greater cheerfulneſs, when I conſider'd with my ſelf, that our Anceſtors never made any difficulty to communicate matters of this nature to ſtrangers; and that the moſt famous among the Greeks, have been curious to underſtand what paſſes amongſt us. For Ptolomy King of Egypt, the ſecond of the Name (highly affectioned G to good Letters, and deſirous to ſtore and gather Books at incredible charge) caus'd our Laws and Cuſtoms, and manners of living, to be Tranſlated into the Greek Tongue. And our High Prieſt Eleazar (who was not ſecond in virtue to any other whatſoever) thought not fit to deny this ſatisfaction to that Prince, as he would without doubt have done, had it not been the H ordinary courſe of our Anceſtors, not to conceal from other men, ſuch things as are good and laudable. For which cauſe I have held it a matter no ways undecent for me, to follow the goodneſs and generoſity of that worthy High Prieſt; and the rather, for that even at this day I ſuppoſe many are no leſs well affected to good Letters, than that great King. Yet the Copy of all the Holy Scripture was not given him; but thoſe Tranſlators who were ſent unto him to Alexandria, did only communicate that unto him which belongs to our Law. But the things that are found written in the Sacred Books of Holy Scripture, are innumerable; being the Hiſtory of five thouſand years: in which divers extraordinary Events and Revolutions, ſundry great Wars, and many glorious Actions done by excellent Captains are deſcribed. In ſum, if any one have a deſire to read this Hiſtory, he ſhall principally learn and obſerve, That all things fall out I happily, and beyond their expectation, to thoſe men who obſerve the Will of God, and are afraid to tranſgreſs his Commandments; and that God hath prepared for ſuch the crown and reward of Felicity: as on the contrary, that they who depart from the diligent obſervance thereof, inſtead of ſucceeding in their deſigns, (how juſt ſoever the ſame may ſeem to themſelves) fall into all ſort of misfortunes, and into miſeries without recovery. For which cauſe I exhort all thoſe that ſhall read theſe Books, to conform themſelves to the Will of God, and to obſerve in Moſes our excellent Law-giver, how worthily he hath ſpoken of his Divine Nature; how he hath manifeſted that all his Works are proportionable to his infinite Greatneſs; and how his whole Narration thereof is pure and free from the vanity of Fables, wherewith all other Hiſtories are poyſoned. For the Antiquity alone of his Hiſtory ſecures him from the ſuſpition K that one might entertain of his having mingled any thing of fabulous in his writings; inaſmuch as he was born more than two thouſand years ago, which is a continuance of Ages, to which the Poets neither durſt refer the original of their gods; neither the deeds or laws of men, whereof they make mention. But in purſuit of our Hiſtory, the ſequel of our Diſcourſe ſhall declare all things exactly, and in the order which is obſerv'd in the Sacred Books. For in compiling this Work, I have promiſed neither to add, nor to pretermit any thing: And for that all whatſoever we ſhall declare, doth almoſt wholly depend on the knowledge which the wiſdom of our Lawmaker Moſes hath given us thereof; it is neceſſary before all other things, that I ſpeak ſomewhat of himſelf; leſt perhaps any man ſhould wonder, that in a Hiſtory wherein it may ſeem that I ought to relate nothing but Actions paſs'd, and Precepts concerning manners, nevertheleſs L I intermix ſo many things which concern the knowledge of Nature. We ought therefore to know, that Moſes thought it moſt eſpecially neceſſary, for him that will either virtuouſly diſpoſe his own life, or impoſe Laws to other men, to begin with the knowledge of God; and after having attentively conſider'd all his Works, to ſtrive as much as in him lieth, to imitate his moſt perfect example, and follow him with all diligence. For it is impoſſible, that a Lawgiver being void of this contemplation, ſhould have good ſenſe; or that his writings ſhould be of any moment to induce them unto virtue, who ſhould receive thoſe Laws, except before all things they learn, that God who is the Father, and Lord of all, and that ſeeth all, giveth happy life unto thoſe that follow him; and contrariwiſe invironeth them with great calamities, who forſake the way of virtue and righteouſneſs. Moſes therefore intending to inſtruct his Citizens in M this doctrine, began not his Ordinances with the Treatiſe of Contracts and Covenants, which we practiſe one with another, as other Lawgivers are accuſtomed to do, but he hath raiſed their minds to the knowledge of God, taught them in what manner this World was made by him, and ſhew'd them that the principal work among all thoſe things which God made in the World, is Man. And after that he had made them capable of things concerning Piety, then might he more eaſily perſuade them in the reſt. Whereas other Lawgivers, addicting themſelves unto Fables, have in their diſcourſe impoſed on their gods the infamy of ſins committed by men, and by that means have brought to paſs, that the wicked ſort are yet more wicked, and addicted to evil doing.

But our admirable Lawgiver, after having declared that God is in himſelf all virtue pure and unſpotted, he ſhews that men alſo ought to endeavor to imitate the ſame; and on thoſe N that neither conceive nor believe thoſe things, he inflicteth a grievous and inevitable puniſhment.
I exhort the Reader therefore to examine our Writings according to theſe Rules: for to thoſe that conſider after this manner, nothing ſhall ſeem either abſurd or unworthy the Majeſty of God, or of his love to men; by reaſon that all things have their diſpoſition conformable to the univerſal nature, which our Lawgiver hath declared ſometimes obſcurely, ſometimes in convenient Allegories gravely; and elſewhere expreſſing that manifeſtly, and publiſhing that in plain words, which ought openly to be made known. The cauſes whereof, if any man would ſearch, he might find need of a moſt deep and philoſophical contemplation; which I overſlip at this preſent, without ſtaying longer thereon: but if God ſhall give me time, I will inforce my ſelf to compoſe it in a Volume, as ſoon as I ſhall have finiſhed this Work. For this preſent then I O will apply my ſelf, to relate thoſe things which have been done, beginning at the Creation of the World, according as Moſes hath taught us, and I have found written in the Holy Scriptures.

IN the Beginning God created Heaven and Earth. Now the Earth, not being ſubject to ſight, but covered with thick darkneſs, and traverſed with an Air coming from

After this, on the ſecond Day, God created the Heaven, and placed it above all the World, having ſeparated it from other things; and making it firm by the means of a Criſtalline matter, he endowed it with a quality moiſt and F rainy, to the end the ſame might render the Earth fruitful. The third Day, he firmly eſtabliſhed the Earth, ſpreading the Sea round about the ſame; and the ſame Day, he with a word cauſed all Plants and Seeds to ſpring upon the face of the Earth. The fourth Day, he embelliſhed the Heavens, with the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, ordaining them their motions and courſes, by which the ſeaſons orderly enſuing might be diſtinguiſht. In the fifth Day, he made all kind of living Creatures which dwell upon the face of the Earth, as well thoſe that ſwim in the deep Waters, as thoſe that flie in the Air; uniting them together by couples and pairs, to the end that each, in their kind, might increaſe and multiply. The ſixth Day, he made all Four-footed Beaſts, and diſtinguiſht them into Male and Female: and in the ſame Day, he formed Man. So that Moſes ſaith, That the

After the ſeventh day, Moſes deſcribes more particularly the original of Man, and the manner of his Creation, in theſe terms; God framed Man of the duſt of the earth, and breath'd into him a Spirit and Soul; which Man was called Adam, an Hebrew word, ſignifying red, becauſe he was made of earth, which was red or yellow; for the natural earth, called Virgin-earth, is of that colour. Then brought God all kind of living Creatures before Adam, ſhewing him as well the male as the female; on whom Adam beſtowed thoſe names, which to this preſent time they retain. And ſeeing that Adam had no female to accompany and live with him (for as yet there was no Woman) and for that he thought it ſtrange that all other living Creatures had their companions: God took one of his ribs from him at ſuch time as he ſlept, and of the ſame he form'd a Woman; who being brought before Adam, he did acknowledge that ſhe was made for him. Now in Hebrew a Woman is called Iſha, but this was called Eva, which is as much as to ſay, The Mother of all Living. He declareth alſo, that God planted in the Eaſt a Garden, flouriſhing and adorned with all ſorts of Plants, amongſt which was the Tree of Life. and another the Tree of Knowledge, by which was known both good and evil. And after he had brought Adam and his Wife into this Garden, he commanded them to keep and cheriſh the Plants. Now this Garden was watered by a River that invironed it round about, and divided it ſelf into four Channels or Rivers. The firſt called Phiſon (which name ſignifieth abundance or multitude) floweth by the Land of India, and entreth into the great Sea, and is by the Greeks called Ganges. The ſecond called Euphrates, and in Hebrew Phora (that is to ſay, diſperſion or flower.) And the third called Tigris or Diglath (which ſignifieth ſtrait and ſwift) fall into the Red Sea. Gehon, which is the fourth, runneth through the Countrey of Egypt, and ſignifieth as much as coming from the Eaſt: the Greeks call it Nilus.

Now God commanded Adam and his Wife to eat of the fruits of all other Plants, but to abſtain from that of Knowledge, telling them, that at what time ſoever they ſhould taſte of the ſame, they ſhould die the death. Now at that time, all living Creatures were at accord one with another; but the Serpent, who was very tame towards Adam and his Wife, became inflamed with envy, for that he ſaw they ſhould be happy, if they continued in the obſervation of God's Commandments: and that contrariwiſe, they ſhould caſt themſelves headlong into ruine and deſtruction, if they ſhould diſobey the ſame. He therefore maliciouſly perſuaded the Woman to taſte the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, giving her to underſtand, that the knowledge of good and evil was in the ſame; and that as ſoon as they had taſted thereof, they ſhould lead a life no leſs happy than God himſelf: and by this means he cauſed the Woman to fall, who had no regard of the ordinance of God. For having her ſelf taſted of this fruit, and finding it pleaſant and delicious in taſte, ſhe perſuaded her Husband alſo to taſte the ſame: whereupon they underſtood that they were naked, and ſought means to cover themſelves: (for this fruit had in it ſelf the virtue to give underſtanding, and to quicken the mind.) Then covered they themſelves with Fig-leaves; which they put before their Privities, eſteeming themſelves more happy than they were before, in that they now knew that which before they were ignorant of. But when God came into the Garden, Adam (who before was accuſtomed familiarly to talk with him) finding himſelf guilty of ſin, hid himſelf from his preſence: but God asked him for what cauſe he fled and ſhunned him at that time, whereas before he had taken pleaſure to talk familiarly with him? Adam knowing that he had tranſgreſſed the Ordinances and Commandments of God, anſwer'd him not a word, but God ſpake unto him after this manner: I had provided for you the means whereby you might have led your life without any evil, or ſenſe of miſery; ſo that all whatſoever was requiſite for neceſſity or pleaſure, might have hapned of it ſelf unto you, by my only providence, without any travel or care on your parts; which if you had well uſed, your life would have been very lovely and very happy: but you have ſcorned this mine Ordinance, and broken my Commandments. For in that thou art ſilent at this time, it proceedeth not of reſpect, but of evil; of which thou findeſt thy ſelf culpable. Adam excuſeth his ſin as well as he could, and prayed God not to be incenſed againſt him, laying the fault of that which had hapned, upon his Wife, alledging that he had offended, by reaſon he was deceived by her: and the Woman accuſed the Serpent. But God for his puniſhment, becauſe he had ſuffer'd himſelf to be overcome by the counſel of a Woman, declared that the earth thenceforward never more of its own accord ſhould bring forth fruit, but only when they till'd it with the ſweat of their countenance: nor ſhould it always yield all that was expected from it. And as touching Eve, he chaſtiſed her with Child-bearing, and throes in Travel; for that being her ſelf deceived by the Serpent, ſhe had drawn her Husband by the ſame means into extreme miſery. He took alſo from the Serpent his ſpeech, and was diſpleaſed with him, *by reaſon of the malice he had conceived againſt Adam; and he put venom on his tongue, declaring him an enemy both to Man and Woman; whom Cain the Father of hypocrits and evil Men.

So it was, that during the life of Adam himſelf, the ſucceſſors of Cain were moſt H wicked, teaching and imitating one anothers wickedneſs, the laſt of them proving always the worſt; ſo that they were ſtrangely inflamed to follow War and Theft: and if perhaps ſome of them were more remiſs than others in committing Murthers, and outrages; yet were they rapacious enough to ſpoil and poſſeſs the goods and heritages of other Men. But Adam the firſt Man made of Earth (for the Hiſtory requireth that I ſhould return to ſpeak of him) after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, earneſtly deſired to have Children; and accordingly he had many, being about the age of two hundred and thirty years: beſides which, after he had lived ſome ſeven hundred more, at laſt he died; amongſt whoſe Children was Seth. Now for that it were too long to ſpeak of all of them, I will onely touch that which concerneth I Seth: He being nouriſhed and trained by his Father to the years of diſcretion, ſtudied virtue, and left his deſcendants Heirs and followers of his ſanctity: who being all of them well born, remained in the World free from all contention, and lived happily: ſo that it never hapned that any of them in any ſort did injury to any Man. To theſe we owe the ſcience of Aſtronomy, and all that which concerneth the Beauty and Order of the Heavens. And to the end that their inventions might not wear out of the memories of Men, nor periſh before they were perfectly known, (inſomuch as Adam had foretold them of the general deſtruction of all things after two ſorts, the one by the force of fire, and the other by the violence and abundance of Waters) they made two pillars; the one of Brick, and the other of Stone; and ingraved K in each of them ſuch things as they had invented; to the end if that of Brick ſhould be aboliſhed by the overflowings and rage of Waters, that other of Stone might remain, and declare unto Men that which was imprinted thereon for their inſtructions.
That of Brick was deſtroyed by the deluge, but the other of Stone is to be ſeen in the Countrey of Syna even to this preſent day.

IN this manner Mankind liv'd for ſeven Generations, honouring one God the Lord L of all things, and having always a reſpect of virtue. But afterwards in proceſs of time, they degenerated from the ancient inſtitutions of their fore-fathers, neither obſerving humane Laws, nor continuing their accuſtomed ſervice of God; and they that before induſtrouſly exierciſed themſelves in virtue, afterward with twice as zealous ſtudy followed wickedneſs; and grew at laſt to that height of impiety, that they provoked Gods heavy diſpleaſure againſt them. For the Angels of God marrying with the Daughters of Seth's deſcendants, produc'd a race of inſolent People, contemners of all good, by reaſon of the truſt they had in their Forces; and for their heinous actions not unlike the Giants which the Greeks mention in their Fables. But Noah perplexed and extremely M diſpleaſed with ſuch their miſdemeanors, exhorted them to change their lives, and amend their miſdeeds: and (ſeeing them moved by no admonitions, but wholly poſſeſſed with the pleaſure which they took in vices) he fearing leſt they ſhould kill him and his Family, left them to their looſneſs, and with his Wife, Children, and all his Family, departed into another Countrey. Then God (who lov'd him for his juſtice) became ſo provoked with the malice and corruption of the reſt of Mankind, that he reſolved to deſtroy all Creatures whatſoever in the World, and to produce another new race innocent, and repurged from all impiety: He abridged alſo the time of their life, ſo that they lived not any more ſo long as they were wont, but onely attained the term of ſixſcore years; and he covered the Land with Waters, by which means all of them N were deſtroyed; onely Noah eſcaped by the means and way which God taught him: He built an Ark of four ſtages; in length three hundred Cubits; in breadth fifty: and in height thirty: into this he entred with his Mother, his Wife, and his Children, and their he cloſed alſo therein all ſorts of living creatures, two and two, male and female, for the conſervation of every kind, and of ſome of them ſeven couples. The ſides of this Ark were ſtrong, and the cover alſo; ſo that no water could pierce the ſame, and whatſoever ſtorm might come, it was able to reſiſt it. Thus was Noah (by lineal deſcent,

A ſix hundredth year of Noah's age (and the ſecond month, which was called Dius by the Macedonians, and by the Hebrews Marſomane) for ſo have the Egyptians diſtinguiſht the year, but Moſes ſets down Niſan for the firſt month in his Chronicles, which is Xanthicus among the Macedonians (for that in this month he brought the Iſraelites out of the thraldom of the Egyptians;) He made this Law therefore, that all things which appertain to divine ſervice, ſhould take their beginning and reckoning from this month: but in reſpect of civil matters, as Fairs and Markets appointed for Traffick, he obſerved the ancient order of the year, beginning in December. Moſes writes that the Deluge began the ſeven and twentieth day of the ſecond month in the year two thouſand two hundred fifty and ſix, after the Creation of the firſt Man Adam (which time is carefully B calculated in Holy Writ, in which the birth and death of great perſonages of that time are moſt exactly ſet down.) At ſuch time then as Adam was 230 years old, his Son Seth was born unto him; and the ſame Adam lived 930 years. Seth about the age of 250 years, begat Enos, who after he had lived 905 years, left the Government of his affairs to his Son Cainan, whom he had begotten about the 190 year of his age. After that Cainan had lived 910 years, he had his Son Malaleel, begotten by him in the 170 year of his age. The ſaid Malaleel having lived 195 years died, leaving his Son Jared: who at the age of 162 years, begat Enoch, who lived 962 years. After Enoch, ſucceeded his Son Methuſala, begotten about the age of 162 years, at ſuch time as the ſaid Enochs Father was yet alive: and after that Enoch had lived 365 years, he was taken C up unto God (whence it cometh to paſs that his deceaſe hath not been mentioned by any writer.) Methuſala the Son of Enoch, in the year of his age 187, had Lamech for his Son, who lived 782 years, and to whom he left the Soveraignty, having held the ſame 969 years. And Lamech after he had governed 707 years, declared his Son Noah Governor, at ſuch time as the ſaid Lamech had lived 182; which Noah liv'd the ſpace of 900 years.

All theſe years calculated into one ſum, make the number of 2256; yet to perfect this account, we ought not to ſeek out the deceaſe of the Perſonages (for they lived in the ſame time that their Children and ſucceſſors did:) but the onely thing we are to obſerve, is their births. Now God having given the ſign, and the rain falling for the ſpace D of forty dayes together, the waters roſe and overflowed the whole earth fourteen Cubits, (ſo that there was no means of flight, or place of refuge for any.) But as ſoon as the rain was ceaſed, the water began to decreaſe by little and little for the ſpace of one hundred and fifty days, till the 27 day of the ſeventh month; when Noah perceiving that the Ark was on ground upon the top of a certain Mountain of the Countrey of Armenia he opened the window, and ſeeing the earth a little diſcover it ſelf round about he conceived ſome better hope, and began to comfort himſelf. Some few dayes after, when the water was ebbed ſomewhat more, he ſent out a Raven (deſiring to know if the reſt of the earth were delivered from the waters, and whether without danger he might go out of the Ark. But the Raven finding the earth ſtill cover'd with water, returned unto E Noah: who the ſeventh day after ſent out a Dove to diſcover the ſtate of the earth, which returned bemired, and bearing in its mouth an Olive branch: whereby Noah perceived that the earth was freed from the Deluge; and having ſtill waited ſeven dayes more, he ſet at liberty all living Creatures that were in the Ark. But as ſoon as himſelf, his Wife, and his Family came forth, he offered ſacrifice unto God, and Feaſted, and reioyced, both he and all his houſhold. The Armenians in their language have called the place where Noah deſcended, Apobaterion (which ſignifieth a deſcent) and in that place, even at this preſent, the Inhabitants of the Countrey ſhew ſome remainers of the Ark. All Hiſtorians, even the Barbarians, have made mention of this Deluge, and of the Ark: amongſt whom is Beroſus the Caldean, who ſetting down the occurrances F of this Deluge, writeth after this manner: Some ſay likewiſe that a certain part of this Ark is ſtill ſeen in Armenia, upon the Mountain of the Cordæans, and that ſome perſons have brought from thence ſome of the Pitch wherewith it was Calked, which the Men of that place are wont to uſe inſtead of a preſervative againſt inchantment. Hierome the Egyptian alſo (who hath written of the Antiquities of the Phœnicians) hath made mention of this matter: as alſo Mnaſeus, with divers others. Nicholas of Damaſcus likewiſe in his Ninety ſixth Book ſpeaketh hereof after this manner: Above the Region of the Mineans there is a great Mountain in Armenia called Baris, in which it is reported that divers retired themſelves for ſafety, during the time of the Deluge, and there eſcaped: and that a certain Man born on an Ark, arrived on the higheſt top of that Mountain; and that certain pieces of that bottom had been kept there a long while. G 'Tis probable this is the Man of whom Moſes the Law giver of the Jews maketh mention. Noah having in this ſort finiſhed his requeſts, God (who loved him for the uprightneſs of his heart) granted him his requeſt, and ſaid he had not been the Author of their deaths who were drowned, but that they themſelves by their own wickedneſs had procured thoſe puniſhments due upon themſelves. For had he deſired that they ſhould be extinguiſhed, he would not have brought them into the World. For better it is, not to grant life, than to deſtroy thoſe to whom it is given. But (ſaid God) through their contempt of my ſervice and graces, they have inforced me to deſtroy them with the rigor of this vengeance: hereafter I will not ſo ſeverely purſue and puniſh their iniquities, K in my diſpleaſure, eſpecially for thy ſake: And if hereafter at any time I ſhall ſend any tempeſt, fear not (how great and hideous ſoever the ſtorms be) for there ſhall be no more Deluge of water upon the earth. In the mean time I command you to keep your hands innocent from murther, and all man-ſlaughter; and to puniſh thoſe that commit wickedneſs. I leave the uſe of all other living Creatures to your ſuſtenance or ſervice; in as much as I have made you Lords over them all, as well thoſe that breathe upon the face of the earth, as thoſe that ſwim in the waters, and ſuch as inhabit and flie in the air: but you ſhall not eat any blood, in as much as therein conſiſteth the ſoul and life of living Creatures. And I declare unto you, that I will forbare to draw the ſhafts of my diſpleaſure againſt Men; And I will give you the Rainbow for a ſign of the L promiſe which I make to you.

Noah lived after the Deluge 350 years; and having ſpent all the reſt of his life in happineſs. he died after he had lived in the world nine hundred and fifty years. Neither is there cauſe why any Man (comparing this our preſent age and the ſhortneſs thereof, with the long life of the Antients) ſhould think that falſe which I have ſaid: neither followeth it, that becauſe our preſent life extendeth not to ſuch a term and continuance of years, therefore they of the former World attained not the age and long life which we publiſh of them. For they being beloved of God, and newly created by him, uſing alſo a kind of nutriment agreeing with their natures, and proper to prolong their lives, it is no abſurd thing to ſuppoſe that their lives were of that continuance, M conſidering that God gave them long life, to the end that they ſhould teach virtue, and ſhould conveniently practice thoſe things which they had invented, the Sciences of Aſtronomy and Geometry: the demonſtrations whereof they never had attained, except they had lived at the leaſt ſix hundred years. For the great year is accompliſhed by that number of years: whereof all they bear me witneſs, who either Greeks or Barbarians, have written antient Hiſtories. For both Manethon (who hath written the Hiſtory of Egypt) and Beroſus, who regiſtred the acts and affairs of the Chaldeans (together with Mochus, Heſtiæus, Hierom of Egypt, who writ thoſe of the Phœnicians) and others, accord with me in that which I have ſaid. Heſiodus alſo, Hecatæus, Hellanicus, and Acuſilas, Ephorus, and Nicolaus do declare, that they of the firſt World lived one thouſand years. Notwithstanding N let every man judge of theſe things, as beſt liketh him.

NOah had three Sons, Sem, Japhet, and Cham, born one hundred years before the Deluge. Theſe firſt deſcended from the Mountains into the Plains, and there made their habitation: which when other Men perceived (who for fear of the Deluge had fled the Plains, and for that cauſe were loth to forſake the Mountains) they gathered courage, and perſuaded themſelves to do the like: and the Plain where they dwelt was called Sennaar. And whereas they were commanded by God, that (by reaſon of the O increaſe and multitude of Men) they ſhould ſend Colonies to inhabit divers Countries of the World (to the end no quarrels might grow betwixt them; but

A contrariwiſe in labouring and tilling a great quantity of ground, they might gather great ſtore of fruits) they were ſo ignorant, that they diſobeyed God, and falling into great calamities, ſuffered the puniſhment of their offence. Now God ſeeing their number continually increaſe, he commanded them again to divide themſelves into Colonies. But they (forgetting that the Goods which they poſſeſſed, proceeded from him, and his bounty, and preſuming that their force was the only cauſe of their abundance) did not obey him, but rather ſuſpected that God ſought to betray them, to the end that being thus divided, he might the more eaſily deſtroy them; Nimrod the Grandſon of Cham one of Noah's Sons, incited them in this ſort to mock and contemn God. He put them in the head that they ſhould not believe that their proſperity proceeded from God, but that they ought to at- B tribute it to their own valor, which furniſh'd them with ſo much riches: ſo that in a little ſpace he reduced their eſtate to a tyranny; ſuppoſing by this onely means that he might make Men revolt againſt God, if he might perſuade them to ſubmit themſelves to his Government; giving them to underſtand, that if God ſhould once more threaten a Deluge, he would protect them againſt him, and to that end build a Tower, to whoſe top the water ſhould not reach, and alſo revenge the death of their Predeceſſors. The ſtupid People gave ear to theſe perſuaſions of Nimrod, ſuppoſing it to be puſillanimity in themſelves, if they ſhould obey God. For which cauſe they began to build the Tower with their uttermoſt induſtry; neither was there any one idle in all that work: yea, ſo great was the number of Labourers, that in a little time the work was raiſed to a height beyond all ex- C pectation. The thickneſs of it was ſo great, that it obſcured the height: and it was built of burnt Brick, and cimented and joined with a bituminous morter, to the end that it might become the ſtronger.

God ſeeing their madneſs, yet condemned them not to a general extermination (by reaſon that they had made no profit by their example, who periſhed in the firſt Deluge) but made them mutiny the one againſt another by changing of their tongue; ſo that by reaſon of their diverſity of language, they could not underſtand one another. The place where this Tower was builded, is at this preſent called Babylon (by reaſon of the confuſion of tongues that firſt began in that place) for Babel in Hebrew ſignifieth confuſion. Of this Tower, and the diverſity of languages, Sibylla makes mention in theſe words: At ſuch D time as men uſed one kind of language, they built a moſt high Tower, as if they meant by the ſame to mount up into Heaven; but the gods rais'd winds, and overthrew the Tower, and ſent amongſt the Builders diſtinct and ſeveral languages; whence it came to paſs, that the City which was afterwards built in the ſame place was called Babylon. But as touching the field of Senaar where Babylon ſtands, Heſtiæus teſtifieth after this manner: It is ſaid of thoſe ſacrificers, who eſcaped from this great diſorder, that they took the Sacred Reliques of Jupiter the Conqueror, and came into Senaar of Babylon.

E FRom that time forward (by reaſon of the diverſity of tongues) the multitude diſperſed themſelves into divers Countries, and planted Colonies in all places, and occupied thoſe places whither either God or their good fortune conducted them; ſo that both the Sea-coaſts, and the Middle-land were repleniſhed with Inhabitants. Some there were alſo, who paſſing the Sea in ſhips and veſſels, firſt peopled the Iſlands. And there are ſome Nations likewiſe, who at this day retain the names which in times paſt were impoſed on them, ſome others have changed them. Others are altered into names more familiar and known to the Neighbors, deriving them from the Greeks the Authors of ſuch Titles. lus gave name likewiſe to the Theobelians, who at this day are called Iberians. Meſchus was H the founder of them that were called Meſchinians, who were ſince named Cappadocians; for they ſhew even at this day a token of their ancient name, to wit, the City of Maſaca, which teſtifieth that this Nation hath been ſo called. Theres gave name to the Therians, who were under his Government, and whom the Greeks called Thracians. All theſe Nations took their original from the ſeven ſons of Japhet. But of the three ſons which Gomar had, Aſchanaxes gave name to the Aſchanaxians (at this day termed Rheginians by the Greeks;) Riphates gave name to the Riphatinians, called at this day Paphlagonians; Tygranes to the Tygraneans, who by the Greeks are called Phrygians. Alſo Javan the ſon of Japhet, had three ſons; of whom Aliſus gave name to the Aliſians, who at this preſent day are the Aetolians, over whom he commanded. Tharſus gave name to the Tharſians, which was the ancient I name of the Cilicians, as appeareth by the name of their Renowned and Metropolitane City Tharſis; Chetim obtained the Iſle of Cherine, called at this day Cyprus, (whence it is that not only all Iſlands, but alſo all places on the Sea-coaſt are by the Hebrews called Cethim) witneſs one of the Cities of Cyprus, which hath had the fortune to preſerve its ancient name; being called Citium, by thoſe that give Greek names to all things, a word not very much varying from Cethim. Theſe Nations were founded by the ſons and young children of Japhet. But I will firſt publiſh one thing which perhaps is unknown to the Greeks, and then proſecute my purpoſed Narration which I have omitted; that is, that theſe names have been changed after the manner of the Greeks, to the end their pronuntiation might be more eaſie and agreeable. But the ſons of Cham poſſeſſed Syria, and all the Region that abutteth on the Mountains of Amanus and Libanus; extending their Empire even as far as the Ocean, and giving names to the ſame. Which names are partly wholly aboliſhed, and partly ſo changed, that they are very hard to be known. There are only the Æthiopians, of whom Chus, one of Cham's four ſons, was Prince, that have always preſerv'd their name; and not only in that very Countrey, but alſo through all Aſia they are call'd Chuſeans to this day. The Meſreans deſcended from Meſré, have alſo preſerv'd their name: for we call Ægypt Meſrée, and the Ægyptians Meſréans. Phut likewiſe eſtabliſht the Colonies of Libya, and called the Inhabitants thereof according to his name, Phutians; and there is a River in the Countrey of Mauritania, which hath the ſame name, of which it is manifeſt that divers L Greek Hiſtories make mention, as alſo of the Countrey near adjoining, which they call the Countrey of Phut, but it hath ſince changed its name by the means of one Libis one of the ſons of Miſraim; (why it is called Africa, I will hereafter ſignifie unto you.) As touching Canaan the fourth ſon of Cham, he dwelt in the Countrey at this day called Judæa, and call'd it the Countrey of Canaan, according to his own name. Chus, who was the eldeſt ſon of Cham, had ſix ſons; Sabas, Prince of the Sabeans; Evilas, Prince of the Evileans, at this day called Getulians; Sabathes, Prince of the Sabatheans, whom the Greeks name Aſtabarians; Sabactes, Prince of the Sabactians; and Romus, Prince of the Romeans; who had alſo two ſons, of whom Juda dwelt in the Countrey of the Indians, amongſt thoſe that are called Heſperians in Æthiopia, and Sabæus founded the Sabeans. After this (when Famine had invaded the land of Canaan) Abraham had intelligence that the Egyptians abounded in all plenty, and decreed with himſelf to retire thither: purpoſing alſo to confer with their Prieſts concerning their Notions of God, and either to follow their belief, if they were better grounded in the ſame than himſelf, or to rectifie them, if his judgment were better grounded than theirs. He led with him his wife Sara: and underſtanding that the Egyptians were much addicted to women, to the end the King might not put him to death, in order to enjoy his wife Sara, who was very beautiful, he deviſed this excuſe, to ſay, That ſhe was his ſiſter; charging her, that if the matter came in queſtion, ſhe ſhould not fail, but confirm the ſame. But no ſooner L came they into Egypt, but the like fortune encountred them, as Abraham had before ſuſpected: for the beauty of his wife was ſuddenly publiſhed in every place. For which cauſe, Pharaoh the King of that Nation, (deſirous to ſee that with his eyes, which he had heard with his ears) he ſought for, ſent and luſted after her: but God withſtood this his unbridled luſt, by afflicting the King's Subjects with a Plague, and his State by Sedition.
Whereupon taking counſel of the Prieſts, what remedy might be uſed, and means ſought to appeaſe the Divine Majeſty; they anſwer'd him, That the cauſe of their afflictions, proceeded from his intending violence to the ſtranger's wife: Whereat being much affrighted, the King firſt queſtioneth with the woman, what ſhe was, and who her companion ſhould be? and at laſt reſolv'd of the truth, he excus'd himſelf to Abraham, ſaying, he ſuppos'd M her to be his ſiſter, not his wife; and that his purpoſe was not to offer injury, but ſeek alliance: and giving him a great ſum of money, he gave him leave to confer with the moſt excellent and learned Prieſts among the Egyptians. By this conference he grew into great eſtimation, in regard of his virtues: for whereas that Nation was divided into different Sects and Opinions, and through mutual contempt and diviſion, were incens'd one againſt another, he declar'd, That all their different Opinions in Religion, were moſt vain, and void of all truth. For theſe his diſputations he was held in great regard among them, and eſteemed for a moſt wiſe and excellent perſonage; not only in well underſtanding, but alſo in expreſſing and perſuading that which he undertook to teach. He imparted to them the Sciences of Arithmetick and Aſtronomy: for before Abraham came N into Egypt, the Egyptians were altogether ignorant of thoſe Sciences; but he firſt brought them from Chaldæa into Egypt, and from thence are they deriv'd to the Greeks. As ſoon as he return'd into Canaan, he divided the Countrey with Lot: and for that there grew a contention betwixt their ſhepherds, (touching the bounds of the paſtures where they fed their Cattel) he gave Lot the choice and election of that Countrey which beſt pleaſed him, retaining unto himſelf that which was left. Thus pitching his Tents towards a mountain near the City Hebron, (which was by ſeven years more ancient than Tanis in Egypt) he dwelt there. But Lot choſe the Plain near the River of Jordan, not far from of God, is utterly deſtroyed; ſo that no memory remaineth thereof. The cauſes of O

AT this time the Aſſyrians were Lords over all Aſia; and the eſtate of Sodom flouriſhed in all affluence, riches, and multitude of People, and the Countrey was governed by five Kings; Ballas, Bareas, Senabarus, Symoborus, and Bale (each particularly ſeized of his Province and Kingdom.) Againſt theſe, the Aſſyrians encamped themſelves; and having divided their Army into four parts, (under the conduct of four Generals) they waged battel with them; in which the Aſſyrians attaining the day, B they impoſed a tribute on the Kings of Sodom: who (after they had for twelve years ſpace performed their duty, and payed their tribute) in the thirteenth year revolted from them. Whereupon the Aſſyrians levied a new Army againſt them, under the conduct and command of Marphad, Arioch Chodollogomar, and Thargal, who ſacked all Syria, and extinguiſhed the Poſterity of the Gyants. And drawing near to Sodom, they encamped near the bituminous Pits (which at that time were in that valley:) and which after Sodom was deſtroyed, became a Lake, which (by reaſon of the bituminous matter that floateth in the ſame) is called Aſphaltites, that is to ſay, bituminous. Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 18. Gen. 14. 14, 15, 16.

A*Braham* hearing of theſe things, and moved both with the taking of his Couſin Lot, as alſo with the ſlaughter of his Friends and Neighbors, preſently prepared himſelf with all his Followers, to ſuccor them: and us'd ſuch diligence in purſuit of the Aſſyrians, that the fifth night after he encountred them near Dan, which is one of the ſources of Jordan: Where ſurpriſing them on the ſudden, (diſorder'd with Wine, and D diſarmed) he kill'd a great number, put the reſt to flight; and purſu'd them in ſuch ſort, that the ſecond day after he drove them all into Soba of Damaſcus; manifeſting hereby, that Victory conſiſteth not in the multitude, but rather in the courage of thoſe that fight; and that a few generous hearts are more worth alwayes than a faint-hearted multitude: for he had not with him above three hundred and eighteen of his houſhold Servants, and three of his Friends, to defeat this great Army. The few Aſſyrians that eſcaped out of this ſlaughter by flight, returned to their houſes with ignominy.

On what Victory dependeth.

As ſoon as Abraham had reſcued his Nephew Lot, and thoſe other priſoners of Sodom which were taken by the Aſſyrians, he returned into his Country, and met in his way with the King of Sodom (in a place called The Kings field) where alſo he was enter- E tained by the King of Solyma, called Melchiſedech (which is as much as to ſay, The juſt King:) for in truth he was no leſs; but was held worthy, by reaſon of his juſtice, in all mens opinion, to ſacrifice as the Prieſt of the moſt high God. Solyma in proceſs of time was called Jeruſalem. This Melchiſedech friendly entertain'd Abraham and all his Followers, not ſuffering them to want any thing that was fit for their ſuſtenance; he feaſted him at his own Table, highly praiſed him, and rendred publick thanks to the great God, for that he had vouchſafed to grant him victory. Abraham on the other ſide preſented him with the tenths of his ſpoils. As for the King of Sodom he remitted all the prey that was taken, and only required to be poſſeſſed of thoſe Captives which were of the Countrey: which condition Abraham accepted not, anſwering, That he F would receive no profit of that Prey, but only ſome proviſions for his Servants and ſome part of the ſpoils for his three Friends who had aſſiſted him; the firſt whereof was called Eſchol; and the two other, Ennerus and Mambres. For this cauſe God praiſed Abraham, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not want the reward that is due unto thee for thy valiant Acts. To which he anſwer'd, And what good ſhall I reap of this recompence, if I have not an heir to poſſeſs it after my deceaſe? (for as yet he had no iſſue.) Then did God promiſe him a Son, whoſe poſterity ſhould be ſo multiplied, that they might in number equal the Stars of Heaven: which when he underſtood, he offered ſacrifice unto God, according to the Commandement which he had received. He took a Heifer of three years old, a Goat of three years, and a Ram of three years, and a Turtle, and a G Pigeon; all which he divided in twain, as he was commanded, the Birds only excepted. But before the Altar was prepared (at ſuch time as the Fowls hovered about to have part of the blood of thoſe Beaſts which were ſacrificed) he heard a voice from Heaven which told him, That his progeny ſhould ſuffer great oppreſſion in Egypt for the ſpace H of four hundred years; but ſhould at laſt obtain the Victory over their Enemies: and having conquered the Canaanites, they ſhould be Lords and Poſſeſſors of their Countries and Cities. Abraham at that time dwelt near to the Oak that was called Ogis, in the Countrey of Canaan, near to the City of Hebron. There being much grieved that his Wife conceived not, he beſought God to give him a Son. And God not onely confirmed to him his former promiſe of a Son, but aſſur'd him of all the other bleſſings which he had promis'd him, when he commanded him to leave Meſopotamia. At that time Sara, by the commandment of God, cauſed Agar one of her handmaids, who was an Egyptian born, to accompany with her husband, to the end he might have iſſue by her: But Agar, as ſoon as ſhe ſaw that ſhe had conceived, began to contemn Sara, aſpiring to principality, I and ſuppoſing that her iſſue ſhould ſucceed in the Kingdom. For which cauſe, Abraham delivered her unto his Wife, to puniſh her: which Agar perceiving, decreed to flie, in that ſhe was afraid of puniſhment, beſeeching God to have mercy on her: and as ſhe travelled on her way thorow the Deſert, the Angel of God appeared unto her, commanding her to return to her Miſtriſs, and aſſuring her that if hereafter ſhe were more modeſt ſhe ſhould be better intreated; having juſtly fallen into thoſe miſeries, by reaſon ſhe had proudly and inſolently behaved her ſelf towards her Miſtriſs. He added moreover, that if ſhe diſobeyed God, and wandred any further, ſhe ſhould die the death: but if ſhe returned from whence ſhe came, ſhe ſhould be the Mother of a Son who ſhould one day be King of that Countrey where ſhe then was. K

To this commandment of God Agar ſubmitted her ſelf with all obedience, and returning back again to her Miſtriſs, ſhe obtained pardon at her hands, and after a while brought forth Iſhmael, which is as much as to ſay, Heard by God, becauſe God had heard the Mothers prayers. Iſhmael was born to Abraham when he was fourſcore and ſix years old: but in the fourſcore and nineteenth year of his age God appeared unto him, and told him, that he ſhould have a Son by Sara, charging him to call him Iſaac, and giving him to underſtand, that great Nations and Kings ſhould iſſue from his loynes, who by force of Arms ſhould conquer all the Countrey of Canaan, from Sidon even unto Egypt.
Commanding him alſo, that his Poſterity ſhould be circumciſed in their privities, and that this circumciſion ſhould be made the eighth day after the birth, by reaſon that he would not have Abraham's Poſterity intermixed with other Nations. But hereafter I L will declare another cauſe of our circumciſion. Abraham alſo asked counſel of God touching Iſhmael, whether he ſhould live or no; and God told him, that he ſhould flouriſh many years, and that he ſhould become a Father of many worthy Nations.
Then gave Abraham thanks unto God, and preſently circumciſed himſelf, and his Son Iſhmael, with all his Family; and Iſhmael at that time was thirteen years old, but Abraham about fourſcore and nineteen years of age.

CHAP. XI.

The deſtruction of Sodom. M

Gen. 18.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 19. The ſins of the Sodomites.

Abraham entertaineth Angels.

v. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

The year of the World, 2084. before Chriſts Nativity, 1916.

About that time the inhabitants of Sodom became immeaſurably proud, by reaſon of their affluence, proſperity, and great riches; and committed outrages againſt men, and impieties againſt God: in ſuch manner as they had forgotten the benefits which they had received at his hands, hating ſtrangers, and giving up themſelves to the Practice of unnatural and abominable Luſts. Whereat God being diſpleaſed, decreed to puniſh their intolerable Pride, to ruine their City from the foundations, and in ſuch ſort to make deſolate their Countrey, that from thenceforward it ſhould neither nouriſh, plant, nor bring forth Fruit. After God had pronounced this ſentence againſt the Sodomites, Abraham (as he ſate under the Oak at Mambres before the door of his Tent) beheld N three Angels, and ſuppoſing them to be Men and Strangers, he aroſe and ſaluted them; and approaching near unto them, he deſired them that they would accept of his entertainment, and lodge with him. Whereunto when they had condeſcended, he commanded his Servants to bake them bread of the fineſt flower; and having killed and roaſted a Calf, he ſet it before them (as they ſate under the oak) which it ſeemed to him they did eat; but they enquired of him where Sarah his Wife was? to whom he anſwered, that ſhe was within on the Tent. They told him then that they would return again, and that they ſhould find her a Mother. But when his Wife ſmiled thereat, and ſaid that it was impoſſible for her to bear Children, eſpecially in that her ſelf was at that time ninety years old, and her Husband an hundred; they diſcovered themſelves, O and declar'd that they were Angels of God, and that they were ſent, one of them to aſſure him that he ſhould have a Son; the other two, to deſtroy Sodom. Which

A when Abraham heard, he was ſorry for the Sodomites, and ariſing, beſought God that he would not deſtroy both the juſt and the unjuſt together. To whom God gave this anſwer, that there was not one juſt Man among the Sodomites; and that if he might but find ten, he would ſpare the City from puniſhment. Whereupon Abraham held his peace, and the Angels entered into Sodom: where they were no ſooner arrived, but Lot invited them to take their lodging in his houſe, (for he was a Man much given to hoſpitality, which he had learnt from the example of Abraham.) But the Sodomites perceiving that thoſe young Men which were entered Lots houſe, were of excellent beauty, began to offer outrage and villany to their perſons: notwithſtanding that Lot exhorted them to forbare, and not to offer villany to his gueſts, but in ſome ſort to have a reſpect to his B houſe; telling them, that rather then they ſhould commit ſuch a crime, he would give them his Daughters to uſe at their pleaſure. But he prevailed nothing with them; whereupon God was in ſuch wiſe provoked by their iniquity that he ſtruck them with blindneſs ſo that they could not find the gate to enter into Lots houſe, and condemned the Sodomites to a general perdition. In order whereunto he commanded Lot to remove out of the City, with his Wife, and his two Daughters who were as yet unmarried, and their betrothed Husbands; but theſe laſt, although forewarn'd by him, contemned Lots advice and held him for a dotard. Then did God ſhoot the arrows of his vengeance upon the City, burning it, and all the Inhabitants therein: and deſolating by the ſame fire all the Countries round about; in ſuch ſort as hath already been declared by me in the Hiſtory C I writ of the Wars of the Jews. But Lots Wife, as they retired thence, looking back towards the City, and more curiouſly beholding the deſtruction thereof, contrary to the commandment of God, was transformed into a Pillar of Salt, which is to be ſeen, even until this day. Lot himſelf and his Daughters fled, and dwelt in a little Countrey which the fire had ſpared, called Zoar, (which in Hebrew ſignifieth little:) In this place (which was void of Men, and ſcant of Victuals) Lot dwelt a long time, leading a ſolitary and poor life; and his Daughters ſuppoſing that all Mankind was extinguſhed upon the earth, ſubtilly circumventing their Father, lay with him when he leaſt ſuſpected it. By this their approachment, they bare him two Sons; the elder a Son named Moab, (which is as much as to ſay, of my Father) this is he that was the Father of the Moabites, D which even at this day are a great Nation: the younger, Ammon, (which ſignifieth the Son of my Race or kind) from whom the Ammonites deſcended, and both theſe two Nations inhabit the Countrey of Cœloſyria. In this ſort Lot eſcaped from the burning of Sodom.

he had practiſed for fear of the Egyptians) for he feared Abimelech the King of that Countrey, who falling in love of Sara would have raviſhed her, had he not been hindred by a moſt grievous ſickneſs, which God inflicted upon him; ſo that being out of all hope of recovery, at ſuch time as he ſlept, there appeared unto him a viſion, which told him that he ſhould take heed leſt he offered any outrage to the ſtrangers Wife, E who was come into his Countrey: and after he was ſomewhat recovered, he told his Friends how God had ſent him that ſickneſs in favour of the ſtranger, and to preſerve his Wife from violence, for that ſhe was not his Siſter, but his lawful Wife; and he bid Abraham thenceforward be of good chear, promiſing him that the honour of his Wife had remained inviolated. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed Abraham by the counſel of his Friends; and told him, that he needed not to ſuſpect his Wife, by reaſon ſhe had ſuffered no villany: Aſſuring him, that God had care of her, and that he delivered her in ſafety to him, (being to that end protected by his mighty power) and in confirmation thereof he called God to record, and the womans conſcience, vowing that he would not have taken her from him if he had known ſhe had been Married: moreover, he F deſired him to be at Peace with him, and by his Prayers to appeaſe Gods wrath, which was kindled againſt him: And ſaid that if thenceforward he would ſtay with them, he ſhould want nothing; or if he liſted to depart, he promiſed him Guides and all other things for which he came into his Countrey. Abraham anſwered him, that he had in no ſort diſſembled with him in calling his Wife his Siſter, for that ſhe was his Brothers Daughter; and that he thought he could not ſafely travel thorow his Countrey, except he had uſed this ſubtilty; avowing moreover, that he was ſorry to have been the cauſe of his ſickneſs which had befaln him; that he heartily wiſht his health, and was ready to abide with him.

BUt the Arabians circumciſe not till the age of thirteen years: becauſe Iſhmael their Anceſtor, and Abraham's Son by the Concubine, was circumciſed in the thirteenth year after he was born. Of which Iſhmael it behoveth to ſpeak more exactly in this place. Sara loved Iſhmael (begotten on her Servant Agar) from the beginning, with no leſs affection than if he had been her own Son; ſo that he was brought up as Abrahams heir. But after ſhe had brought forth Iſaac, ſhe thought it no more requiſite that Iſhmael ſhould be brought up with her Son, becauſe he was elder, and might after his Fathers deceaſe, become the Maſter. She incited Abraham therefore to ſend both him and his Mother to ſome other place: but at firſt he gave no ear to Sara's requeſt, thinking it more than barbarous cruelty, to drive away a tender Child and his Mother, deſtitute of all neceſſaries. At length by the Commandment of God he liſtened to his Wifes counſel, and committed the Child unto his Mother, (being of himſelf as yet unapt to travel) and giving them a Pitcher of Water and Bread, he commanded them to go thither, whither their neceſſity ſhould drive them. And when their Victuals failed them, and their Water was conſumed, ſhe laid the Child, being faint and weak, under an Oak; and to the end that in her preſence he ſhould not breathe his laſt, ſhe went a little way from him. At that time an Angel of God appeared unto her, ſhewing her a Fountain hard by that place, and charging her to look to the careful education of her Child; becauſe that by the conſervation of Iſhmael, ſhe was to expect great happineſs. Upon theſe promiſes ſhe took comfort, and falling into the company of ſhepherds; ſhe by their bounty was relieved in her diſtreſs.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Iſaac, Abraham's Legitimate Son.

Gen. 22. 1, 2.

The year of the World, 2074. before Chriſts Nativity, 1890.

AS touching Iſaac, Abraham loved him with an entire and Fatherly affection, as his only begotten Son born in his old age by the goodneſs of God. The Child alſo addicting himſelf unto all vertue, careful to honor his Father and Mother, and ſtudious of the ſervice of God, invited both his parents the rather to affect and love him. So that Abraham was very deſirous to forſake this preſent life, provided that he might leave behind him all the goods which he had, unto his Son; which through the mercy of God he happily effected. Whereupon (under tryal and conformity of his faith) God appeared unto him, and reckoned up all the benefits which he had beſtowed on him; how he had granted him victory over his enemies, and how he had eſtabliſht and bleſt him with preſent felicity by his favour; for which cauſe he required him to ſacrifice, and 1, 2. make an oblation unto him of his Son Iſaac; commanding him to conduct him to the Mountain of Morea, and there to ſacrifice him. In doing whereof, he ſhould manifeſt the deſire he had to ſerve him, (in preferring that which was agreeable to God, before the life of his Son.) Abraham ſuppoſing that it was no ways lawful to diſobey God, but that he ought to ſubmit himſelf to his will, (as to him by whoſe providence all things had their being) ſaid nothing to his Wife, concerning that which God had commanded him, neither how he had determined the death of his Son; neither did he make it known to any of his houſhold-ſervants, leſt they might have diverted him from his reſolution. He therefore took his Son Iſaac, with two Servants, (loading an Aſſe with ſuch things as were requiſite for ſacrifice) and travelled towards the Mountain, his Servants attending him for two dayes; and on the third day, as ſoon as he perceived the Mountain, he

A he left the reſt of thoſe that accompanied him in the Plain, and attended only by his Son, he aſcended up the Mountain (upon which afterwards King David appointed that the Temple ſhould be builded.) They carried with them alſo the reſt of thoſe things which were requiſite for ſacrifice, (ſave only the Beaſt that was to be offered:) About this time, Iſaac was five and twenty years old, and did himſelf prepare the Altar, and enquired of his Father what he ſhould offer, conſidering that as yet they had no ſheep for ſacrifice. Abraham anſwered him that God would furniſh them; (being of power ſufficient to give Men that in abundance, whereof they have need, and to deprive them of that they have, and whereof they held themſelves poſſeſſed) if he were well pleaſed with their ſacrifice: Now as ſoon as the Altar was made ready, and the Wood prepared and B laid upon the ſame, and all things in readineſs) he addreſſed his ſpeech unto his Son, in this manner. My Son, I beg'd thee of God with very earneſt Prayers; and ever ſince thou wert born into the world, I have intermitted no care and diligence in thine education; neither have I thought that any thing could make me more happy, than at departing out of this World, to ſee thee at mans eſtate, and to leave thee the Heir and Lord of all my ſubſtance: But ſince it hath pleaſed God, that I ſhould be thy Father, and that the ſame God likewiſe now thinketh good that I ſhould deſtroy thee, generouſly ſubmit, and be contented to be ſacrificed to him: For in ſo doing I fulfil the Commandments of God, who requireth at our hands that we do him this honour, for the favours which he hath beſtowed upon us in aſſiſting us, both in War and Peace. Since therefore being born, thou art to die, I deem it reaſonable, that in regard it ſeemeth good unto C God that thou depart out of this life, (not by ſickneſs, nor by War, nor by any other inconvenience, that naturally hapneth unto Men) but by being offer'd in ſacrifice to him by thine owne Father, that thou render thy Soul unto him in the midſt of Prayers, and the celebration of this ſacrifice, to the end he may receive and ſeat thee near himſelf: Thou ſhalt then be the comfort of mine old age, (which is the cauſe for which I have nouriſhed thee) if thou procure for me aſſiſtance of God inſtead of that which I ought to receive from thee. Here Iſaac with a noble heart (like the gracious Son of ſo godly a Father) heard all which his Father ſaid with great contentment, and anſwered, that he would rather never have been born, then once diſobey the Ordinance of God, and of his Father; or ſhew himſelf averſe to ſubmit his will to both their pleaſures, conſidering that if his Father onely ſhould command the ſame, he D ſhould do very ill if he diſobeyed him: which ſaid, he leapt upon the Altar, and offered himſelf to the ſlaughter. Which had ſurely hapned at that inſtant, if God had not hindered it; for with a loud voyce he called Abraham by his name, commanding him 10, 11. not to kill his Son, and telling him that he had not given him that commandment, becauſe he took pleaſure in humane blood, neither for that by ſuch impiety he would deprive him of that Son, of whom it was his pleaſure to make him the Father; but that by this act he intended to prove his affection, to ſee whether being commanded ſuch a thing, he would be obedient; and for that he had made tryal of his faith and readineſs, and his diſintereſſed piety, he did not repent him of that good he had done unto him; that he would never forget to have care of him, and his race, whenſoever he ſhould pray unto E him; and that when the courſe of his years were happily ended, he ſhould leave a 12, 13. great dominion to thoſe of his children which ſhould be good and vertuous. He told him moreover, that he would multiply his race in divers Nations, and that he would beſtow great benefits upon them, and that the memory of the chief of his offspring ſhould be envyed of all Men for their greatneſs. When God had ſpoken after this manner, it pleaſed him on the ſudden (no Man knoweth how) to cauſe a Ram to appear thereabouts for a ſacrifice. And thus (being delivered from all evils and inconveniences beyond their expectations, after they had heard ſo many promiſes of ſo many bleſſings) they embraced one another, and celebrated the ſacrifice; which done, they returned towards Sara in ſafety, and paſs'd the remainder of their lives in happineſs, F God giving them his bleſſing in whatſoever they undertook.

manifeſtly how God had proſpered his journey. Whereupon drawing out a jewel, (with certain other ornaments, ſuch as Virgins take delight to wear) he offered them unto the Maid, telling her that he gave her theſe preſents, in requital of the kindneſs N ſhe had offered him in ſatisfying his thirſt, for that ſhe amongſt ſo many other Virgins had onely ſhewed her ſelf affable and gracious; deſiring alſo that he might be entertained in her Brothers houſe, by reaſon that Night deprived him of the means of travelling any further, and that he was charged with certain jewels of great price, which in no place (as he ſaid) might be in more ſafety than in their cuſtody, whom in effect he had found ſo courteous and honeſt: aſſuring her, that the vertue which appeared in her, gave him ſufficient teſtimony both of the courteſie of her Mother and Brother, who would not (as he ſuppoſed) take it in ill part if he were entertained: and laſtly, that he would in no wayes be chargeable unto them, but would pay for his lodging and

To this Rebecca anſwered, that he had reaſon to conceive a good opinion of her

Yet firſt (ſaid ſhe) I will certifie my Brother Laban hereof, and afterwards conduct you to our houſe: which done, ſhe led him into their Tent, commanding her Brother Laban's Servants to take care of his Camels; and for himſelf, he was entertained at her Brother Laban's Table.

When Supper was paſt, he ſpake both to the Brother and Mother of the Virgin after this manner: Abraham the Son of Thares is your couſin; For, (ſaid he, addreſſing to the Mother) Nachor the grandfather of your Children, was Abraham's Brother, by one and the ſame Father and Mother. He now ſendeth me unto you, deſiring you to give this Virgin for Wife to his only Son and Heir of all his ſubſtance: whom although he might B have matcht with the richeſt of his Countrey, yet hath he refuſed all of them, deſiring rather to render this reſpect to thoſe of his kindred and Nation: ſet not light therefore by his good affection and deſire. For, beſides all other bleſſings and good fortunes which have happily befallen me in this my journey, I have, by Gods eſpecial providence, found out both the Maid and your houſe. For, at ſuch time as I drew near the City, and beheld many Virgins going to fetch Water, I beſought God that I might light upon this Maiden, and he vouchſafed me my deſire: ratifie therefore on your part this Marriage favoured by Gods providence; and honour Abraham in granting your conſent to this your Daughters Marriage, which I am ſent to requeſt at your hands, with moſt entire affection. Now they, in that they both allowed a thing ſo advantageous, C and perceived alſo that it was conformable to the will of God, ſent their Siſter unto him under the conditions demanded: and Iſaac married her, being already in poſſeſſion of all his Fathers goods, by reaſon that the other Sons of Abraham were already departed to eſtabliſh their Colonies in other Provinces.

Now it hapned that a great Famine reigned in the Land of Canaan, Iſaac reſolved to retire himſelf to Egypt, by reaſon of the plenty of that Countrey, but he went and dwelt at Gerar, according as God had commanded: In which place King Abimelech re-

At firſt therefore he ſhewed him great ſigns of Friendſhip, but afterwards, the envy he had conceived, hindred him from perſiſting in the ſame; for perceiving that God was favourable unto Iſaac, and had an eſpecial care over him, he drave him out of his Countrey. He retired not far from Gerar to a place called Pharan, that is to ſay, The Valley, and as he there dig'd to find out Springs of Water, Abimelech's Shepherds came and ſet upon him, and hindered him in ſuch ſort as he could not finiſh his purpoſe; and for that he purpoſely retired from them, they ſuppoſed they had gotten the Victory. Shortly after, when he began to dig in another place, other Shepherds of Abimelech outraged ſuch time as he was driven away from thence; I have alſo made thy Father happy, and C will be no leſs gracious and favourable unto thy ſelf. Be courageous therefore, and proſecute thy journey under mine aſſiſtance: The Marriage which thou purſueſt ſhall give them the ſoveraignty over this Countrey, both to them and their ſucceſſors, and that they wondered that ſhe was not yet arrived; of whom (ſaid they) thou mayeſt and therefore am I come at this preſent to ſalute you, and renew that ancient love which our alliance requireth at our hands. But ſhe remembring all thoſe things which her Father was wont to report and diſcourſe of Rebecca, and knowing, that her Parents were

This ſaid, ſhe brought him to Laban; where, being acknowledged by his Uncle, he both H by that means lived ſecurely amongſt his Friends, and brought him great contentment, by his unexpected acceſs unto them. Some dayes after, Laban told him, that he took ſo much contentment in his preſence, that he could not expreſs it in words; and deſired him to manifeſt the cauſe that had induced him to leave his Father and Mother in their old age, when they had moſt need of him; and he promiſed him all aſſiſtance and favour in whatſoever caſe he had to make uſe of him. Whereupon Jacob diſcourſed unto him the whole matter; that Iſaac had two Sons, Eſau and himſelf: that his Brother (becauſe by his Mothers contrivance, he had defrauded him of his Fathers Bleſſing) ſought to kill him, as the raviſher of that principality from him that was deſtinated unto him by God, and the intercepter of his Fathers other intentions; that this, with his mothers command, I was the cauſe why he came thither; as to his neareſt relation by the Mothers ſide; adding, that next after God, he hoped to find his greateſt aſſiſtance and help in him his Uncle. Whereupon Laban promiſing to him whatſoever humanity he could deſire, (as well in reſpect of their common anceſtors, as for the love he bare unto his Mother; towards whom, although ſhe were abſent he would expreſs his good affection, in ſhewing himſelf well affected towards him that was there preſent:) he told him then, that he would give him the charge of his flock, and make him Maſter over all his ſhepherds; and that when he thought good to return back again to his Friends, he ſhould depart with ſuch rewards and honours as might well beſeem a Friend ſo nearly allyed unto him. Which when Jacob underſtood, he anſwered, That he would willingly K endure any ſort of labour in Labans ſervice, and that his devoir towards him would be a delight to himſelf: but that in lieu of his labours, he required Rachel to Wife: who deſerved his eſteem for her vertue, and particularly for her goodneſs wherewith ſhe had brought him thither: declaring, that the love which he bare unto her, was the cauſe why he uſed thoſe ſpeeches. Laban (being greatly delighted and contented with this his diſcourſe) granted him his conſent to the Marriage, telling him, that he could not have wiſht for a better Son-in-Law: but with condition that he ſhould ſojourn a while with him, for that he was no ways minded to ſend his Daughter among the Canaanites: and that it repented him, that, by reaſon of Marriage, his Siſter had been carried into ſo far a Countrey. Jacob accepted the condition, and covenanted to abide L with him for ſeven years, ſaying, that he was glad to have found an occaſion of making appear to him by his care and good ſervice, that he was not unworthy of his alliance.
When the time which was covenanted between them was expired, and Jacob expected the contented poſſeſſion of his love, as was promiſed him, Laban prepared a nuptial feaſt: and when night drew on, and Jacob leaſt ſuſpected, he brought his Daughter Leah leſs fair in face, and elder in years, and lay'd her in his Bed. Jacob deceived by the darkneſs, and for that he had drunk liberally, lay with her: but the day after diſcovering the deceit, he complained hereof to Laban, who asked him pardon, alledging that he had not brought in Leah with intent to deceive him, but that the cuſtom of the Countrey, (which forbids to Marry the younger before the elder) compelled him thereunto: yet that the M ſame ſhould no ways hinder, but that he ſhould Marry Rachel too, on condition to ſerve him yet ſeven years more. Herewith Jacob was pacified, and ſuffered himſelf to be perſwaded, (out of the love which he bear to Rachel;) and when the other ſeven years were expired, he Married Rachel. Now theſe Siſters had two Maid Servants which their Father had given them: Lea's Maid was called Zelpha, and Rachel's, Bala; they were no Slaves, but only Subjects. Leah liv'd in great grief, to ſee that Jacob bare greater affection to her Siſter, than to her ſelf, bethinking her oftentimes, that if ſhe could have Children, ſhe ſhould be better eſteemed and loved by her husband, for which cauſe ſhe continually beſought Almighty God, that it would pleaſe him to give her iſſue: whereupon it happened that God gave her a Son, and Jacobs affection was turned towards N her; for which cauſe ſhe called him Ruben, that is to ſay, the Son of Viſion, becauſe ſhe had obtained him through the mercy of God.

Juda, (which ſignifieth thankſgiving.) At that time Rachel fearing leſt ſhe ſhould loſe part of her Husbands love, by reaſon of the fruitfulneſs of her Siſter; cauſed her Maid Bala to lye with him; by whom he had a Son called Dan, (that is to ſay, the judgement of God;) and after him Nepthalim, (which ſignifieth ingenious;) by reaſon that ſhe uſed ſubtilty to requite her Siſters fruitfulneſs. Leah hereupon us'd the ſame artifice, and gave her Maid Zelpha to Jacob, of whom he begat Gad, (which ſignifieth come

A Ruben, the eldeſt of all the Sons of Lea, brought his Mother apples of Mandrake, which when Rachel perceived, ſhe deſired her to give her part thereof, for that ſhe longed to taſte of the ſame: whereunto Lea would yield no conſent, replying, That ſhe ought to content her ſelf in that ſhe had the advantage in Jacobs love. Rachel to mollifie the heart of her ſiſter told her, That ſhe would be content that Jacob ſhould lye with her that night; which Jacob accordingly did and Lea once more had children, namely Iſachar, (which ſignifieth Come by hire) and Zabulon, (which importeth a pledge of good will) beſides whom, ſhe had a daughter alſo called Dinah. Not long after this Rachel lay with Jacob, and brought forth a ſon, who was called Joſeph, (which ſignifieth an addition.) During all this time, (which was for the ſpace of twenty years) Jacob B had the government of his Father-in-laws flocks: but afterwards he thought good (accompanied with his Wives) to return to his own Inheritance: which when his Father-in-law perceived, he would in no ſort give his conſent thereunto; for which cauſe, he covertly determined to forſake him. To this intent he made trial of his Wives, to ſee how they were affected towards his flight; who heartned him by their conſents: inſomuch that Rachel having ſtolen the images of thoſe gods which were honored in that Countrey, fled away with her Siſter, and the two Maids, and all their Children, with the reſt of all their ſubſtance. Jacob alſo drove away the moity of the Cattel, without the knowledge of Laban. Rachel alſo bare with her the images of the gods, although ſhe had been taught by Jacob to contemn them, and yield them no honour: but C ſhe ſuppoſed, that if Laban purſued and overtook them, by reſtoring them, ſhe might obtain his pardon. But Laban a day after the departure of Jacob and his Wives, had notice thereof, and being therewith much troubled, he purſued after them, intending to aſſault them by force, and on the ſeventh day he overtook them upon a certain hill where they ſat down to take their reſt, in that it was evening: but God appearing to him in a dream, commanded him to uſe no violence, neither towards his Son-in-law, nor his Daughters; but rather to liſten to a peaceable accord betwixt himſelf and Jacob: aſſuring him that if in contempt of Jacobs weakneſs he ſhould lift up his arm to aſſail him, that he himſelf would join with Jacob to protect him.

24. Laban purſueth Jacob, but God delivereth him from his purpoſe.

The next day, Laban having received this command from God, called Jacob unto him D to the end to confer together (and to tell him what the night before he had beheld in his dream.) As ſoon as Jacob was come to him, he began to accuſe him; alledging, that he had received him into his houſe, at ſuch time as he came unto him being poor and naked of all means, and had given him great abundance of Goods. I have (ſaith he) given thee my Daughters in marriage, hoping by that means to increaſe thy love towards me more and more; but thou haſt had neither reſpect of thy Mother, neither of the acquaintance or parentage betwixt thee and me, neither of the Wives which thou haſt married, nor of thy Children, whoſe Grand-Father I am; but haſt dealt with me after an injurious and hoſtile manner, driving away that which appertained unto me, ſeducing my Daughters to abandon him that begat them, and carrying away my houſhold E gods with them, which both I and my Predeceſſours have ſerved and honoured; and what none, but men of War, would have done unto their Enemies, that haſt thou done unto me: yea, thou that art my kinſman, my Siſters Son, the Husband of my Daughters, my pledge, and my familiar Servant, haſt dealt thus with me. On the other ſide Jacob alledged for himſelf, that God had not only made impreſſion in his heart, but that all men alſo are poſſeſt with the love of their Countrey; and that after ſo long ſpace of time, it ſeemed good unto him to viſit his native ſoil. And concerning that crime (ſaith he) which thou objecteſt againſt me, touching the prey, if any other but thy ſelf be judge; thou ſhalt be convicted to have dealt unjuſtly with me: for whereas thou oughteſt to have rewarded me, for the maintenance and increaſe I have made of thy F goods, haſt thou not done us great wrong to envie us a little part and portion thereof? And for thy Daughters; know this, that they have not followed me as perſons conveighed away by ſubtilty, but under that love and duty which married Wives bare unto their Husbands: they do not therefore only follow me, but they come after their Children. Theſe things alledged he for himſelf. Further he replied, and accuſed Laban, becauſe that being his Mothers Brother, and having given him his Daughters to Wife, he had notwithſtanding bitterly vext him by his ſevere commandments to which he had been obedient during the ſpace of twenty years; that the toyles he had endured in order to his Marriage with Rachel had been grievous unto him; notwithſtanding that it was but a trifle in reſpect of that which he ſuffered afterwards; which had he born him an G envious affection or hoſtile hatred, he could very well have eſcaped. In truth, Laban had dealt moſt unjuſtly with Jacob. For ſeeing that God aſſiſted him in all that he enterprized, Laban promiſed to give him all the Cattel that were born white, and ſometime over to the next years increaſe, by reaſon he had alwayes a reſpect of the greater flock, and promiſed that which he hoped would not come to paſs; and which if it fell contrary, he was ready to infringe. And as touching the gods, he told him he might make ſearch for them.

This condition did Laban accept: but Rachel underſtanding the ſame, thruſt the gods into a Sack, and made them to be carried on a Camels back, and ſhe ſate upon them, ſaying, that ſhe was indiſpoſed, by reaſon that at that time ſhe had her natural purgations.
And for this cauſe Laban deſiſted from ſearching any further, ſuppoſing his Daughter being ſo affected would not conceal or ſet her ſelf ſo near things that were ſo ſacred: and I he made a covenant with Jacob, that neither of them ſhould call to remembrance the unkindneſſes that had paſt betwixt them, but that he ſhould cheriſh his Daughters; all which they bound with an oath. This covenant was made upon a certain mountain, where they reared a Pillar in the form of an Altar: whence it came to paſs that this Pillar was

But as Jacob travelled towards the Countrey of Canaan, he had ſeveral viſions, which preſaged unto him good hope of happineſs to come; and he called the place where this thing hapned, The field of God. And being deſirous to know how his Brother Eſau was K by reaſon he ſtood in fear leſt the memory of his old diſcontent ſhould be renewed: charging his meſſengers to ſignifie unto Eſau, that Jacob deeming it a thing inconvenient to children, with all thoſe riches which God had given him; offering himſelf unto Eſau, with all which he had of moſt eſteem, by reaſon that he thought it the greateſt benefit that might happen to him to impart unto his Brother a part of thoſe commodities which 6, 7. he had received at Gods hands. All which they ſignified unto Eſau, who rejoyced very L much thereat, and went forth to meet his Brother, accompanied with four hundred armed Men. But Jacob hearing that he marched forward to meet him, attended by ſo many Men at Arms, was very much afraid: yet fixing his confidence in God, he provided for the time, leſt any detriment ſhould happen unto him, ſtudying every way to defend both him, and his, from invaſion. To which end dividing his Troops, he cauſed ſome to march before, and the reſt to follow cloſely after: ſo that if any did aſſault the firſt, they might retire themſelves to the Troop that followed.

13. After this manner having ordered all things about him, He ſent certain Servants with preſents to his Brother, namely, with Beaſts of charge, and a great number of divers kinds of four-footed Beaſts, (which for their rareneſs might give more content and M

Jacob reconcileth his Brother with rewards. Jacob wreſtleth with an Angel, and is called Iſrael. to the intent, that being beheld thus in ranks, they might ſeem to be a greater number than they were: to the end, that if as yet there remained any diſcontent in the heart of Eſau, theſe preſents might ſerve to mitigate the ſame. He commanded them alſo that marched foremoſt, that they ſhould uſe courteous ſalutation towards Eſau. Having thus all the day diſpoſed his Troops, as ſoon as the night was come, he cauſed all his companies to march, who paſſed the River of Jaboch: but Jacob, who was left 24. hindmoſt, had a viſion, in which he wreſtled with an Angel, and he became victor.

Now the Angel ſpake unto him, exhorting him to rejoyce at that which had hapned unto him, aſſuring him that he had not atchieved an eaſie matter, but that he had N him, and that his poſterity ſhould be invincible, and that no man whatſoever, ſhould overcome him: commanding him to call his name Iſrael, that is to ſay, according to the Hebrews, a reſiſter of an Angel. Theſe things were foretold unto Jacob upon his requeſt; who perceiving alſo that he was an Angel of God, prayed him to inform him of that which ſhould happen unto him: which the viſion did, and afterwards vaniſhed.

30. Jacob took great pleaſure thereat, and called the place Phanuel, that is to ſay, the face of God: and for that in wreſtling he had hurt a part of his thigh, he afterwards abſtained from eating of the ſame, and by reaſon thereof our Nation do never eat that part. O

Now when he had intelligence that his Brother approched, he commanded his Wives to march forward ſeverally with their hand-Maids, to the end that they might he perceiv'd his Brother drew near him in the Spirit of peace, without intent of circum-vention, he caſt himſelf at his feet, and Eſau ſaluted him, and enquired of him touching the companies of Women and Children; and after he underſtood all things, he offer'd to lead them to his Father. But Jacob excuſed himſelf, by reaſon of the wearineſs of his Cattel, and Eſau retired to Seir where he made his abode, and had impoſed that name on that Countrey, by reaſon of his thick hair. Jacob alſo retired himſelf to a place which at this day is called the Tents; and from thence into Sichem, a City of the Canaanites.

Now at ſuch time as the Sichemites celebrated their Feaſt, Dina, which was Jacob's on-B ly Daughter, went into the City to ſee the bravery of the Women of that Countrey.
But Sichem the Son of King Emmor was ſo taken with her beauty, that he deflouted her: and being paſſionately in love, he deſir'd his Father that he might have her to Wife: who liſtening thereunto, went himſelf unto Jacob, praying him to give Dina his Daughter, in lawful Marriage, to his Son Sichem. Jacob not daring to refuſe him, by reaſon of his authority and quality; and on the other ſide, not thinking it to be either a thing lawful, or convenient, to match his Daughter with a ſtranger, deſired ſome time for deliberation. Hereupon the King departed, hoping that Jacob would liſten to the Marriage. But Jacob having diſcover'd unto his Sons the raviſhment of their ſiſter, and the requeſt of Emmor, deſir'd them to conſider amongſt themſelves, what was fit to be done in the mat-C ter: whereupon ſome held their peace, not knowing what to ſay; but Simeon and Levi (the Brothers of the ſame womb with their ſiſter) complotted together this practice:
It was now a Feſtival of the Sichemites, who intended nothing but pleaſure, and banquet-ting; and the two Brethren taking this opportunity, by night fell upon their firſt guards, and killed them as they ſlept; and from thence entering into the City, they killed all the Males (and with them the King and his Son) but to the Women they offered no violence. Which being executed without the knowledge of their Father, they brought their ſiſter back again. Jacob was very much aſtoniſhed at this accident, ſo ſtrangely executed, and was greatly diſpleas'd with his Children: but God appeared unto him, and comforted him, and commanded him to purifie his Tents, and offer thoſe Sacrifices which D he had vowed when firſt he went into Meſopotamia, and the Viſion appeared unto him.
As he cleanſed thoſe which followed him, he found the gods of Laban, which Rachel had ſtoln, and hid in Sichem, in the earth, under an oak, without his knowledge.

AFter Iſaac's death, his two Sons divided their inheritance among themſelves, and neither of them remain'd in that ſame place which they had choſen before to make their abode: but Eſau leaving the City of Hebron to his Brother, went and dwelt in Seir, and was Lord of the Countrey of Idumæa, which he named by his name (calling it Edom) for the occaſion which followeth. He being very young, returned one day ſore wearied with Travel, and hungry, from Hunting: and finding his Brother dreſſing for himſelf a meſs of Lentil-pottage, which were very red in colour, and further encreaſed his appetite; he deſir'd them at his hands, that he might eat them. But he taking the opportunity and occaſion of his Brother Eſau's hunger, conſtrained him to forſake his Birth-right, and to ſell him the ſame, on condition he L ſhould give him them to eat. Eſau then preſs'd with Hunger, reſigned unto him his Birth-right, and confirm'd it with a ſolemn Oath. Hereupon, his equals in age, in way of mockery, called him Edom, by reaſon of his red meat; for Edom in Hebrew, ſignifieth red. His Countrey likewiſe, was hence called Edom. But the Greeks, to the end they might make the name more agreeable, called it Idumæa. He became the Father of five Children, of whom he had three by his Wife Alibama, whoſe names were Jaus, Jolam and Chore: of the other two, Aliphates was the Son of Ada: and Raguel, of Moſametha: theſe Children had Eſau. Aliphates had five legitimate Children, Theman, Omar, Opher, Jotham, Cenez, (for Amelech was illegitimate, born by one of his Concubines, whoſe name was Theſma.) Theſe dwelt in the part of Idumæa, which is called Gobolitis; M and in that part, which by reaſon of Amelech, is called Amalechitis. For Idumæa being in times paſt a Land of great extent, continued the name of Idumæa thorow the whole Countrey: and the particular Provinces of the ſame, kept the names of thoſe that firſt inhabited them.

BUt Jacob attained to that felicity, that ſcarcely any other in all that Countrey was ſo happy; for he ſurpaſſed all the Inhabitants of it in riches: and by reaſon of the virtues of his Children, he was both envied and regarded. For, they were accompliſhed N in all perfections, endowed with ſtout hearts, apt to execute any work of the hand, and to endure all ſorts of Travel: finally, all of them were furniſhed with knowledge and providence. But God had ſuch care of him, and ſo graciouſly procured and furthered his good fortunes, that that which ſeemed unto him to be grievous and contrary, he brought to a proſperous iſſue for him, to the encreaſe of his riches; and cauſed that both he and his Children were the firſt motive to our Anceſtors to forſake the Land of Egypt, on that occaſion which here enſueth. Jacob having begotten Joſeph of Rachel, lov'd him entirely, both in reſpect of the beauty of his body, and of the ornaments and virtues of his mind; as alſo his prudence, wherein he exceeded all his other Brothers. This cordial affection of his Father, moved envy and hatred amongſt his Brothers towards him: together with the O Dreams which he had ſeen, and told both to his Father and Brethren, which preſag'd unto him a ſingular felicity. For, it is the common cuſtom of Men to be jealous of their proſperity, with whom they are familiar.

Ver. 3, 4. Jacob's Sons hated their Brother Joſeph.

Now

A Now the viſions which Joſeph ſaw in his dream, were theſe Being ſent by his Father, in the company of his Brothers, to reap Corn in the time of Harveſt, he ſaw a viſion (far different from thoſe which commonly happen in ſleep) which (as ſoon as he awoke) he told unto his Brethren, to the end they might interpret it. He told them, that he thought in his dream the night paſt, that his Sheaf of Corn ſtood upright in a place where he had fixed it, and that theirs run towards his, to bow down and reverence the ſame. Which viſion of his, ſeemed to foretel him his ample fortune: and how he ſhould obtain the Lordſhip over all of them. But they concealed all theſe things from Joſeph; making ſhew, that they could in no ſort interpret the dream: but being by themſelves apart, they breathed forth contrary imprecations, wiſhing that nothing of this prediction, B might take effect, but perſevered more and more in envy and hatred towards him. But God (oppoſing his power againſt their envy) ſent Joſeph a ſecond and more ſtrange viſion: for he dreamed, that the Sun, the Moon, and eleven of the Stars deſcended down to the earth, and humbled themſelves before him. Which viſion he revealed to his Father in the preſence of his Brethren, (without ſuſpition of any hatred in them towards him) and deſir'd him to interpret unto him the meaning thereof. Jacob greatly rejoyced at this dream, by reaſon he conceived in his mind the interpretation thereof, and (in comparing and alluding his conjectures not raſhly, but with prudence) he rejoyced at thoſe great matters which were ſignified by that dream: which foretold that his Son Joſeph ſhould be very fortunate and happy; and that the time ſhould come, in which his C Father, Mother, and Brethren ſhould honor him, and do him homage. For, he compared the Moon (which ripeneth and encreaſeth all things that grow) to his Mother; and the Sun (which giveth form and force) to his Father. And as touching his Brothers, who were eleven in number, he compared them to the eleven Stars, (which receive their force both from the Sun and the Moon.) Neither did Jacob without judgment and conſideration, ſo interpret this viſion. But Joſephs Brothers were highly grieved at this preſage, conceiving as enviouſly and hatefully thereof, as if this felicity had been portended to a ſtranger and not to their Brother, with whom they might equally partake his good fortunes, being as well Allied in felicity unto him, as in conſanguinity. Whereupon they reſolved on his death and deſtruction: and having complotted theſe counſels D amongſt themſelves, and gathered in their Harveſt, they retired themſelves with their flock, towards Sichem, (which was a part of that Countrey very fit to feed their Cattel;) where they kept their flocks without giving any notice of their departure to their Father. But he perceiving that no Man came from the herd, that might tell him any tidings, being ſorrowful and careful of his Sons, ſent Joſeph to the flocks, to underſtand how they did, and how their affairs proſpered.

How Joſeph was ſold into Egypt by his Brethren, and grew in credit in that Countrey: and how his Brethren at length were under his ſubjection.

E BUt ſo ſoon as they ſaw their Brother coming towards them, they rejoyced, not as at the arrival of one of their neer Friends, ſent unto them by their Father, but as if their Enemy had met them, and was, by the will of God, delivered into their hands. They therefore mutually agreed to put him to death, and not to let ſlip the preſent opportunity. But Reuben, the eldeſt amongſt them, ſeeing their diſpoſition and conſpiracy to kill him, endeavoured to diſſuade them; ſetting before their eyes, how heinous and wicked the enterpriſe was, and what hatred they might incur thereby. For (ſaid he) if before God and before Men it be a wicked and deteſtable thing, to lay hands on, and to murther a ſtranger; how much more heinous a Crime will it be held for us, F to be convicted to be the murtherers of our Brother? whoſe death will heap ſorrow on our Fathers head, and draw our Mother into great grief and deſolation, through the loſs of her Son robbed and bereft from her againſt the ordinary courſe of nature. He prayed therefore them to be adviſed in theſe things; and to conſider in their minds, what might happen, if this Child, who was fair, vertuous, and young, ſhould be put to death: deſiring them to give over this unnatural reſolution, and to fear God who was both the judge and witneſs of their deliberation intended againſt their Brother: adding that if they would deſiſt from this heinous act, God would take pleaſure in their repentance and reconcilement: but if they proceeded in their enterpriſe, he aſſured them, that he would puniſh them like fratricides; ſince nothing is hidden from his providence, G whether it be committed in the Deſart, or attempted in the City. For whereſoever Men are, there is it alwayes to be thought, that God likewiſe is. Further, that when they ſhould have perpetrated this fact, they ſhould alwayes have their conſciences as an impious fact to kill a Mans own Brother, although he had done him injury; and much more meritorious, to forgive a Mans Friend, that had offended againſt him. Moreover he ſaid, that Joſeph had done them no wrong, whoſe tender years rather required care and compaſſion at their hands, than hate and tyranny. Beſides that, the cauſe of his ſlaughter would aggravate their offence, if it ſhould be known, that for envy of his future felicity they ſhould take away his life; all which good hap they likewiſe might participate, by reaſon of conſanguinity: and that it was their duty to think, that whatſoever bleſſing God imparted to Joſeph, was theirs, and that for that cauſe they were to conſider, that God would be more diſpleaſed againſt them, if they ſhould endeavour to deprive him of his life whom he had eſteemed and adjudged worthy of proſperity to I come. Reuben alledging theſe and many other things, diſſuaded, and laboured to divert them from ſhedding their Brothers blood. But ſeeing that all theſe his motives could in no ſort mollifie them, and that they haſtened the rather to perpetrate the Murther; he counſelled them, that at leaſtwiſe they ſhould allot him ſome milder kind of death: telling them, that he endeavoured all what in him lay, at the firſt to diſſuade them; But ſince it was throughly reſolved among them, that he ſhould not live; that leſs miſchief ſhould follow of it, if they would be ruled by his counſel: for by that means their will ſhould have effect, yet a more mild and leſs hurtful, in compariſon of Murther; that it were better for them to withhold their hands, and keep them immaculate, by caſting him into the next Pit, and there leaving him in the hands of death. To this counſel, all of them agreed. So Reuben K took Joſeph, and bound him with cords, and let him down eaſily into a Pit, which was and Syrian Merchandiſe into Egypt) counſelled his Brothers to draw up Joſeph out of the Well, and to ſell him to thoſe Arabians: aſſuring them, by that means it would come to paſs, that Joſeph ſhould die the farther off from them, amongſt Strangers: and as touching themſelves, they ſhould be exempt from that pollution. Which counſel of his being commended by them all, they drew Joſeph out of the Pit, and ſold him to the Arabians for the ſumme of twenty pieces of Silver, at ſuch time as he was ſeventeen years L of age. Now had Reuben reſolved in himſelf to ſave Joſeph without his Brothers privity; for which cauſe coming by night unto the Pit, he called him with a loud voice; and ſeeing that he gave him no anſwer, he began to conjecture with himſelf, that his Brethren had put him to death; he reproved them therefore very bitterly: but after they had told him what was become of him, he gave over his mourning. After theſe things were thus paſſed, the Brethren conſulted among themſelves, in what ſort they might clear themſelves from their Fathers ſuſpicion; and concluded among themſelves to tear the Coat wherewith Joſeph was attired when he came to them, and which they had taken from him when they caſt him into the Well; to the end, that having ſtained it in the Blood of a Goat, they might afterwards carry it to their Father, and ſhew it him, to the end he might ſuppoſe, that Joſeph was ſlain by wild Beaſts. Which done, they came unto the M old Man (who had already heard ſomething of Joſeph's misfortunes) and told him, that they had not ſeen their Brother Joſeph, neither could they aſſure him what miſhap had befaln him: but that notwithſtanding, they had found his Coat, all bloodied and torn; which made them ſuſpect, that he was ſlain by ſome wild Beaſts, if ſo be he were ſent unto them, attired in that Coat.

But Jacob (that hitherto expected more gentle tidings, ſuppoſing and hoping that Joſeph had only been captive) gave over this opinion, and took the Coat for a moſt aſſured teſtimony of his Sons death; for he knew that he was apparelled therewith, at ſuch time as he ſent him to his Brothers: for which cauſe he lamented Joſeph, from that N time forward, as certainly dead. And ſuch was the grief of his heart, that he received no conſolation, but ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded by the Brothers, that Joſeph was ſlain by Savage Beaſts. He therefore ſate him down, being clothed in Sackcloth, and charged with ſorrow, and neither could his Sons by their counſels mitigate his moans, nor he himſelf remit the rigour of his lamentation.

27 28. Joſeph is ſold in Egypt to Putiphar.

Gen 39. 7, 9, 10.

Now Joſeph was ſold by the Merchants, and bought by Putiphar, (an Egyptian Lord, and ſteward of King Pharaohs houſhold) who held him in high eſtimation, and trained him up in all liberal Sciences, ſuffering him to live, not after a ſervile, but liberal manner, and committing unto his charge the care of his houſhold; all which favours he made uſe of.
Yet was he no wayes diverted by theſe his priviledges and promotions, from his habitual O virtue; teſtifying hereby, that prudence doth not ſubmit to adverſe fortune, if a Man uſe the ſame orderly, and not at that time only when fortune fawneth and flattereth.

Gen. 39. 7, 9, 10

Putiphars Wife ſolliciteth Joſeph to lie with her.

The year of the World, 2217. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1747.

A It fortuned not long after, that his Maſters Wife fell in love with him, both for his beauty, and for his wit and diligence; and ſhe imagin'd that if ſhe open'd her mind to him, ſhe might eaſily enjoy him; and that he would eſteem it a part of his felicity to be loved by his Miſtriſs. All which ſhe fancied, having onely regard to that ſervile condition wherein at that preſent he was, and not to his manners, which continued always virtuous, notwithſtanding any change that could happen unto him. So ſhe diſcover'd to him her paſſion, and deſir'd him to grant her an amorous encounter: but he refuſed her demand, alledging, that it was a moſt wicked requital towards his Maſter, if it ſhould come to paſs, that he who had bought him, and ſo greatly honoured him, ſhould receive ſo great an injury and outrage from him. He exhorted her therefore to conquer her B appetite, and to lay aſide all hope of ever compaſſing her concupiſcence; alledging unto her, That deſire is then leſs active, when hope is extinguiſhed; and that he had rather ſuffer all miſchief imaginable, than conſent or condeſcend unto her in that wickedneſs. And although (ſaid he) it be undecent for a Servant to contradict the will of his Miſtriſs, yet, the filthineſs of the fact diſſuaded him from attempting the ſame. This repulſe, more and more inflam'd her, having ſuppoſed that Joſeph would not deny her; and her diſordinate affections encreaſing daily ſhe deviſed and complotted a new means, in hope to bring her love to the deſired iſſue.

Whereas therefore a ſolemn and publick Feaſt was at hand, wherein (according to cuſtom) the Ladies were wont to adorn the ſolemnity by their preſence; ſhe fained C a ſickneſs, and perſuaded her Husband to believe it, hoping by this means to have the better opportunity, being alone, to ſolicite Joſeph; which falling out accordingly, ſhe began to court and careſs him with theſe flattering diſcourſes, That he had done well, if (upon her firſt requeſt) he had obeyed her, without any contradiction, in reſpect of her dignity who made ſuit to him; and her incredible paſſion, which had ſo far commanded her, that notwithſtanding ſhe were his Miſtriſs, ſhe had debas'd her ſelf ſo much as to ſolicite him: that now he ſhould behave himſelf more wiſely and better; if in amends of his forepaſſed obſtinacy he at laſt would conſent. For if he expected this her ſecond ſummons, ſhe now made it far more affectionate and importunate than the former, for (ſaith ſhe) I have fained ſickneſs to this end, to ſolicite and prefer thy company D before a publick triumph. Or if at firſt thou didſt miſtruſt me, thou may'ſt hereby conceive that I do not maliciouſly tempt thee, in that I yet continue in the ſame affection. For which cauſe either make choice of this preſent pleaſure, and be obſequious to her that loveth thee, in hope of further preferments, or be aſſured of my hate and revenge, if thou preferreſt thy opinion of chaſtity before my favour. For be aſſured that thy chaſtity ſhall profit thee nothing, if I accuſe thee to my Husband, and avow, that thou ſoughteſt to violate me: for though thy allegations be more true, yet ſhall my words be of more force, and my accuſations more acceptable in Putiphars ears than thine. But neither by theſe words, nor her Tears, the witneſſes of her vows, could Joſeph be perverted; nor could flatteries allure him, nor terrors compel him to forſake E his reſolved chaſtity; but he conſtantly contemned thoſe unjuſt afflictions, wherewith ſhe threatned him: chooſing rather to ſuffer any miſery whatſoever, than to be carried away to ſuch criminal pleaſures; being well aſſured that he was worthy of extreme puniſhment, if on a womans entreaty he ſhould condeſcend to any ſuch treachery. He admoniſhed her of her duty, alledging the Laws, rights, and cuſtoms of Matrimony, willing her rather to reſpect them, than her inordinate luſt; which is ſpeedily followed with repentance, and a continual fear of being diſcovered: whereas conjugal fidelity is void of fear, and attended by a good conſcience before God and Man. Moreover, that it was more convenient for her to govern and command him as his Lady and Miſtriſs than to debaſe her ſelf, making him the partaker of their common ſin; and far more F pleaſant to be aſſured in the confidence of a good life, than in ſecret to commit ſin. By theſe, and ſuch words, he endeavor'd to abate the violence of her furious paſſion, and to reclaim her from her depraved fancies to ſubmit to the law of reaſon: but ſhe, the more inſtantly he diſſuaded, the more earneſtly invaded him; and when by no means ſhe could pervert him by words, ſhe laid violent hands upon him, to conſtrain him by force. But Joſeph unable to endure any longer the impudence of the Woman, leaving his Garment behind him, whereby ſhe held him, fled ſuddenly out of the chamber. She, partly impelled by the grief of repulſe, partly mov'd with fear, leſt her laſciviouſneſs ſhould be made known to her Husband, decreed firſt of all falſly to accuſe Joſeph, and by this means to take revenge upon him; holding it to be a craft worthy a G Womans Wit, to anticipate and firſt of all to accuſe her accuſer. She therefore ſat down ſad and perplexed, colouring the grief of her defrauded luſt, under the cloak of indignation, for her attempted honour and violated chaſtity. And when her Husband came home, and being troubled to behold her ſadneſs, demanded the cauſe thereof. H Thou deſerveſt to live no longer (ſaid ſhe) my Husband, if thou do not rigorouſly puniſh that wretched ſlave, who hath attempted to violate thy Bed, forgetting both what he was when he came into thy houſe, and with how great goodneſs thou haſt entertained him; and who inſtead of teſtifying his gratitude for the ſame, hath not forborn to offer injury, even to thine own Wife; and which is more, on an holy day, and in thine abſence: whereby it manifeſtly appears, that the moderation which hitherto he hath pretended, rather proceeded of ſervile fear, than native modeſty. And that which hath the more emboldned him, is, that (beſides all hope, and beyond his merit) thou haſt favoured him: for ſeeing all thy goods committed to his truſt and diſpenſation, and that he was preferred before all thine ancient Servants, he thought it lawful likewiſe I for him to attempt and outrage thy Wife. And to procure more credit to her words, ſhe produced his Garment, which (as ſhe ſaid) he left behind him, when he endeavored to violate her. Putiphar moved with the words and tears of a woman, and attributing too much to his wives diſſembling love, omitted the further and faithful inquiſition of the truth, and after he had praiſed his Wives faith and loyalty, he caſt Joſeph, thus condemned of heinous wickedneſs, into the Priſon of Malefactors, eſteeming his wives chaſtity, and commending it the more, in that he was now made a witneſs of her approved honeſty.

The Bakers Dream, v. 16.

But Joſeph committing his innocency to God, neither took care how to excuſe himſelf, nor to declare how the matter had paſs'd: but ſilently ſuffering the neceſſity of his Bonds, he comforted himſelf with this only hope, that God was more powerful then K they that had impriſoned him; and accordingly he ſoon found the effects of his providence. For the keeper of the Priſon conſidering both his faith and diligence in all that he employed him in, and the comelineſs of his perſon, looſed him out of Bonds, and by that means in ſome ſort leſſened his miſery; giving him alſo an allowance more liberal than the reſt of the Priſoners had. Now, when they that were in the Priſon (as often as they had intermiſſion from their labour) conferred together (as Men in miſery are wont to do) and queſtioned among themſelves, of the cauſes of their miſfortunes; a certain Butler of the Kings (condemned by him, in diſpleaſure, to be caſt into Irons) grew familiar with Joſeph: and for that he accounted him a prudent and provident Man, he told him his Dream, praying him, that if any preſage might be L gathered thereby, he would expound it unto him; lamenting his misfortune, that he was not onely perſecuted by the Kings diſpleaſure, but alſo when he ſhould take his reſt, troubled from Heaven by Dreams. For he ſaid, that in his ſleep he beheld three great cluſters of Grapes hanging on three Branches of a Vine, which were all ripe, and ready to be gathered; and that he thought he preſſed them into a Cup, which the King held; and that afterwards, having ſtrained the Muſt, he offered it to the King, and that he willingly drank thereof. When he had ſhewed him his Dream, he deſired him, that if he had any knowledge given him from God, he would vouchſafe to interpret his Viſion unto him. Joſeph bade him be of good courage, and expect, that within three days he ſhould be delivered from his Bonds, admitted again to the Kings ſervice, and M reſtored to his former credit. For (ſaid he) the Vine bringeth forth a fruit very good, and profitable for Mans uſe; by the uſe thereof, faith and frendſhip is confirmed amongſt them, diſcords diſſolved, and troubles and ſorrows aſſwaged, in ſtead of which, pleaſures ſucceed. Since, ſaid he (as thou telleſt me) the King favorably received the Wine preſſed out by thy hands, know that thou haſt a good Dream offered thee, and that it ſignifieth thy deliverance from miſery within three dayes, according to the number of thoſe Cluſters which thou gatheredſt in thy Dream. Remember me therefore, I pray thee, as ſoon as the event hath approved this my prediction to be real and true; and when thou art at liberty, forget not us that are left here to lie in miſery, for I am not here thruſt into Bonds for my wickedneſs, but I am puniſhed like a Malefactor for my N Vertue and Modeſty; in that I rather reſpected the honour of the houſe in which I lived, and his credit who committed me to Priſon, than mine owne pleaſure. The Butler, rejoyced greatly at the interpretation of his Dream, and expected the event. Now a certain other Man, the Kings Baker, being in the ſame Priſon with the Butler, and conceiving ſome hope through Joſeph's ſo happy interpretation (for that he likewiſe had ſeen a Viſion) deſired him to expound unto him what interpretation was to be had of a Dream, which he had had the night paſt, and which he related in theſe words. Me thought (ſaid he) I caried three Baskets on my head: of which, two were filled with bread, and the other with fleſh, and divers other kind of cates, ſuch as are prepared for Kings: But the Birds of the air hovering round about me, devoured O all the victuals, being nothing frighted by me, although I endeavored to drive them away. Which ſaid, he expected a preſage no leſs fortunate than the former.

A But Joſeph, after he had attentively conſider'd the circumſtances of the Dream, told him that he would rather have informed him of more favorable ſucceſs than his Dream did portend; and that he had only two days left to live, which were ſignified by the two Baskets; but on the third he ſhould be hanged and devoured by the Fowls, which he could not drive from him. Neither did it otherwiſe fall out with both of them, than Joſeph had foretold: For upon the perfixed day, the King (celebrating the feaſt of his Nativity) commanded that the Baker ſhould be hanged, and the Butler delivered from his Bonds, and reſtored to his former office. But God delivered Joſeph (after he had for the ſpace of two years ſpent his time in the miſery of the Priſon, and was in the mean ſpace no ways aſſiſted by the ungrateful Butler) by preordinating this means B and manner of his liberty. King Pharaoh having in one and the ſame night ſeen in his ſleep two Dreams, which he conceived were of ill preſage to him, though he had forgot the explication of them which had been made to him at the ſame time; early in the morning (calling before him the learnedſt among the Egyptians) he required the interpretation thereof. Now when he could in no ſort be ſatisfied by them, he became more and more troubled: which the Butler perceiving, he called to mind Joſeph, and his wiſdom and prudence in theſe ſorts of conjectures, and repairing unto the King, told him of Joſeph, and of his Viſion which he had whil'ſt he was in Priſon, together with Joſeph's interpretation, and the event thereof, and how the ſame day, the Maſter of the Bakers being condemned to the Gallows, gave greater credit to his predictions: C how he was kept Priſoner as a ſlave by Putiphar, the Maſter of his houſhold, and that he was a Hebrew, as himſelf ſaid, deſcended of good and honourable Parents. Command him therefore (ſaid he) to be ſent for, neither deſpiſe the Man for his preſent miſery, for thou maiſt manifeſtly underſtand by him, the ſignification of thy Dreams. Hereupon the King ſent for him preſently, and friendly taking him by the hand, ſpake to him after this manner. I underſtand by the report of my Servant, that thou art prudent; and therefore deſire thee to ſhew me the interpretation of my Dreams in ſuch manner as thou diſcoveredſt his unto him, and thou ſhalt do me an high pleaſure: but beware thou neither conceal any thing for fear, nor ſpeak for flattery, nor feed me with falſhoods, but tell me all things truly, although ſuch as may breed my diſcontent to hear them.
D Me thought as I was walking by a River ſide, I ſaw ſeven well fed and fat kine, which came out of the River into the paſture: and again, me thought ſeven others came from the paſture to meet them, which were very lean and ugly to behold; theſe lean devoured the ſeven others that were fat and great, yet were never the more increaſed, but were all of them miſerably vexed with hunger. But after this viſion, being awaked out of my ſleep, and troubled in my mind, what it might ſignifie, being ſeized by little and little by a pleaſant ſlumber, I fell a ſleep again; And again, I ſaw a viſion more prodigious than the former, and which likewiſe troubles and terrifies me more. For I ſaw ſeven ears of Corn ſprung out of one root, that hung down and bowed their heads, becauſe they were loaden with grain ready to be reapt: after which, there appeared E ſeven other weak, and dry ears, which devouring thoſe other great and full ears, left me highly aſtoniſhed. Hereunto Joſeph anſwered: This Dream (O King) although it hath been ſeen in two figures, yet it importeth one and the ſame accident, which is to enſue.
For both thoſe ſeven lean Oxen and thoſe ſeven dry ears of Corn, which you ſaw devour the ſeven fat Oxen, and ſeven full ears of Corn, fore-ſignifie a Famine and ſcarcity in Egypt, for ſo many years as there were Oxen and ears of Corn in good plight: ſo that the fertility of theſe good years ſhall be conſumed by the ſterility of ſo many other years, according to their number; and there ſhall be ſuch ſcarcity of neceſſary proviſion, that it ſhall be hard to prevent and ſupply the defect: all which is ſignified by thoſe ſeven lean kine which having devoured the good, could not be ſatisfied by the ſame. All F theſe things God foretels unto Men, not to the end they ſhould be terrified and affrighted; but that being forewarn'd they may provide for themſelves, and the more eaſily prevent the imminent danger. If therefore thou ſhalt lay up and ſtore the abundance of the plentiful years, Egypt ſhall not feel the penury that ſhall follow. And when the King (admiring Joſeph's prudence and wiſdom) demanded after what manner he might provide in the time of plenty, to prevent and redreſs the future ſterility, he warned and counſelled him, that the Egyptians ſhould uſe parſimony and that that which remained of thoſe years ſuperfluity, might be reſerved for future neceſſities. He counſelled him alſo to command the husbandmen to hoard up their Corn in their Barns, and only to diſtribute to the People ſo much as was ſufficient, and no more. Hereupon the G King (not only praiſing Joſeph's counſel, but alſo his interpretation of his Dreams) made him Lord and Commiſſary of all his ſtore; and commanded him to provide whatſoever he thought neceſſary for his ſervice and the good of his People: aſſuring

V. 17. Joſeph commandeth his Brothers to Priſon.

He was now about thirty years old, and was held in great honour by the King, being for his extraordinary prudence, ſirnamed by him Pſontomphanech, which in the Egyptian language ſignifieth, The diſcoverer of hidden things: he was alſo honoured with a Wife of great dignity. By the Kings order likewiſe he took to Wife a Virgin, Daughter to Putifar K the Heliopolitan Prieſt, whoſe name was Aſaneth, by whom he begat Children before the Famine began in Egypt. The elder of which was called Manaſſes, which ſignifieth Oblivion (becauſe attaining better fortune he grew into oblivion of his former miſery :) but the younger was called Ephraim (which ſignifieth Return, for that he was reſtored to the liberty of his anceſtors.) Now when, according to Joſeph's interpretation, the ſeven years of plenty and affluence were paſt in Egypt; the years of Famine began to infeſt the Land, and for that the evil was unexpected, the headlong multitude grievouſly preſſed with hunger and miſery, began to flock about the Kings gates and Garners. Whereupon the King called for Joſeph, who preſently diſtributing Grain to thoſe that wanted it, became without controverſie, the Father and conſerver of the commonalty. Neither K did he only ſell it thoſe that inhabited that Countrey, but to ſtrangers alſo; accounting the whole race of Mankind ſo allied together that 'tis reaſonable ſuch as want, ſhould be ſupplied by thoſe that have plenty. And becauſe the ſame calamity both oppreſſed Canaan and other Kingdoms of the world, Jacob alſo ſent all his Sons into Egypt to fetch Corn; (as ſoon as he underſtood that ſtrangers alſo had liberty to traffique in that place) only with himſelf he retained Benjamin, whom he begat on Rachel, and who was brother by the whole blood to Joſeph. When theſe ten Brethren arrived in Egypt, they repaired to Joſeph, beſeeching him that they might be permitted to buy corn: for nothing was done without his expreſs command; it ſeem'd an honour done to the King, to do honour to Joſeph.
He taking knowledge of his Brothers, who thought of nothing leſs than of him (by L reaſon that in his youth he was ſold away by them, and age had altered the lineaments of his face; and beſides, none of them could imagine that he had attained to ſo great dignity) determined to make trial of them, to the end he might the better gather how they were affected. For he both denyed them his licence to buy Corn, and commanded them alſo to be apprehended for Spies, telling them that they were of divers Nations, though they feigned kindred: for how can it be (ſaith he) that a private Man ſhould bring up ſo many worthy Sons; which felicity ſcarcely and very ſeldom is granted to Kings? This did he, to the end he might gather ſome intelligence of his Father, and in what eſtate he lived, during his abſence; and what was become of Benjamin his Brother: for he was much afraid, they had offered the ſame hard meaſure to the youth M which they had us'd to himſelf. Theſe words ſtruck them with a great fear, in regard of their imminent peril, ſuppoſing that they had travelled this long journey all in vain: and for that they ſaw their accuſation muſt be anſwered; Ruben the eldeſt of them, began after this manner to plead their common cauſe. We come not hither (ſaid he) as Spies, but dire Famine (whoſe furie we ſeek to prevent) hath compelled us to come into this Countrey, hoping in your humanity; who (as we have heard) have not only made offer of ſale of Corn, and means of ſuſtenance to your own Citizens, but alſo to all ſtrangers. That we are Brothers, and born of the ſame Father, our very countenances teſtifie, in that they vary not very much the one from the other. Our Father is called Jacob; by Nation, an Hebrew: who begat us, his twelve Sons, on four Women: N and while we were all living our affairs were fortunate and proſperous; but ſince the death of one of us, whoſe name was Joſeph, our domeſtic fortunes began to grow to ruine. Our Father languiſheth in continual lamentations; and his Tears do no leſs afflict us, than in times paſt the untimely death of our deareſt Brother did affect us.
Now are we come to buy Corn, having left in our Fathers cuſtody the youngeſt of our Brothers, called Benjamin. That thus it is, if thou pleaſe to ſend any one unto our houſe, thou mayeſt be aſſured. Thus ſpake Ruben, both on his own and his Brothers behalf, to remove Joſeph's ſiniſter opinion of them: who knowing that both his Father and Brother were in health, commanded them to be ſhut in Priſon, under pretence to call them to further examination, at better leiſure. Some three days O after (calling them before him) he began thus: Since (ſaith he) you proteſt, that you came not hither into this Kingdom on purpoſe, either to prejudice the King, or work

Treaſons

A Treaſons towards the State, and that you pretend your ſelves to be the Sons of one Father: you ſhall induce me to beleive, that your allegations be true, if leaving ſome one with me as pledge of your loyalties, (who ſhall be well entertained) you bear hence your deſired Corn to your Father, and return again unto me, bringing with you your Brother, whom (as you ſay) you left behind you: for this ſhall be an Argument that you lye not. Amazed at theſe words, and ſuppoſing that their extreme calamity was at hand, they lamented their misfortune; oftentimes expoſtulating amongſt themſelves, that God did now puniſh them for their cruelty towards Joſeph. But Reuben reprehended their too late and unprofitable repentance, ſaying, That thoſe afflictions which God (the juſt revenger of innocency) had inflicted on his impious Brothers, ought B patiently to be born. After this manner ſpake they one unto another, ſuppoſing that no Man was preſent who underſtood the Hebrew Tongue: and they all lamented, being inwardly touched with the words of Reuben; and condemned their perpetrated wickedneſs: for which, at that time, they thought that God did moſt juſtly puniſh them.
Joſeph beholding them in this perplexity, and unable to diſſemble any longer his Brotherly love, by reaſon the Teares already began to burſt out of his eyes, which at that time he deſired to conceal, departed from among them.

v. 21. Joſephs Brothers, repent them of that evil they had done unto him

Not long after, returning again unto them, he retained Simeon with him, to be in the mean time as a pledge, until their return; and giving them licence to buy their Corn, he commanded them to depart: giving withall a ſpeciall commandement to one C of his Servants, that the Money which they had brought to buy Corn, ſhould ſecretly be ſhut up in their Sacks, and they permitted to depart; all which his Servant performed.
But Jacobs Sons returning into Canaan told their Father all that had hapned unto them in Egypt, and how they were taken for Spies, and Traitors to that Countrey: and that when they proteſted, that they were all Brethren, and that the eleventh was left at home with their Father, the Governour would not believe them. Moreover, that Simeon was left pledge with the Governour, until Benjamin ſhould come thither to give teſtimony of their truth: whereupon they deſired their Father without fear or ſiniſter conceit, to ſend their younger Brother with them. But Jacob was diſpleaſed with that which his Sons had done; and whereas he was not a little grieved that Simeon was left behind, he D thought it worſe then death alſo to be deprived of Benjamin; and neither could Reuben with his Prayers (offering his Sons for pledges, that if any ſiniſter fortune ſhould fall upon Benjamin by the way, the Grandfather might revenge it on his Childeren) perſuade Jacob to yield conſent: but they uncertain what to do, were more and more terrified, in that they found their Money incloſed in their Sacks of Corn. Now when Corn began already to fail them, Jacob being compelled by force of Famine, deliberated to ſend Benjamin with his other Brothers: for they dar'd not return into Egypt, without him. And when neceſſity preſſed them daily more and more, and his Sons ceaſed not inſtantly to call upon him; yet was he ſtill doubtful and unreſolved: till at laſt Juda, a Man vehement by nature, began more freely to tell his Father that he was too E careful of his Brother Benjamin to whom nothing could happen without the will of God, whither abroad or at home: and that without this ſuperfluous care of his Son Benjamin, endangered his own and all their lives, which could not ſubſiſt but by the relief which was to be had out of Pharaohs Countrey; that he ought alſo to have care of the life of Simeon, leſt whileſt he delayed to ſend Benjamin on the journey, Simeon in the mean time ſhould be ſlain by the Egyptians. Moreover he exhorted him to commit the care of his Son to God, promiſing to bring him back again in ſafety, or elſe to die together with him: and propoſing, that certain Fruits of Canaan, as Balm, Stacte, Terebinth, and Honey, ſhould be ſent as Preſents to Joſeph, together with the double price of their Corn. Thus ſhedding Tears on both ſides, they depart from their Father, F leaving him miſerably tormented for the health of his Sons; and contrariwiſe ſuſpecting with themſelves, leſt through his abſence their Father ſhould dye with ſorow. And ſo travelling into Egypt, they mitigated their preſent grief with the hope of better fortune.
No ſooner were they arrived there but they repaired unto Joſeph; being ſore afraid, leſt it ſhould be laid to their charge, that by fraud and deceit they had carried away with them the price of their former Corn: which preſently, before Joſeph's ſteward, they carefully excuſed, ſaying, That they found the Money, among the Wheat at ſuch time as they emptied their Sacks; which now, in diſcharge of their truſth, they had brought back again. But he denying that he ever miſſed their Money, and they being delivered from this fear, began to be more ſecure; ſo that Simeon was ſuddenly G ſet at liberty, to converſe among his Brethren. Now, when Joſeph was returned from the ſervice of the King, they offer him preſents: and he enquiring of them, how their Father did? they anſwered, that he was in health. Then perceiving that Benjamin was yet alive, whom he ſaw among them, he ask'd whether that were their younger Brother? H and hearing that it was, he only uttered theſe words, That God's providence was over all things, and departed from them, being unwilling that any of them ſhould ſee him ſhed Tears, which he could not any longer contain. Inviting them afterwards unto a Banquet, he commanded them to ſit down in order, according as they were wont to do when they were with their Father; and whereas he kindly entertained all of them, he honoured Benjamin with a double ſhare. After the Banquet, when they were all laid down to reſt, he commanded the ſteward to meaſure out the Wheat which every one ſhould bear away with him, and to hide the price thereof again in their Sacks: but in Benjamins Sack, he commanded him to put his Cup which he ordinarily made uſe of.

This he did, with intent to make triall of their loves towards Benjamin; and whether I they would ſtick unto him, being accuſed of Theft, or leave him behind as a malefactor, and return unto their Father, as if the matter no wayes touched them. Which being done according as he had commanded, early in the morning all Jacobs Sons aroſe, and taking with them Simeon, departed onwards of their journey; rejoycing as well at his reſtitution, as Benjamins return, whom they both promiſed and proteſted to bring back again to their Father; when behold, ſuddenly a Troop of Horſemen beſet them round; amongſt whom, was that Servant who had hid the Cup in the Sack. They being troubled by this ſudden incurſion, and asking, why they ſet upon them whom they ſo lately had both invited and entertained ſo honourably? The Egyptians anſwered, and exclaimed againſt them, calling them wicked Men, who forgetting the late benefits received, K and Joſeph's gentleneſs and humanity, were ſo wicked, as to return him injuries for his courteſies; threatning them that they ſhould be puniſhed for their Theft: and telling them, that although for a time they had deceived the Officer of the Table, yet could they not deceive God; and again asking them, whether they were well in their wits, in ſuppoſing that for this offence they ſhould not be incontinently puniſhed? with theſe, and the like ſpeeches, the Servant inſulted over them. But they, who nothing at all ſuſpected this ſubtilty, accuſed him ſaying, That they wondred at the Mans unreaſonableneſs, in ſo raſhly accuſing them of Theft, who had not kept back the price of their Corn, which they found in their Sacks, whereas none but themſelves knew of that Money; ſo far were they from purpoſely offering any wrong. Yet in that they thought the ſearching L would better ſatisfie them, than denial, they bid them ſearch their Sacks; offering themſelves, each of them, to ſuffer puniſhment, if any one of them were found guilty of the Theft. This ſearch which they offered, the Egyptians accepted; yet agreed the puniſhment ſhould be inflicted onely on him who had done the injury. Afterwards beginning to ſearch, and orderly looking into each Mans Sack, at length they came to Benjamin; not that they were ignorant the Cup was hid in his Sack, but that they might ſeem to diſcharge their duty more exactly. Now all the reſt being ſecure in themſelves, they were only careful of their Brother Benjamin; and they hoped that he would not be found guilty of falſhood: for which cauſe, they more freely upbraided their perſecutors; objecting unto them, how, through their importunity, they had been hindred M a good part of their journey. Now as they ſearched Benjamins Sack, they found the Cup; whereupon all the Brothers began to mourn and lament, both bewailing their Brothers misfortune, who was preſently to ſuffer death for the Theft; and their own miſhap, who having plighted their faith unto their Father for Benjamins ſafe return, were compelled to falſifie the ſame through this accident. And that which further increaſed their grief, was, that when as they moſt of all hoped to be free from dangers, they were, by fortunes envy, thruſt into ſo great calamity; confeſſing themſelves to be the authors both of their Fathers, and this their Brothers misfortune; in that they had never ceaſed to importune and compel their Father (although he were unwilling, and reſiſted) to ſend the Child with them.

ver. 12. Benjamin is attached for Theft.

Now the Horſemen having laid hands on Benjamin, led him unto Joſeph, and his Brothers N followed him. Joſeph beholding his Brother in the others hands, and the reſt bemoaning him round about them; Have you, ſaid he (O moſt wicked Men) either ſo contemned my humanity, or Gods providence, as that you durſt attempt ſuch a hainous injury againſt him who entertained you with hoſpitality, and diſmiſſed you with benefits?
To whom they anſwered, that they were ready to ſuffer puniſhment for Benjamin, calling again to their remembrance, Joſeph's injuries, ſaying; that he was happy who delivered by death from life was exempt from all calamities: and that (if he lived) God inflicted that plague on them for his ſake. They ſaid alſo, that they were the plague and great misfortune of their Father, becauſe that to the former ſorrow which he had endur'd O ever ſince the time of Joſephs death, they had alſo annexed this new miſery: neither did Reuben deſiſt to reproach them in bitter manner with the wickedneſs which they had committed.

A committed. But Joſeph told them that he diſmiſſed them all (ſeeing that their innocence was proved to him) and would be contented with the Lads puniſhment: for (ſaid he) neither is it reaſonable that he ſhould be delivered for the ſake of thoſe who have not offended: nor they puniſhed for him that hath done the Theft: He commanded them therefore to depart, and promiſed them ſafe conduct on their way.

Judah's Oration unto Joſeph for Benjamin.

Whileſt all of them were grievouſly wounded with theſe words (ſo that ſcarcely one of them could ſpeak for ſorrow) Juda (who had perſuaded his Father to ſend Benjamin with them, and who above the reſt was a Man of confidence) purpoſed to expoſe himſelf to all danger in that reſolution to deliver his Brother: whereupon he addreſſed himſelf to Joſeph, and ſpake thus, My Lord (ſaid he) we confeſs that we are all B ready to ſuffer puniſhment, though we have not all of us committed the offence, but onely the youngeſt; and though we ſuppoſe his life to be almoſt deſperate, yet our onely hope reſts in your goodneſs and clemency. We beſeech you therefore, that you will have compaſſion of us, and be pleaſed to take counſel, not of your juſt indignation, but your native goodneſs; ſince 'tis proper to great minds, as yours is, to ſurmount thoſe paſſions, to which onely vulgar Souls give way, and are wont to ſubmit. Conſider, I pray you, whether it ſtand with your dignity to kill thoſe, who preſent themſelves to be puniſhed, and deſire in no ſort to live, except it be by the benefit of your mercy? Suffer not your ſelf to be deprived of this honour, after you have delivered us from Famine, and liberally furniſhed us with Corn to carry to our Family, labouring under the ſame calamity. For 'tis one and the ſame bounty to continue them in life, who are afflicted C with Famine; and not to take it from them, who have merited death: And you ſhall ſave thoſe whom you have fed; and that life which you would not ſuffer to fail by Famine, reſtore and give again: whereby your clemency will be more commendable, whil'ſt you give both life, and thoſe things likewiſe whereby life is maintained. Moreover, I think that God himſelf hath given you this occaſion to declare your virtue, that it may appear that you ſet lighter by the injuries offered unto you, than by your will to do good; and that you are not only liberal to them who are poor and innocent, but merciful to thoſe that are guilty. For although it be a glorious thing to yield ſuccor in adverſities; yet is a Prince no leſs honoured by his clemency, eſpecially in a cauſe that concerneth his particular intereſt; for if they that remit ſmall offences, are followed by deſerved praiſe, what is it to reſtrain a Man's anger in a capital Crime? Doth it not D very near approach the Divine clemency? And had I not good experience by Joſeph's death, how grievouſly my Father taketh the want of his Children, I would not ſo earneſtly intreat for his ſafety who is ſo dear to him; or if I did, it ſhould be only to contribute to the praiſe of your clemency; and were there not ſome to whom our death would bring both grief and diſcontent, we were willing all of us to ſuffer puniſhment. But now whereas we have not ſo much commiſeration of our ſelves (though as yet we are but young, and have not much taſted the pleaſures of life) as of our diſconſolate Parent, who is oppreſs'd not only with Age, but Grief, we beſeech you, not for our own ſakes, but for his, to grant us life, though at this day we are under your juſtice for our offence. Aſſuredly he is a good Man, and hath omitted nothing to render us like himſelf; worthy he is never to taſte or be tryed by any ſuch calamity, who now, through our abſence, is diſcruciated E with care and ſorrow. Now if he ſhould receive tydings of our death, and the cauſe thereof, he will not endure any more to live: the infamy of our deaths will ſhorten his days, and make his death by this means more unhappy; yea rather than hear the rumor of our ſhame, he would deſire to die beforehand. All theſe things conſidered, (although you are juſtly moved by this offence) remit the revenge unto our Father, and rather let your pity towards him, than our iniquity towards you, prevail. Grant this favor to his old age; ſince if deprived of our preſence, he neither will, nor can deſire to live: yea, grant it to the very name of a Father, wherewith you are honoured your ſelf: ſo God, the Father of all men, will bleſs you in that name, and proſper your Family; whom alſo you ſhall honour, if in reſpect of that common name, you take compaſſion of our Father, in conſidering the ſorrow that he ſhall endure, if he be deprived of F his children. It now lieth in your power to give us that which you may deprive us of, by that power which God hath given you: and in doing us this favour, you ſhall imitate the Nature of God, and in this reſpect become like unto him. For, ſince it lieth in your power to do both the one and the other, it were better you did good than evil; and contenting your ſelf with your power, not remember then to urge your revenge: but only think that your power was given you to keep and preſerve men; and that the more mercy you extend towards many, the more honour you redouble on your own head. Now it lieth in your power, by forgiving our Brothers error, to give us all life. For neither can we be ſafe except he be ſaved; neither may we return home unto our Father, except he return; but here muſt we ſuffer whatſoever our Brother ſuffereth. Neither do we crave any other mercy at your hand if we be repulſed in this, but that you will inflict G one and the ſame puniſhment on us, in no other manner, than as if we had been partakers of the Felony: for this were better for us, than that we our ſelves, through ſorrow, ſhould offer violence to our own Souls. I will not alledge or urge his youth, or judgment, as yet unripe; neither will I alledge,

Power given to ſave.

H alledge, that pardon is uſually granted to ſuch; but here will I make an end, That whether we be condemned, in that I have not ſufficiently pleaded his cauſe, or whether we be abſolved, we may wholly aſcribe this grace to your favour and clemency: to whoſe praiſe, this likewiſe ſhall be added, That not only you have ſaved us, but alſo, in pardoning us the puniſhment which we have juſtly deſerved, you have had more care of us, than we our ſelves. If therefore it be your pleaſure to adjudge him to die, let me ſuffer for him, and ſend him back unto our Father; or if it pleaſe you to retain him for your ſlave, I am more fit than he to do all ſorts of ſervices, as you may perceive; and I am ready to ſuffer all that which may be inflicted on me When Juda had ſpoken thus, he humbled himſelf at Joſeph's feet, endevouring, as much as in him lay, to mollifie and appeaſe his anger: in like ſort alſo all the other Brothers proſtrated themſelves, offering themſelves to die for Benjamin. I

Gen. 45. 1, 2. ad 16. Joſeph maketh himſelf known to his Brethren.

But Joſeph moved with pity, and unable any longer to perſonate a diſpleaſed Man, ſent away all thoſe that were preſent; and being alone with them, diſcovered himſelf unto his Brothers; and in this ſort to them only he diſcloſed himſelf, and ſaid, I cannot but commend the piety and love which you bear unto your Brother, which I find to be greater than I did expect, gathering my conjectures from thoſe things which in times paſt have hapned unto me. For, to this end have I done all this, that I might make trial of your brotherly affection: whereof ſince you have given me a ſignal proof, I will not aſcribe that which you have done unto me to your natures, but rather wholly to the Will of God, who hath at this preſent furniſhed you with all things which are profitable for you, and I hope will hereafter give you greater things by his ſpecial grace. K Seeing therefore I underſtand my Fathers rather deſired than hoped health, and find you to be ſuch as I deſired you ſhould be towards your Brother, I freely forget thoſe injuries which in times paſt were done unto me: rather making choice to give you thanks, as the Miniſters of God's Providence, that againſt this time provided for our common good, than remembring your forepaſt malice. I therefore pray you, that forgetting thoſe things which are paſt, you will be of good courage, and rejoyce that it hath pleaſed God to produce a good event of an ill intent. Let not the evil ſentence which in times paſt you pronounced againſt me, any ways trouble you, ſince you perceive it wanted effect: but rejoyce at theſe Works of God, and go and tell your Father that which you have ſeen, leſt being conſumed with immoderate care of you, I my ſelf be deprived of the chiefeſt fruit of my felicity, before he come to my preſence, and be made partaker of the ſame. L Wherefore depart you, and bringing with you him, your Wives and Children, and all your Kindred, come back unto me: for it were inconvenient (my dear Brethren) that you ſhould not be partakers of my felicity, eſpecially ſince this Famine is as yet to continue for the term of five years. This ſaid, Joſeph embraced his Brethren: but they were wholly confounded with tears and ſorrow, and the greater was their repentance, in that they had ſinned againſt ſo kind a Brother. After all this, there follow'd a Banquet. And the King underſtanding that Joſeph's Brethren were arrived, he (as if ſome good fortune had befaln him) very heartily rejoyced, and gave them Chariots laden with Corn, and Gold, and Silver, with other Preſents, to preſent their Father with, who, enriched with divers gifts, (ſome from their Brother to his Father, and others to themſelves, but eſpecially to Benjamin) returned home into their Countrey. M Now when Jacob underſtood by his Sons in what eſtate his Son Joſeph was, that he had not only eſcaped death (which he had ſo long time bewailed) but alſo that he lived in high proſperity, and miniſtred to the King of Egypt, and had, in a manner, the whole Government of the Kingdom in his hands: he eaſily believed all things that were told him, and acknowledged the great Works of God, and his Goodneſs ſhewed unto him, although for a time it ſeemed to be intermitted. And a little time after, he prepar'd himſelf to go and viſit his Son Joſeph.

CHAP. IV.

How Jacob with all his Family went into Egypt. N

The year of the World, 2239, before Chriſt's Nativity, 1725.

WHen Jacob arrived near the Fountain of Covenant, he offered in that place a Sacrifice unto God; and fearing leſt his Children ſhould inhabit Egypt, by reaſon of the fertility of the place, and that his poſterity, by not returning back into the Land of Canaan, ſhould loſe the poſſeſſion of that which God had promiſed them; and furthermore, doubting leſt that his Journey into Egypt, being by him enterprized without conſulting the Will of God, ſhould be prejudicial to his Children; ſuſpecting likewiſe leſt he ſhould die before he came to Joſeph's preſence, he was wonderfully perplexed in mind. Whil'ſt thus he ruminated, and caſt theſe things in his mind, he was ſurprized with a heavy ſleep, during which time God appeared unto him, and called him twice by his name; Jacob asking who it was that called him, God anſwer'd, Doſt thou not know (O Jacob) that God, who hath both protected thee, and thy Anceſtors, and ſuccoured you O

A in all your neceſſities; who contrary to thy father's purpoſe, made thee lord of his family; and when as by thy ſelf thou didſt travel into Meſopotamia, did not I bring it to paſs, that being matched in wedlock very happily, thou returnedſt into thy Countrey back again, being bleſſed with many children, and ſtored with much riches? Was it not I alſo that have kept thy family in ſafety, and when it ſeemed thou hadſt loſt Joſeph, I raiſed him to that high ſtep of dignity wherein now he liveth, and made him the next in dignity to the King of Egypt? And now alſo I am come unto thee, to this end, that I may guide thee in thy journey, and that I may foretel thee that thou ſhalt depart this life in the arms of Joſeph, and that thy poſterity ſhall be mighty and famous for many Ages, and ſhall poſſeſs that Land, the Empire whereof I have promiſed them. Encourag'd and made confident by this dream, he more willingly haſtned B towards Egypt with his ſons, and his family, whoſe number amounted to Threeſcore and ten. Their names, in that they are ſomewhat hard, I ſhould not mention, were it not to ſatisfie ſome, who contend that we are Egyptians, and not Meſopotamians. The ſons of Jacob therefore are twelve in number, of whom Joſeph came thither long before them. The reſt are theſe with their ſons. Reuben had four ſons, Enoch, Phales, Eſſalon, and Charmis. Simeon had ſix, Jumilas, Jamin, Puthod, Jachen, Zoar, and Zaar. Levi alſo had three, Gelſem, Chaath, and Marari. Juda had likewiſe three, Sala, Phares, and Zara; with two ſons of Phares, Eſron, and Amyr. Iſſachar had four, Thulas, Phruſas, Job, and Samaron. Zabulon had three, Sarad, Elon, and Janel. Theſe were the children which Jacob had by Leah, who alſo led with her Dinah her daughter: the number of whom C amounted to Thirty three. But Rachel had two ſons, of which the elder was called Joſeph, who had likewiſe two, Manaſſes, and Ephraim. Benjamin had ten, Boloſſus, Baccaris, Aſabel, Gela, Naman, Iſes, Aros, Nomphthis, Optatis, and Sarod. Theſe fourteen added to thoſe abovenamed, make up the number of Forty ſeven. And this was the legitimate iſſue of Jacob. But by Bala, Rachel's handmaid, he had Dan, and Nepthalim; this latter had four ſons, Elein, Gunnes, Sares, and Hellim. Dan had onely one ſon called Uſis. Now if theſe be added to the abovenamed, they make up the number of Fifty four. But Gad and Aſſer were born by Zelpha, Leah's handmaid; Gad was attended by ſeven ſons: Zophonias, Ugis, Sunis, Zabros, Erines, Erodes, and Ariel. Aſſer had one daughter, and ſix ſons, whoſe names were Jomnes, Eſſus, Juba, Baris, Abars, Melmiel. Theſe D fifteen being added to the foreſaid Fifty four, make up the number Seventy, together with Jacob. But Joſeph underſtanding that his father was at hand (for Juda poſted before to give him notice thereof) went out to meet him, and did ſo, near a Town called Heros. Jacob was fill'd with ſuch extreme and unexpected joy, that he had almoſt expired; and that of Joſeph was little leſs. He deſir'd his father to march onwards by eaſie journies, and taking with him his five brethren, haſted unto the King, ſignifying unto him, that his father with all his family were arrived. The King no ſooner underſtood it, but he joyfully asked Joſeph in what employments he took delight: who anſwer'd him, that his exerciſe was in keeping of Cattel, and that he had no other Trade. This anſwer he made, to the intent they might not be divided one from another, but that li- E ving all together, they might take care of their father: another reaſon was, leſt emulation ſhould happen betwixt them and the Egyptians, if ſo be they ſhould be converſant in the ſame profeſſion; whereas this people had little experience in the keeping of Cattel. Now when Jacob was brought into the King's preſence, and had done him reverence, and pray'd God for the proſperity both of him and his Realm, Pharaoh ask'd him how old he was? and he anſwer'd, that he was an hundred and thirty years old; at which when the King admir'd, he added, that his Anceſtors had lived far longer. Then Pharaoh appointed him and his ſons to dwell in Heliopolis, where alſo the King's ſhepherds had their paſtures. But the Famine increaſed in Egypt, and the calamity was without remedy, by reaſon that Nilus did not overflow the earth after its uſual manner; and on F the other ſide, God rained not upon the earth. Moreover, in that the ſterility was foreſeen, it was more grievous eſpecially to the Commonalty, who had laid up nothing, neither did Joſeph give them Corn without ready money: which when they began to want, they exchang'd their Cattel and Slaves for Corn; and they that had Lands, ſold a portion thereof unto the King for their proviſion. And when by this means all theſe poſſeſſions came into the King's hands, they went to inhabit here and there, as they could, to the end that the King might be more aſſured of the poſſeſſion of their Land; the Prieſts onely were excepted, to whom the Lands which they had, remained intire. Finally, this neceſſity reduced both the minds and bodies of the whole Nation into ſervitude, after ſuch a manner, that they eſteemed no labour or means unſeemly, that G might ſerve them towards their ſuſtenance. But when the Famine ceas'd, and the earth water'd by the overflow of the River, began to recover her former fertility; Joſeph viſiting every City of the Kingdom, and aſſembling the multitude in every one of them, Beſides, praiſing his Son Joſeph, for that forgetting I the injuries done unto him, he had beſtowed divers benefits on his Brethren, yea, and ſuch as well beſeemed his Benefactors, he commanded his Sons, that they ſhould admit Joſeph's Sons, Ephraim and Manaſſes, into their number, at ſuch time as they ſhould divide the Land of Canaan, as hereafter it ſhall be declared. Laſt of all, he prayed them to bury him in Hebron. He liv'd 150 years wanting three, being ſecond to none of his Anceſtors in piety, and obtain'd the ſame bleſſing, in that he was a man adorned with equal virtues. Joſeph, by the King's permiſſion, tranſported his Fathers body to Hebron, and there buried it very magnificently. But his Brothers fearing to return with him into Egypt, in that they ſuſpected leſt their Father being dead, he ſhould be revenged on them, in that they had not any Friend left alive, under whoſe favor they might hope for pardon, he K commanded them, that laying their ſuſpitions aſide, they ſhould fear no evil: and having brought them back again with him, he gave them great poſſeſſions: neither did he ever ceaſe to entertain them with brotherly kindneſs. But he likewiſe dyed, when he had lived 110 years; a man endowed with admirable virtue, prudent in all Affairs, and moderate in his Government: by which means it came to paſs, that neither his Foreign Birth, nor his Calamities, whereof we have ſpoken, did any ways hinder him, but that he was exalted and continued in high dignity. Ver. 16. 22. Pharaoh commanded that all the Male-children of the Iſraelites ſhould be put to death.

THE Egyptians are a Nation addicted to pleaſures and delicacy, impatient of labour, and affecting gain: whence it came to paſs, that bearing hatred to the Hebrews, and envying their happineſs, they were very evilly diſpoſed toward them. For ſeeing the Race of the Iſraelites flouriſh and abound in Riches, which they got by their labour and induſtry, they conceived an opinion that their advancement and increaſe, would M be the overthrow and decreaſe of the Egyptians; ſo that at length they forgot the benefits which Joſeph had done to them: and after the Royalty was tranſported into another Family, they committed divers outrages againſt the Iſraelites, and complotted againſt them in what manner they might more grievouſly afflict them. They enjoined them therefore to cut Nilus into divers Trenches, and to inviron their City with Walls, and to build Fortifications and Banks, whereby the inundations of the River might be diverted. They alſo employed our Nation in building their high and vain Pyramides, compelling them to learn divers Arts, and to accuſtom themſelves to endure Labour; and in ſuch afflictions liv'd the Iſraelites for the ſpace of 400 years, the Egyptians ſtudying nothing elſe but to vex them with continual labor, and our Countreymen endeavoring always to ſurmount N all theſe difficulties. Living in this eſtate, there grew afterwards another occaſion, which inſtigated them the more to ſeek the ruine and deſolation of our Nation. For one of the Sacred Secretaries (to whoſe predictions thoſe kind of People do very much attribute) foretold the King, that about that time there ſhould be One born among the Iſraelites, that ſhould grievouſly afflict the eſtate of the Egyptians, and wonderouſly enhance the glory of the Iſraelites, and ſurpaſs all other in virtue, and purchaſe to himſelf immortal glory, if ſo be he ſhould attain to mans eſtate. Wherewith the King being greatly terrified, publiſhed an Edict, by the advice of this Secretary, that whatſoever Male-child ſhould be born among the Iſraelites, it ſhould be caſt into the River to be drowned: he O commanded likewiſe the Egyptian Midwives diligently to obſerve the time when the Hebrew Women Travailed with Child, becauſe he truſted not to the Midwives of their own Nation.

A Nation. He Enacted alſo a Law with a penalty, that if any ſhould be ſo bold to conceal their Children, both they and all their Family ſhould be put to death. Great was their calamity, not only becauſe they were deprived of their Children, and the Parents themſelves made the Miniſters to murther their own Children; but alſo becauſe they foreſaw hereby, the certain and infallible extirpation of their whole Nation, by reaſon that when the Children were ſlain, the Parents themſelves, not long after, were aſſured to die: thus lamented they in themſelves the extreme misfortune whereinto they were fallen. But no man whatſoever, though he complot never ſo many ſtratagems, can reſiſt the Will of God. For both the Child, of whom the Sacred Secretary had fore-propheſied, was ſecretly brought up undiſcovered by the Kings Spies; and proved by the B events of his life, that he was no falſe Prophet. Amram, an Hebrew born, and a Noble man amongſt his Nation, fearing both the publick peril, leſt the whole Nation ſhould be brought to nothing by the want of iſſue; and his own private misfortune, whoſe Wife at home was big with Child, and ready to lie down, was troubled in his mind, and uncertain what to do. For which cauſe he made his recourſe unto God, beſeeching him that at the length he would have mercy on that People by whom onely he had been perpetually honoured; and that it would pleaſe him to bring to an end the preſent affliction, which threatned the whole Nation with utter ruine and deſtruction. God being moved to mercy by his moſt humble Prayer, appeared to him in a Dream, and comforted him, commanding him to be of good courage, telling him, That he had in memory the C piety of his Anceſtors, and that he would reward them for it, even as in times paſt he had been gracious to their Forefathers. For it was he that had increaſed their poſterity, and multiplied them to ſo mighty a Nation, that by his favor Abraham departing alone out of Meſopotamia into Canaan, beſides other felicities, had iſſue by his Wife that was formerly barren, and left ample poſſeſſions to his Succeſſors: to Iſmael, Arabia; to Chetura's Children, Troglottite; and to Iſaac, Canaan. Nor could they ever forget without impiety and ingratitude, the attempts alſo which were happily atchieved in War by his aſſiſtance; that Jacobs Name is renowned amongſt Foreign Nations, both in reſpect of the felicity wherein he lived, and that which by hereditary Right he left to his poſterity; who taking their original from 70 Men that accompanied their Father into Egypt, D were now increaſed to the number of 600000: and aſſuring him that now alſo, he would take care of them all in general, and of him in particular. That this Child, for fear of whoſe Nativity, the Egyptians have condemned all the Hebrews Children to death, ſhould be born to him: that he ſhould not be diſcovered by the conſtituted Spies; and having eſcaped beyond all expectation, ſhould he be brought up, and in due time deliver the Hebrews from the thraldom of the Egyptians, and obtain an eternal memory for this his famous action, not only amongſt his own Nation, but alſo amongſt ſtrangers: that he ſhould alſo have a brother, that ſhould deſerve both in himſelf, and in his poſterity, to inherit the Prieſthood for ever. After theſe things were declared in a Viſion unto Amram, he awak'd, and told it to his wife Jochabel; and notwithſtanding the prediction E of this Dream, their ſuſpition and fear the rather increaſed more and more: for they were not only penſive in reſpect of their Child, but alſo by reaſon that the future great good fortune that was promiſed them, ſeemed incredible. But ſoon after, the woman being brought to Bed, gave credit to the Oracle, having had ſo eaſie and gentle a Labor, that ſhe beguiled the Overſeers and Spies, in that ſhe felt none of thoſe Throes which commonly afflict ſuch as are in Labour: ſo that ſhe nouriſhed the Infant three months ſecretly in her houſe, without being in any ſort diſcovered. But afterwards, Amram fearing to be ſurprized, and doubting leſt he ſhould incur the Kings diſpleaſure, if the matter were diſcover'd, whereby both he, and the Child ſhould be made away, and Gods promiſes ſhould be fruſtrate, he choſe rather wholly to commit the ſafety of his ſon to F his Providence, ſuppoſing that if the Boy were hidden, which notwithſtanding would be hard to effect, yet it would be troubleſom unto him to live in continual peril both of his own and his ſons ſafety: moreover, he thought that God would provide ſome means of preſervation, to the intent that nothing of that which he had foretold, might be proved falſe. Having taken this reſolution, they prepared and made a Cradle of Sedge, after the manner of a Couch, ſo great, that it was ſufficient to lay the Child in at eaſe; and having pitched it on every ſide, leſt the water ſhould pierce the ſame, they put the Child in to it, and ſuffering him to float along the ſtream, committed him to the mercy of God. Whil'ſt in this manner it was born down by the ſtream, Mariam, the ſiſter of the young Infant, by her Mothers command, went along the Bank on the other ſide of G the River, obſerving whither at length the Basket would be carried, and where it ſhould arrive. At that time God manifeſtly declared, That nothing is atchieved by mans wiſdom, but that all things are brought to paſs by his admirable Providence; and that they,

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. al. 7.

Thermuthis, the King's daughter, walking along the River ſide, eſpied this Basket carried away by the courſe of the ſtream, and preſently commanded certain Swimmers to fetch it to Land, and bring it before her: who executing her Command, ſhe opened the Basket, and beheld the Child; who, in that he was fair and well featured, did greatly delight her. Thus God ſo loved and favoured Moſes, that he cauſed him both to be nouriſhed and brought up by them, who, for fear leſt he ſhould be born, had decreed to I deſtroy all the reſt of the Race of the Hebrews. Thermuthis therefore commanded them to fetch her a Nurſe who might give the Child ſuck: who refuſing the ſame, as all other Nurſes did that were ſent for to ſuckle him, Mariam, as if by good fortune, and not of ſet purpoſe, ſhe had light into their company, began to ſpeak thus unto Thermuthis: In vain (ſaid ſhe) O Princeſs, doeſt thou ſtrive to give this Babe ſuck by any but an Hebrew Nurſe, for he will not accept it: for if thou call unto thee a Nurſe of the ſame Nation, and agreeable with his nature, doubtleſs he will take the nipple. This Speech of hers being both heard, and plauſibly accepted, the Princeſs commanded her to bring her an Hebrew woman that gave ſuck; which ſhe diligently performing, returned, and brought her Mother with her, whom none of the aſſiſtants knew; and who preſenting her breaſt unto the Child, K he willingly took the dug: ſo that upon the Princeſs command, the ſuckling of the Child was wholly committed unto her. By reaſon of this accident, and for that he was caſt into the River, he was called Moſes; for the Egyptians call water, Mo; and ſaved, Yſes: ſo this name, compoſed of theſe two words, was impoſed on this Child; who afterwards (without exceptions) became the wiſeſt Man among the Hebrews, according as God had foretold: He was the ſeventh after Abraham; for he was Amrams ſon, and Amram ſon unto Cathis, and he to Levi, and Levi to Jacob; who was the ſon of Iſaac, who was the ſon of Abraham. He had a judgment riper than his age: for even amongſt his childiſh delights, he ſhewed himſelf more diſcreet than all his equals; and whatſoever he did, it gave teſtimony, that at ſuch time as he ſhould attain to Mans eſtate, he would be L capable of great things. When he was but 3 years old, God adorned and endowed him with an admirable beauty. He was ſo fair and amiable, that there was not any, how auſtere and inhumane ſoever, but in beholding him, would be aſtoniſhed. Yea, divers who met him, as he was carried through the ſtreets, turned themſelves about to behold him, and intermitted their other affairs, onely to look upon him: for the admirable beauty of this Infant, did raviſh all thoſe that ſaw him. Whence it came to paſs, that Thermuthis, in that ſhe had no other Iſſue, adopted him for her Heir; and carrying him to the King her Father, ſhe preſented him to him, ſaying, That ſhe was careful of a Succeſſor, by reaſon God had not vouchſafed him to have any Iſſue; for (ſaith ſhe) I have brought up this Infant no leſs excellent in wit, than divine in beauty, having received him miraculouſly from the M River Nilus, and I have decreed to adopt him my Child, and to eſtabliſh him as Succeſſor to thee in thy Kingdom. This ſaid, ſhe delivered the Infant into her Fathers arms: who, after he had embraced and hugged him at his breaſt, (to give his daughter the more content) he put his Diadem upon the Childs head: but Moſes pulling it from his head, after a childiſh manner, caſt it on the ground, and ſpurned it with his feet; which act of his was ſuppoſed ominous to the Realm, and dangerous for the King. Whereupon the ſacred Secretary (who had foretold, that his Nativity would be the deſtruction of the Egyptians) willed them to kill the Child, crying out with a loud voyce; to the King, after this manner: O King, this Child, by whoſe death God promiſeth us ſecurity, hath already confirmed the preſage, inſulting over thy Kingdom, and ſpurning thy Diadem: Take from the Egyptians N that fear which they have conceived of him, by his death; and from the Hebrews that hope which they build on his courage and life. But Thermuthis haſtily conveyed him thence, and the King was not overforward to lay hands on him, by reaſon that God diſpoſed all things in this manner, in that he had a care of Moſes preſervation. He was therefore very carefully brought up: and by reaſon of him, the Hebrews in general were repleniſhed with good hope; but by the Egyptians, his education both was ſuſpected and grudged at: yet by reaſon that if the Lad ſhould have been ſlain, there was not any one, either akin, or adopted, that could pretend to the ſucceſſion of the Crown of Egypt, they abſtained from his ſlaughter. Being therefore thus born, and brought up, when he increaſed in years, he evidently, by his virtue, made it known unto the Egyptians, that he was O born to abaſe their pride, and to exalt the Hebrews, by this occaſion which enſueth. Ver. 11. The Egyptians war againſt the Ethiopians

A about them, ſpoiled and made pillage of all the Goods of the Egyptians; who, incenſed againſt them for the wrongs and injuries which they had done, levied an Army, intending to revenge them of that diſgrace which their Enemies had offered them: but in the Battel they were all put to flight, ſo that many of them were ſlain; and the reſt ſhamefully flying, returned with ignominy worſe than death, into their own Countrey. The Ethiopians proud with this good fortune, inſtantly purſued them: and ſuppoſing it a cowardly part, not to take the benefit of their preſent good fortune, and conceiving an aſſured hope of conquering Egypt, they enter'd the Countrey, and generally waſted the ſame: and having taſted of the ſweetneſs of pillage, without any temper or moderation in their Victory, they were encouraged to attempt greater matters. And whereas B they perceived, that having waſted all the Neighbor-regions, no man durſt ſally out, to encounter them in Arms, they marched forward toward Memphis, even to the Sea, arriving near no City that had the heart, or durſt make head againſt them. By which calamities, the Egyptians being much oppreſſed, they ſend one to ask counſel of the Oracle, by what means they might redreſs their miſeries; and when an anſwer was given them, That they ſhould chooſe an Hebrew to aſſiſt them in the Wars, the King commanded his daughter to give them Moſes, who, together with the Empire, might govern the whole Army. She taking an Oath of the King, that no injury or violence ſhould be offered him, delivered him into his hands; eſteeming it to be a great good fortune for Moſes, that he was called to the ſuccor of her Countrey: and, on the other ſide, blaming the Prieſts, C who were not aſhamed to demand his aid and aſſiſtance, whom they had adjudged to be ſlain as their common Enemy. But Moſes, exhorted by Thermuthis, and the King, willingly took the charge upon him. Whereat the Prieſts of both Nations were very joyful: for the Egyptians hoped, that when by his virtue and valor he had overcome their Enemies, they afterwards might more eaſily diſpatch and murther him, by ſome treaſon and ſiniſter means; and the Hebrews conceived an hope, that they might get out of Egypt, by reaſon that Moſes was the General of the Army. Moſes therefore making haſte, before ſuch time as the Enemies had any notice that he was diſlodged, he levied his Army, and conducted them, not along the banks of the River, but through the main Land; wherein he made manifeſt his moſt admirable prudence. For the journey by Land being very D dangerous, by reaſon of the multitude of Serpents, (which the Countrey thereabouts breeds of all ſorts, and ſome of that kind, that the like thereof are not ſeen in any other place, all different in malignity, and horrible form, and ſome winged ones, who not only offend thoſe that they encounter on the earth very privily, but alſo towre very high in the Air, and hover about to hurt thoſe that are not aware of them;) he, for the ſecurity of his Army, and to the end he might march without any inconvenience, invented this marvellous and admirable ſtratagem: He cauſed two Paniers of Sedge to be made, in form of Coffers, and filled them with certain Birds called Ibis, who are mortal Enemies to Serpents, and before whom the Serpents flee; and ſometimes, in flying from them like Harts, they are laid hold of, and ſwallowed by them. Otherwiſe theſe Birds are maE naged and made tame, and are not harmful to any but to Serpents: of whom I will now ceaſe to write any further, becauſe the Greeks do already know what kind of Bird it is.

The Egyptians require Moſes to be their Captain.

Moſes marcheth againſt the Ethiopians.

When therefore he arrived in the Countrey of Serpents, he let flie his Ibis againſt the venomous Beaſts, and made uſe of them to encounter the other. And having marched in this ſort, he ſurprized the Ethiopians, before they ſuſpected him; and ſuddenly charging them, he overcame them in Battel, ſpoiling them of the hope they had to conquer Egypt: and entring the Towns of Ethiopia, he razed them, and made a great ſlaughter of the Inhabitants. The Egyptian Army having taſted this happy ſucceſs under the conduct of Moſes, omitted not the purſuit; eſpecially, for that they ſaw that the Ethiopians were well nigh conquered, or rather wholly deſtroyed: and in the end having driven them F even to Saba, the chief City of Ethiopia, (which Cambyſes called Meroe, for the love which he bore unto his ſiſter, who was ſo called) they beſieged them. The City was ſtrong, and very hard to be aſſailed, by reaſon of the River Nilus which environs it round about: on the other ſide, the Rivers of Aſtapus and Aſtaobora, flow in ſo fiercely, that they could neither break the courſe of the water, nor wade over the ſtream: for the City is built in an Iſland, environed with a ſtrong wall round about, having great Ramparts betwixt the Rivers and the walls built, to reſiſt the inundations of the waters: by reaſon whereof, that the City could be very hardly taken, although the oppoſite Army had found means to paſs the water. Now, when Moſes was much troubled that his Army profited nothing, by reaſon that the Enemy durſt not encounter them in open field, G behold what a chance hapned: Tharbis, the daughter of the King of Ethiopia, beholding Moſes as he approached with his Army near the walls of the City, and ſeeing how valiantly he fought, and behaved himſelf, and wondring at the Exploits and Enterpriſes which which he made, (which was the cauſe that the Egyptians, almoſt deſpairing of their H eſtates and liberty, were grown deſperate) and how the Ethiopians, (not long before eſteemed the Conquerors, and happy in their warlike exploits and fortunate executions) were in the greateſt extremity of danger, ſhe was ſurprized with love of him, and for that this paſſion augmented more and more in her, ſhe ſent to him ſeven of her moſt faithful houſhold ſervants, to offer him her love. Which he accepted, on condition that ſhe ſhould deliver the City into his hands; promiſing her, by a ſolemn Oath, That when he was Maſter thereof, he would take her to Wife, without falſifying, or breach of his promiſe.

The matter was no ſooner motioned, but the effect followed. Having conquered the Ethiopians, and given thanks to God for the favors he had done him, Moſes accompliſhed the Marriage, and ſent the Egyptians back again into their Countrey. Who nevertheleſs I conceived great hatred againſt him, the Author and cauſe of their ſafety and victories; and began ſeriouſly to conſult and adviſe amongſt themſelves, how they might deſtroy him; ſuſpecting leſt by reaſon of the happy ſucceſs he had had, ſhould begin to think of making himſelf Maſter of Egypt. They accuſed him therefore of Murther before the King, who already of himſelf had him in ſuſpition, as well through the hatred he bare him for his noble carriage and courage, whilſt he was General, as alſo through the fear he had conceived of the deſtruction of Egypt, foretold by his Prieſts, who inceſſantly incited him againſt Moſes: ſo that the King was upon the point to lay hands on him, and murther him.

Exod. 3. 1, 2.
God appeared to Moſes in the buſh.

But he having intelligence of theſe practiſes, eſcaped, and fled ſecretly, flying from K his preſence through the Deſart, by which the Enemies leaſt ſuſpected his flight; and although at no place in his journey he found victuals to ſuſtain him, yet overcame he his penury by his patience. And arriving near a City of the Madians ſcituate upon the ſhore of the Red Sea, that was named by one of Abraham, and Chetura's ſons, he ſat him down near a Fountain, refreſhing himſelf, and taking his eaſe, after his laborious journey; for it was about Noon, and the City already appeared in his ſight. In this place an occaſion befel, by which he both gave proof of his virtue, and found an opportunity to better his eſtate. For whereas the Region is much troubled with want of water, the Shepherds had a cuſtom, to ſtrive which of them ſhould firſt poſſeſs the Pits, for fear leſt the water would be quite conſumed by others, before they and their Cattel had quenched L their thirſt. To this Fountain therefore there came ſeven Virgins, which were daughters of Raguel, otherwiſe called Jethro, the Prieſt, (whom the Inhabitants of that place held in great eſtimation) who had the charge to attend their Fathers flocks; for that is the exerciſe wherein the Troglodites are wont to employ their Women. Theſe haſted to draw ſufficient water for their flocks into the troughs, expreſly made to receive the water; and when in the mean time the ſhepherds came and ſurprized them, and drove away the Virgins, to the end they might be Maſters of the water, Moſes judging it a ſhame to himſelf to ſuffer this outrage, drove away the ſhepherds, who would have enjoyed that which appertained not unto them, and gave a juſt aſſiſtance to the diſmayed Maidens; who, as ſoon as they were returned into their Fathers preſence, told him the outrage M that was done them by the ſhepherds, and the help that they found by the hands of a ſtranger, beſeeching him that the courteſie which he had ſhewn unto them, might not be forgotten, but that he might receive ſome token of gratitude. The Father commending his daughters thankfulneſs towards their Benefactor, commanded them to bring Moſes into his preſence, to the end he might thank him according as he deſerved. As ſoon as he was come, Raguel told him, That his daughters had given him to underſtand, how kindly he had aſſiſted them: and having his virtue in admiration, he ſaid, that he had not adventured himſelf, nor done kindneſs to thoſe that were without ſenſe of the courteſies that were ſhewed unto them, but unto thoſe who were capable to give him thanks; yea, ſo ready to requite him, that the greatneſs of their requital ſhould far ſurpaſs the meaſure N of his humanity. He therefore adopted him for his ſon, and gave him his daughter Zephora to Wife, and made him Superintendent and Maſter of the flocks (in which, in thoſe days, the wealth and riches of moſt Nations conſiſted.) Moſes having obtained this good fortune at Jethro's hands, (for ſuch was Raguels ſirname) he abode there with him, and attended his flocks. But not long after he led his Cattel to graze near the Mountain Sinai, which is the higheſt of all thoſe that are in that quarter, and good for paſturage, by reaſon of the wholſom Herbs that grow thereabouts: which notwithſtanding was not fed upon before that time, becauſe the ſhepherds durſt not frequent it, in regard of an opinion of thoſe that dwelt in that Countrey, That God inhabited that Mountain. There hapned there unto him a marvellous Prodigy, which was, that a flame of fire ſeemed round about him in a Buſh, without offending either the green Herbs, or the Flowers, or O the Boughs charged with fruit, although the flames were great and vehement. He, not a God convinceth Moſes and the Iſraelites by miracles, to the end they might put truſt in his promiſes

A little amazed at this unexpected ſpectacle, at laſt grew more and more ſo, when he heard a voice iſſuing out of the fire, which called him by his name; charging him with bold-neſs, in that he was not afraid to tread upon that ground, which hitherto had been frequented by no Man; bidding him to depart afar off from the flame, and content himſelf with that viſion; for although that he were a virtuous Man, yet that he ought not to be curious to make further ſearch into the ſame. The ſame voice alſo told him, That the honour and glory which he obtained amongſt Men, was by the aſſiſtance of God: charging him to be of a good courage, and to repair into Egypt, for in that place he ſhould be Captain and Guide of the Hebrew Nation, and ſhould deliver the People which were there, from the outrage and ſervitude which they ſuffered. For (ſaid the voice) they ſhall B inhabit that happy Country wherein your Father Abraham dwelt, and they ſhall enjoy all ſorts of bleſſings, under the conduct of thee and thy prudence. Moreover, it commanded him, That having brought the Hebrews out of Egypt, he ſhould offer ſacrifice of Thankſgiving, at ſuch time as he ſhould arrive again in that place. And ſuch was the Oracle which he received out of the flame. Moſes altogether raviſhed at that which he had both heard and ſeen, ſpake thus: O Lord, it were madneſs in me, and no prudence, if I ſhould diſtruſt thy power, which I reverence, and which I know hath been manifeſted unto my Predeceſſors; notwithſtanding, I ſtand in doubt, how I, who am a Man of no eloquence, and of leſs force, ſhould perſuade my Brethren, by my words, to forſake the Countrey wherein they inhabit, to follow me into that Countrey whither I will conduct them. And although they C ſhould be perſuaded, how can I force Pharaoh to permit them to depart from thence, by whoſe labours and travels the Egyptians are daily increaſed in goods and riches? Whereupon God commanded him to truſt in his aſſiſtance, and to be of good courage, and promiſed that if he had need of eloquence, he would beſtow upon him the faculty of perſuaſion; or if he were driven to act any thing, that he would redouble his forces; commanding, That in confirmation of thoſe promiſes he had made him, he ſhould let fall his ſtaff upon the ground: which having done, a Dragon began to creep upon the ground, and in turning and rowling himſelf, lifted up his Creſt on high, making ſemblance, to defend himſelf againſt thoſe that ſhould aſſail him, and then a little while after became a ſtaff again. Afterwards he commanded him to put his hand into his boſom, and no ſooner D had he obeyed, but he drew it out altogether white, and in colour reſembling Chalk: and a little while after, it recovered its ordinary colour. Moreover, he further willed him to draw water out of the next Well, and to pour it on the ground, and he ſaw it turned into a bloody colour. Amazed at theſe accidents, he was commanded to be of good courage, and aſſured that he ſhould have great aſſiſtance. Moreover, that he ſhould uſe theſe ſigns before all Men, to the end, (ſaith God) that all may believe, that being ſent by me, thou doeſt all this according to my Commandment. Furthermore, I enjoin thee, That without any further delay, thou haſte into Egypt; and that thou travel day and night, without loſing time, without delaying any more, to ſuccor the poor Hebrews, grievouſly afflicted in Egypt. Moſes having no cauſe to diſtruſt that which God E had promiſed him, and being confirmed by theſe things, whereof he was both an eyewitneſs and hearer, he prayed God, that if there were any occaſion to expreſs the like power in Egypt, he would vouchſafe to further the effect: beſeeching him further, that he would not conceal his name from him, to whom he had participated the hearing of his voice, and the ſight of his preſence: that it might pleaſe him therefore to declare unto him his name, to the end, that when he ſhould offer ſacrifice unto him, he might call upon the ſame. God declared unto him his name, which before time had been concealed amongſt Men, and of which alſo it is not lawful for me to ſpeak. Moſes wrought theſe ſigns not only at that time, but alſo when or whereſoever he thought it requiſite: by all which he gave further credit to the fire which had appeared unto him, and aſſured him-F ſelf, that God would be his favourable Defender, that he would deliver his Brethren, and involve the Egyptians in great calamities. And after that he underſtood, that Pharaoh King of Egypt was dead, (during whoſe life, he fled from thence) he requeſted Raguel, to give him leave to depart into Egypt, for the profit of thoſe of his Nation; and taking with him Sephora, (who was Raguels daughter, and his married wife) and Gerſon and Eleazar, his children, which he had by her, he departed into Egypt. Now this name of Gerſon, in the Hebrew Tongue, ſignifieth Foreign: and Eleazar ſignifieth favoured by God; in memory, that Moſes had eſcaped from amongſt the Egyptians, by the aſſiſtance of the God of his Fathers. And as he approached near the Mountains, Aaron, his Brother, by the commandment of God, came forth to meet him; to whom he declared all that had G hapned unto him in the Mountain, and that God had given him in charge. And as they paſſed onward of their way, the Men of great eſtimation among the Hebrews (having intelligence of his coming) came out to meet him, before whom Moſes made uſe of the abovesaid power of doing Miracles, by reaſon he could not perſuade them by words: and they being aſtoniſhed at that which they had ſeen him do beyond their expectation, grew confident, and conceived a good hope of all things, ſeeing that God had a care of their ſafety. When he perceived that the Hebrews were ready to obey him, and that they proteſted to follow him in all that he ſhould command them, through the earneſt deſire they had to be at liberty; he preſented himſelf before the King, who had newly undertaken the Government, and ſhewed him the great benefits he had done unto the Egyptians, at ſuch time as they were deſpiſed by the Ethiopians, who had ſpoiled all their Countrey, and how he had ſpared no travel, but ſuſtained all the charge of the War, as if it had been waged for his own proper Nation. On the other ſide, he opened unto him the dangers which he had unjuſtly ſuffered for his recompence. He afterwards diſcourſed unto him that which had befallen him near the Fountain of Sinai, and the talk which God had in that place with him; and the ſigns in particular which had been ſhew'd unto him, in confirmation of thoſe things which were promiſed, exhorting the King not to miſtruſt or reſiſt the Will of God. The King hearing this, began to mock him: but Moſes made him ſee, in effect, the ſigns which he had ſhewed near the Mountain of Sinai. But the King, inſtead of being mov'd therewith, waxed angry, and grievouſly reviled him; accuſing him, for that in times paſt he fled away, for fear to be ſlain in Egypt, and at this preſent returned thither, under a ſubtile pretext, cloaking his Craft with Magick and Inchantment, the more to afright him. And at the ſame inſtant he called into his preſence the Prieſts of Egypt, to let him ſee thoſe ſigns, and to make it manifeſt, that the Egyptians were skill'd in thoſe Sciences; and that he alone was not Maſter in thoſe things, the which he boaſted to perform by Gods power, but that they were deceits and ſhadows of marvels, to deceive the multitude. Whereupon the Prieſts caſt down their Rods, and they became Serpents. Moſes being moved herewith, ſaid, O King, I deſpiſe not the wiſdom of the Egyptians; but I proteſt, that that which I have done, doth ſo far ſurpaſs all their Magick and Art, as there is difference between divine and humane things. I will therefore ſhew you, that that which I do, is not by Inchantment, nor with a falſe appearance of verity, but by the providence and power of God. This ſaid, he caſt his Rod on the ground, commanding it to change it ſelf into a Serpent: whereupon it obeyed, and wandring here and there, it devoured all the Rods of the Egyptians, which ſeemed to be ſo many Serpents; and that done, Moſes took his ſtaff into his hand again, and it re-aſſumed its priſtine form; but the King being never the more aſtoniſhed, (but the rather incenſed at that which was done) ſaid, That this wiſdom and ſubtilty of Moſes, which he uſed in diſgrace of the Egyptians, ſhould profit him nothing. He commanded therefore the Overſeer of the Works, who had the Government of the Hebrews, that he ſhould remit nothing of their labour, but that he ſhould oppreſs them with more tedious and grievous tasks than they were wont to be put unto: whereupon (where he was wont to allow them ſtraw, to make their Tyle with) he forbare, after that time, to give them that allowance; and taxing them in the day-time to follow their work, he appointed them by night to ſeek their ſtraw, doubling thereby the weight of their former labour. Notwithſtanding all this, Moſes would neither deſiſt from his purpoſe, in regard of the Kings threatning, or the continual cry of his Countreymen, neither was in any ſort diſmayed thereat; but with a confident and undaunted mind, he reſolutely proceeded to reſtore his Countreymen to their deſired liberty. He therefore once again addreſs'd to the King, perſuading him to diſmiſs the Hebrews, to the end they might repair to Mount Sinai, and ſacrifice to God in that place: For no leſs (ſaith he) hath he commanded, neither can any reſiſt his Will. That whil'ſt God was yet favourable to him, his own intereſt oblig'd him to grant the people the liberty which he demanded. That if he deny'd the ſame, he could not accuſe him as the cauſe of the Calamities which he ſhould draw upon himſelf by his diſobedience, when he ſhould ſee himſelf without Children, the Air, Earth, and all the other Elements become Enemies to him, and Miniſters of the Divine vengeance. That nevertheleſs the people of the Hebrews ſhould (in deſpite of their reſiſtance) depart out of their Countrey; but the Egyptians ſhould not eſcape the puniſhment of their hardneſs of heart. The King deſpiſed theſe words of Moſes, and would not be prevailed upon, wherefore moſt grievous Plagues fell upon the Land of Egypt; all which I will particularly ſet down, by reaſon that at that time the Egyptians ſuffered thoſe things, which never before hapned to any other People; and likewiſe that I may manifeſt, that Moſes erred not in any of his Predictions: and beſides, for that it is expedient for Men to learn and do thoſe things which are agreeable to Gods Will, for fear leſt he being provoked and incenſed againſt them, ſhould puniſh them for their injuſtice. For firſt of all, by the commandment of God, the River Nilus was turn'd into blood, neither was it impoſſible for them to drink of it, (notwithſtanding they had no other Fountain of water) neither was the water only coloured like blood, but when

A any one drank thereof, it cauſed in him divers pains and gripings. Such was the water to the Egyptians, but to the Hebrews it ſeemed good and ſweet in taſte, without any wayes changing the nature thereof. Hereupon the King (not knowing what to do, and ſeeing this ſtrange accident, and being afraid, in behalf of his Subjects) permitted the Hebrews to depart. But no ſooner was this Plague ceaſed, but he preſently changed his mind, and would not permit them liberty to go away. For which cauſe, God (ſeeing his ingratitude, and that he would not be warned, notwithſtanding he had delivered him from the former calamity) inflicted another Plague upon the Egyptians. He ſent an infinite number of Frogs among them, which cover'd the whole Countrey; and the River was ſo ſtored with them, that they that drew water to drink, found it altogether B infected with the putrefaction of them, dying and rotting in the waters; ſo that the whole Countrey was full of filthy Mud, by reaſon of the Frogs that dyed on the ſame. They corrupted alſo their Meats, entring into their Houſes, amidſt their meat and drink, and creeping in their Chambers; from whence an odious ſtench exhaled, by reaſon of the multitude of Frogs that lay dead. Now when the Egyptians ſaw themſelves ſo ſore preſſed with theſe evils, the King commanded Moſes to depart with the Hebrews, whither he pleas'd. And as ſoon as he had ſpoken this, the multitude of Frogs vaniſhed, and appeared no more, neither on the earth, nor in the water, but they retained their accuſtomed nature. No ſooner was the earth delivered from this curſe, but Pharaoh forgot the cauſe thereof, and retained the Hebrews ſtill: and (as if he deſir'd to experiment C yet greater miſeries) he denied them that liberty which before he had granted them, rather out of fear, than good will. For this cauſe, God once again puniſhed his falſhood, by ſending him another Plague: for a multitude of Lice ſwarmed on the bodies of the Egyptians, by which the poor men were miſerably devoured; neither could they exterminate that Race either by bathings or unctions. The King troubled with this calamity, and fearing the ruine of his People, and bethinking him of the ſhameful end thereof, was conſtrained to permit the People to depart: but (after the Plague was appeaſed) he required, that they ſhould leave their wives and children behind them for pledges, till their return: and by this means he provoked Gods wrath more heavily againſt him, in that he ſuppoſed to delude his providence; as if it had not been God, D who (in the Hebrews behalf) had puniſhed them, but Moſes, that had plagued the Egyptians. For God filled their Countrey with divers ſorts of Inſects, (the like whereof, before that time, had not been ſeen there) which cover'd the earth, that it became deſolate and untilled, and many perſons dy'd by them; and thoſe that remain'd alive, they were infected with the poyſon exhaling from the number of dead and ſick bodies. But notwithſtanding all theſe, the King ſtill continued obſtinate in his wickedneſs, and diſobedience unto God; permitting only, that the women and men ſhould depart, and that their children ſhould be left behind them; but God deſiſted not to puniſh his wickedneſs by divers moſt grievous Plagues, far more tedious than the former, yea, ſuch as were diſperſed over all the People.

E For their bodies were grievouſly tormented with ulcers, and corrupted inwardly: and after this ſort, the greater part of the Egyptians periſhed. But the King being not melted, nor mollified by this Plague, God rained down Hail upon them, (which never before that time was ſeen in Egypt; and further ſo great, or rather greater than that which falleth to the Northward, near the Pole Artique) though it was a conſiderable time of Spring, and ſpoiled all their fruit. After which, an Army of Graſhoppers devoured all thoſe buds and fruits which were unhurt by the Hail; ſo that all the hope which the Egyptians had of their Harveſt, was utterly overthrown. Theſe afflictions had been ſufficient to perſuade a man of the meaneſt wit (except a Reprobate) to grow wiſe, and make uſe of that which was moſt profitable for him. But Pharaoh knowing the cauſe of F the ſame, enforced himſelf to reſiſt God, not only through imprudence, but malice; ſo that he voluntarily deſtroy'd his poor Subjects. He therefore commanded Moſes, to lead away the Hebrews with their Wives; but that they ſhould leave their ſubſtance behind them for a prey to the Egyptians, to recompenſe them for what they had loſt. Moſes anſwered, That he demanded an unjuſt thing, ſince that hereby they would not have wherewith to offer ſacrifice to God. Now while the time paſs'd in theſe conſultations, a moſt diſmal darkneſs overſpread the land of Egypt, by reaſon of which, many periſh'd after ſundry manners, and others fear'd to run the ſame fate, living in the moſt diſconſolate condition imaginable. This darkneſs being diſperſed, after three days, and ſo many nights, Moſes ſeeing that Pharaoh would not repent, nor let the people of Iſrael depart, came unto G him, and ſpake after this manner: As long as you ſhall reſiſt the Ordinance of God, (who commandeth you to ſuffer the Hebrews to depart) there is no means, whereby you may be exempted from theſe miſchiefs in doing that which you do. The King, enraged at theſe words, threatned him to cut off his head, if once more he durſt appear in his preſence, to motion H

But God intending to expreſs that he meant yet once more to plague the Egyptians, and to conſtrain them to deliver the Hebrews, commanded Moſes to declare unto the people that they ſhould have their ſacrifice in a readineſs, on the thirteenth day of the month Xanthicus, to celebrate the ſame the fourteenth of the ſaid month, (by the Egyptians called Pharmuth, and by the Hebrews Niſan, and Xanthicus by the Macedonians;) and that he ſhould lead forth all the Hebrews, carrying with them all their Goods. Whereupon he who had the Hebrews already in a readineſs to depart, and had diſtributed them I by families, kept them in one place, and in the ſame order; but when the fourteenth day was come, all of them (ready to depart) offer'd ſacrifice, and with the blood of the Lamb purged their Houſes, beſprinkling them with branches of Hyſſop. And after they had ſupt, they burnt the fleſh that remained, as being at the point to depart. Whereupon even at this day we retain the ſaid cuſtom to ſacrifice in like ſort, and do call this ſolemnity Paſcha, which is as much as to ſay, the paſſage; by reaſon that on that day God leaving and overpaſſing the Hebrews without harm, ſtruck the Egyptians with ſickneſs, for a Plague in the night-time cut off all the firſt begotten in Egypt; whereupon multitudes that dwelt round about the Palace, aſſembled themſelves in the preſence of the King, and beſought him to let the Hebrews go: for which cauſe Pharaoh calling Moſes, K gave order that they ſhould depart the Countrey, ſuppoſing that as ſoon as they were gone, Egypt would be no more afflicted with ſuch like Plagues. Moreover, they honoured the Hebrews with Preſents, partly to the end they ſhould depart with the more expedition, partly for the neighborhood and acquaintance ſake which they had one with another.
And as they departed, the Egyptians wept, and repented them of the evil uſage they had ſhewed them; but they took their way towards Latopolis, at that time deſart, and in which place afterwards Babylon was built, at ſuch time as Cambyſes deſtroyed Egypt.
The third day they came unto Beelzephon near the Red Sea; and for that they wanted victuals in this Deſart, they tempered their Meal with water, and kneaded it as well as they could, and bak't Cakes, with which they ſuſtained themſelves for the ſpace of thirty L dayes: for they had brought no more proviſion out of Egypt, than enough to ſerve them for that time; at the end of which they were in want of food, although they had liv'd very ſparingly, rather feeding for neceſſity, than eating to ſatiety. For which cauſe, in memory of that want, we celebrate a feaſt for the ſpace of eight dayes, which we call the feaſt of Azymes, that is to ſay, of unleavened bread. But it is not eaſie to number the multitude of them that came out of Egypt, if we conſider the Women and Children; but thoſe that were of full age, and fit to bear Arms, were in number ſix hundred thouſand.

The Hebrews depart out of Egypt, under the conduct of Moſes.

The year of the World 2454. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1510.

Exod. 14. 1, 7, 9.
The time of their departure out of Egypt. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 14.
The Egyptians purſue the Hebrews.

Why Moſes conducted them thorow Paleſtine.

The Iſraelites are encompaſſed by the Egyptian multitudes, and depart to the red Sea.
Exod. 14. 16.

Ver. 11, 12. The perplexity of the Iſraelites, being encloſed by the Egyptians.

Ver. 13. Moſes exhorteth the people to put their truſt in God.

Ver. 13. When God is moſt ready to help us.

THus the Iſraelites departed out of Egypt the 14 day of the month Xanthicus, 430 years after Abraham our Father came into Canaan, and in the 215 year after Jacob went down into Egypt, and in the eightieth year of Moſes age, who had Aaron to his Brother, three years elder than himſelf; they carried alſo with them the Bones of Joſeph, according as he had commanded his Sons, But the Egyptians repented that they had ſuffer'd the Hebrews to depart: the King alſo was very much mov'd; ſuppoſing, that which was fallen B upon them, had hapned by Moſes Inchantments; and it was concluded to purſue them.
They therefore arm'd, and furniſh'd themſelves with all their abiliments of War, intending to purſue them, with intent to bring them back, if they overtook them: for they ſaid, that God would no more be diſpleas'd againſt them, for that already they had given them leave to depart. They hoped likewiſe very eaſily to bring them under ſubjection, becauſe they were all of them diſarm'd, and wearied with Travel. And having inquir'd which way they held, they haſted to follow them, although they knew the Region was very hard to Travel in; not only for thoſe that were to march in Troop, but alſo for thoſe that were to journey one by one. Now Moſes conducted them this way, to the end, that if the Egyptians ſhould repent of their diſmiſſion, and haſten to purſue them, they might receive the C reward of their wickedneſs, and the breach of their promiſe. He choſe this way likewiſe, leſt the Philiſtines ſhould underſtand their departure, by reaſon they were diſpleas'd againſt the Hebrews, upon an ancient grudge which they bear them; and Paleſtine confines and borders upon Egypt: wherefore he led them not by the way that directly leadeth thither, but he intended to bring them into Canaan, by conducting them far about, and thorow many calamities; to the end, that afterwards he might lead them to Mount Sinai, there to offer Sacrifice, according to Gods commandment. As ſoon as the Egyptians overtook the Iſraelites, they prepar'd themſelves to fight, truſting to the number which they had: for with them, there ſerved 600 Chariots, with 50000 Horſemen, and 200000 armed Footmen.
They alſo ſtopped the paſſages where they thought the Hebrews might eſcape, encloſing D them betwixt unacceſſible Rocks, and the Sea: on which place there abutteth a Mountain, unfrequented, by reaſon of the dangerouſneſs of the way; and by this means they excluded them from all hope of eſcape, or flight: for on the one ſide they were ſhut in by the Mountain, that extended it ſelf even to the Sea: and on the other ſide, by their Camp, pitched and embattelled before their faces, to cut them off from the Champion, if ſo be they intended to flie that way. Seeing therefore that they were in no ſecurity, but were hemmed in by the ſtraitneſs of the place, and by reaſon of want of proviſion, could not endure a ſiege, nor yet find any ways to flie from their Enemies; neither, although they greatly deſir'd to fight, had they means to defend themſelves, becauſe they were diſarm'd.
Finally, perceiving that there was no hope of ſafety left them, but only by their abject E ſubmiſſion, they began to accuſe Moſes; forgetting thoſe Prodigies which God had done to ſet them at liberty: and their incredulity proceeded ſo far, that they were upon the point to ſtone Moſes, and voluntarily to yield themſelves ſubject to their former Thraldom.
For they were much mov'd by the Tears of their Wives and Children, who expected nothing but death, ſeeing themſelves begirt with Rocks, Seas, and Soldiers, and left deſtitute of all hope of flight. But although the multitude were exaſperated againſt Moſes, yet ceaſed he not to take care of them, and to have recourſe to God; recounting to them what he had ſaid in times paſt, touching their deliverance; and aſſuring them, that after ſo many Miracles, God would not ſuffer them to be ſubjected or overthrown by their Enemies. And ſtanding up in the midſt of them, he ſaid, If your affairs had hitherto been F managed by Men onely, it were not amiſs in you to diſtruſt them, leſt hereafter they ſhould not bring them to their determined and your deſired iſſue. But in that at this time you diſtruſt the Providence of God, this ſheweth you to be without ſenſe, or underſtanding; conſidering it is he that hath made you ſee all thoſe things which he promiſed you by me, concerning your deliverance, even at that time when you your ſelves expected it not: you rather ought to hope, that God will help and aſſiſt you in theſe difficulties, who hath brought to paſs, that you are now in this ſtrait, to the end that when he ſhall have delivered you from theſe extremities, from which neither you your ſelves, nor your Enemies ſuppoſe you can eſcape, he may ſhew his power and providence in your behalf: for God is not accuſtomed to yield his favorable aſſiſtance, when the dangers are only eaſie and ſupportable; but in thoſe wherein all humane hope is loſt and extinct. Therefore reſt your ſelves, G your fortunes upon ſuch a Helper, who can make great things ſmall, and the ſtrongeſt feeble. Fear not the force and power of the Egyptians; and though you have the Sea and Mountains before you, which permit you not to flie from them, deſpair not of your lives: for God (if he pleaſe) can turn the Mountains into Plains, and change the Sea into dry Land.

The Hebrews are purſued by the Egyptians, the Red Sea divideth it ſelf, and giveth paſſage to the Hebrews, but overwhelmeth the Egyptian Army. H

Exod. 14. 15.

Moſes prayer unto God.

Ver. 21. The Red Sea divideth it ſelf.

Ver. 22, 27. The Hebrews paſs thorow the Red Sea, the Egyptians are drowned therein.

Exod. 15. 1. The Iſraelites with Moſes ſing Songs for their deliverance. The Sea of Pamphylia divided it ſelf, for Alexanders Soldiers to paſs there thorow. The wind and tide drive the Egyptians arms into the Hebrews Camp.

THis ſaid, he conducted the Hebrews towards the Sea, in the ſight of the Egyptians; who being very much wearied with purſuit and travel, thought beſt to forbear the Combat till the next day. But when Moſes was arriv'd upon the bank of the Sea, he took his Rod, and called upon God, and implored his aid and ſuccor in theſe words: O Lord, Thou too well knoweſt, that it is impoſſible for us by humane force or policy, to eſcape theſe extremities: but thou art he only that canſt ſave this company, who have forſaken Egypt, follow- I ing thy Commandment. And ſince of our ſelves we have not any hope or means, we only recommend our ſelves unto thy Providence, being aſſur'd that by that means onely we can be delivered from the purſuit and fury of the Egyptians: Send us therefore ſpeedily thine aſſiſtance, to the end that thy Power may be known in our weakneſs. Relieve, encourage, and hearten thy People, aſſuring them of their ſafety, who through their diſtruſt have ſinned againſt thee: we are environed with difficulties, which notwithſtanding thou canſt make eaſie. For the Sea is thine, and this Mountain that incloſeth us; which ſhall open, and the Sea divide it ſelf, if thou commandeſt. We may likewiſe flie thorow the Air, if it pleaſe thy Power to deliver us in that manner.
Having made his Requeſt unto God after this manner, he ſtrook the Red Sea with his Rod; which ſuddenly dividing it ſelf at the ſtroke, and retyring backwards, left a dry K paſſage thorow the midſt thereof, for the Hebrews to eſcape. Moſes ſeeing how God had heard his Prayer, and how the Sea had left its Channel, he firſt of all entered into the ſame, and commanded the Hebrews to follow him, marching thorow that way which God had by his Divine Power provided for them, willing them to rejoyce at the danger which attended their Enemies, and to give God thanks for the unexpected ſuccors he had ſent them: whereupon they were not negligent, but marched boldly forward. At firſt the Egyptians ſuppoſed them mad, and that they caſt themſelves headlong into manifeſt perdition: but when they perceiv'd that they were entred a good way without hurt, and that they encountred no danger or let, they diſlodg'd, and follow'd them, believing the Sea would have given them paſſage alſo; and having ſet their Horſe in the Vauntguard, L they entered into the Sea. But the Egyptians having ſpent ſome time in arming themſelves, the Hebrews in the mean while got to the oppoſite ſhore, without any diſturbance; which made their Enemies more bold, ſuppoſing that no evil ſhould happen unto them.
But they knew not that God had made this path expreſly for the Hebrews; but entred the ſame, as if it had been a common beaten way, forgetting that it was made to ſave the Hebrews from danger, and not themſelves, who ſought to deſtroy them. But as ſoon as all the Egyptian Army was entred, the Sea returned to his old courſe, and with winds and waves overwhelmed the Egyptians. The ſhowres from Heaven fell upon them, vehement Thunders ratled from the Air, intermixed with flaſhings and lightnings. In brief, there was nothing that by the wrath of God could be inflicted upon Men, which at that time hapned not unto them. For, beſides all that which hath been ſpoken, an obſcure and M dark Night ſurpriz'd them, in ſuch ſort as they were all of them drowned, and there remained not one of them to bear back the tydings of their misfortune. The Hebrews could not contain themſelves, for the joy they conceiv'd at this their unexpected deliverance, and the total ruine of their Enemies: when they ſaw that they who deſign'd to make them ſlaves again perforce, were exterminated, and that God had been ſo viſibly aſſiſtant unto them. When they had eſcap'd this danger, and perceiv'd that their Enemies were puniſhed, after ſuch a manner, as the like puniſhment had never been heard of amongſt Men; they all of them, during the whole Night, ſung Hymns and Songs of Thankſgiving. Moſes likewiſe compos'd a Song in Verſe, containing the Praiſes of God, and a Thankſgiving N for the favor he had done unto them. All theſe things have I particularly declared, according as I have found them written in Holy Scriptures. Neither ought any man to marvel at this ſo wonderful a Diſcourſe, that thorow the Sea there ſhould be a paſſage found, to ſave ſo many perſons in times paſt, and they rude and ſimple, whether it were done by the Will of God, or it chanced of it ſelf; ſince not long time ago, God ſo thinking it good, the Sea of Pamphylia divided it ſelf, to give way to Alexander, the King of Macedon's Soldiers, having no other paſſage to deſtroy the Empire of the Perſians. The next day the Egyptians Arms, carried by force of the ſtream, were caſt aſhore where the Army of the Hebrews was encamped: which when Moſes perceiv'd that it was done by the Providence of God, to the intent they might not be diſarmed, he gather'd them together, and fur- O niſh'd the Hebrews therewith; and afterwards led them to Mount Sinai, to ſacrifice to God, and to give him thanks for their deliverance, in the behalf of the People, according as he himſelf had before commanded.

CHAP. I.

How Moſes conducted the People out of Egypt to Mount Sinai.

THE joy which the Iſraelites had to ſee themſelves thus deliver'd by the D help of Almighty God, was not a little diminiſht, by the wearineſs and tediouſneſs of the difficulties which they endured in their travel towards the Mountain of Sinai: by reaſon that the Country was a Deſart, and uninhabitable, deſtitute of Victuals and Water; and not only barren of what ſerves for the ſuſtenance of Men, but alſo everywhere wanting paſturage and proviſion for Cattel: ſo that they were conſtrain'd to bear with them the water which they had drawn before they entred the Deſart, according as their Captain and Conductor had commanded them: which being ſpent, they dig'd Pits, out of which they drew water with great difficulty, by reaſon of the hardneſs of the ground: and further, the water which they found in thoſe places was bitter, and no ways fit to drink; E and, which was worſe, very little in quantity. Travelling onwards of their journey after this manner a long time, they arriv'd about evening in a certain place, which by reaſon the waters were brackiſh, they called Marah, that is to ſay, Bitterneſs. There, wearied with Travel, and their Proviſion failing them, they began to be pinch'd with neceſſity, ſo that they reſolv'd to ſtay in that place; and the rather, in that they found a certain Pit there, which although it were inſufficient to ſatisfie ſo great an Army, yet for that they found it in that Countrey, it yielded them no little conſolation. For they were given to underſtand, that if they travelled onwards, they ſhould find no water; and for the water of that Pit, it was ſo bitter and unfit for drinking, that it neither was agreeable to the taſte, nor ſupportable for their very Cattel. Whereupon Moſes ſeeing F them ſo diſcomforted, and not knowing how to ſatisfie them, in that he had not to deal with an Army or Enemy, whom he might repel with Valor; but that hunger and thirſt alone reduc'd all this great multitude of Men, Women and Children, to great diſtreſs; he was greatly perplex'd, and reſented in himſelf the calamity of them all, as if it had been all his own: for all of them had their recourſe unto him, and to no Man elſe; the Women beg'd for their Children, and the Husbands intreated for their Wives, beſeeching him to take compaſſion of their diſtreſs, and to furniſh them with ſome means to eſcape their miſery. He addreſſed himſelf therefore in moſt humble manner to Almighty God, praying that it would pleaſe him to amend the evil quality of the water, and to make it potable. Which grace and favor he no ſooner obtain'd, but he took a G piece of wood, which he cleft in two, and caſt into the Pit; giving the Hebrews to underſtand, that God had heard their prayers, and that he had promis'd to give them the water they deſir'd, if ſo be they would obey him, and with alacrity and diligence perform that which ſhould be commanded them. And when they were inquiſitive what H they ought to do, to the intent the water might be changed; he enjoined every one of them that was of beſt ſtrength and ability amongſt them, to draw water; giving them to underſtand, that ſo ſoon as they had drawn out great ſtore of water from the Pit, the reſt that ſhould remain, would be very good and convenient to be drunk. They obey'd, and the water agitated and purifi'd by often drawing, became potable, and refreſh'd the weary multitude. Hereupon diſlodging from that place, they came to Helim, a Countrey that afar off ſeem'd very pleaſant, by reaſon that it was planted with Palm-trees: but the nearer they approched it, the more tedious they found it, (for there were no more than Seventy Palm-trees in that place, and they not very tall, or well-grown, by reaſon of the drineſs and barrenneſs of the Soil.) They found alſo twelve Springs I there, which were ſo ſmall, that they did not flow, but only drop. Whereupon falling to dig up the Sand, they could light of no Veins of Water; and if perhaps any little appear'd, it was ſo troubled by the Sand, that it became unfit to be taſted: neither did the Trees bear any ſtore of Fruit, by reaſon of the want of Water. For which cauſe, the whole multitude began to murmur againſt their Guide, aſcribing all the cauſe of their calamities and miſeries unto him. For having marched for the ſpace of 30 days, they had conſum'd all the proviſion which they brought with them; and conceiving that there was no remedy, they were wholly overwhelm'd with deſpair. Conſidering therefore only the evil which was before their eyes, and forgetting the marvels which God, by the miniſtry of Moſes, had made them both ſee and partake, they conceiv'd indignation K againſt him, and were ready to ſtone him to death, as if he had been the Author of that calamity which oppreſſed them. But he perceiving the multitude ſo enraged, and incenſed againſt him, ſtrengthned himſelf in God; and warranted by the teſtimony of a good Conſcience, and the uprightneſs of his actions, he came out into the midſt of thoſe who revil'd him, and had gather'd ſtones to caſt at him. And for that he was adorn'd with a ſingular grace and majeſtick countenance, and endued with pleaſing eloquence, he began to appeaſe their wrath; exhorting them to bear their preſent difficulties, by remembring their forepaſſed bleſſings; and not to permit the Travel which they endur'd at that time, to drive out of their remembrance the graces and favors which they had receiv'd at God's hands. He willed them likewiſe diligently to expect their deliverance L from that extremity, by the providence of God: who (as it ſeem'd) made trial of their patience and gratitude; and whether they kept in remembrance thoſe things which had hapned unto them; or whether forgetting their forepaſſed pleaſures, they would ſuffer themſelves to be ſwallow'd with their preſent miſery. He willed them therefore to take heed, leſt through their impatience and ingratitude, they ſhould be found unworthy of God's favor, if they neglected his Will, by whoſe direction they were brought out of Egypt, and threatned and hated him, who was God's Miniſter; eſpecially ſince hitherto they could no ways complain of him in any thing which he had undertaken to execute by the Commandment of God. Then reckon'd he up particularly unto them, how the Egyptians were plagued and deſtroyed, whil'ſt contrary to God's Will, they endevor'd to M detain them: how the ſame River, which of it ſelf was bloody and unprofitable to drink of, to themſelves became both ſweet and potable: likewiſe, how the Sea retir'd it ſelf, and further'd both their flight and paſſage, wherein they ſaw themſelves ſecure and free from danger; and contrariwiſe, their Enemies deſtroy'd, overthrown, and drowned: and how, even until that day, being diſarm'd, they were by God's providence both furniſh'd and fortified abundantly. Moreover, how often God had deliver'd them from apparent death and danger, beſides all mens opinion; who always Omnipotent, gave them at that time not the leaſt cauſe to deſpair of his aſſiſtance. For which cauſe, they ought to ſuffer all things patiently, and to imagine with themſelves, that the ſuccor, although deferred, was never too late, which was receiv'd before ſuch time as the danger N had prevail'd: and ſo to think, that God contemn'd not their perils, but made trial of their fortitude and conſtancy, to ſee whether they were able and willing to endure the want of meat and drink: or rather, whether after the manner of brute Beaſts, they had rather return to the yoke of ſervitude, to be fed only to be made the better able to endure labour. As for himſelf, he nothing fear'd his life (becauſe that being unjuſtly ſlain, no evil could happen unto him) but that he was careful of their ſafety, leſt lifting up their hands to ſtone him, they ſhould oppoſe themſelves againſt God and his Commands.

Thus pacifi'd he them, and aſſuag'd the fury they had conceiv'd to endanger his life: and ſo much prevail'd he, that they repented of that Enterprize whereby they ſought to deſtroy him. And for that he knew that they had ſome reaſon to be thus mov'd, he addreſs'd O himſelf to prayer and ſupplication: and aſcending a certain Rock, he deſir'd God's help to relieve their infirmities, wants and affliction, (in whoſe hands only the ſalvation of

A of the people conſiſted;) beſeeching him in mercy to forgive the people, being exaſperated with extreme miſeries, and by reaſon thereof diſtracted and withdrawn from their duty. Whereupon God promis'd him to have care of the people, promiſing him to ſend them a ſpeedy and preſent deliverance. Which when Moſes underſtood, he came down to the multitude; who perceiving joy in his countenance, by reaſon of thoſe promiſes which he had receiv'd from God, exchang'd their doleſom lamentations into gladneſs.
He therefore ſtanding up in the midſt of them, told them, that he brought unto them a moſt ſpeedy remedy for their neceſſity. And not long after, a number of Quails (which about the gulf of Arabia multiply and encreaſe more than any ſort of Birds) flew croſs the Sea; and being wearied in their flight, came and fell amidſt the Camp of the Hebrews; B who caught them, as a proviſion prepar'd for them by God, and ſent to relieve their Famine. Whereupon Moſes once more addreſſed himſelf to call upon God, yielding him thanks for the preſent and future good he had promis'd him. The people being after this manner fed and refreſhed, were ſoon after ſupplied with a new kind of food. For as Moſes ſtretched out his hands, and pray'd to God, a dew deſcended from Heaven, which thickned betwixt his hands: and for that he ſuppos'd it to be another kind of ſuſtenance ſent them by God, he taſted the ſame, and found it very pleaſant.
Then addreſſing to the people, who knew not what it was, but thought it to be Snow which fell in that place, according to the ſeaſon of the year, he told them, that it was no ordinary dew falling from Heaven, as they ſuppos'd, but that God had ſent it them, for C the preſervation and nouriture of their bodies: and having eaten thereof before them, he gave them of it, to the end he might ſtrengthen their belief; who taſting the ſame in like manner as he had done, were greatly refreſh'd with the ſuſtenance: for in ſweetneſs and pleaſure, it equal'd Honey; in odor, Bdellium; and in form and greatneſs, the grain of Coriander: whereupon, every one gather'd of it. And Moſes commanded that every one of them ſhould particularly gather every day but the meaſure of an Aſſaron, which is the tenth part of an Epha; which was done, leſt the weaker ſhould want, whil'ſt the ſtronger, through avarice, gather'd more than ſuffic'd them. And if any one, contrary to the command, gather'd more than was permitted, although he toiled and travelled more than any of them, yet was his portion no ways encreas'd by that means.
D For whatſoever (beſide the appointed meaſure of the Aſſaron) remained till the next morning, was of no value, but became bitter and full of Worms. So divine and admirable was this kind of food, and of that nature, that whoſo had ſufficient thereof, needed no ſort of ſuſtenance. Moreover, even in theſe our days, there falls in that Countrey a dew like that, which God, in favor of Moſes, ſent for the peoples ſuſtenance. The Hebrews call it Manna; for in our Tongue, Man is an Interrogation, ſignifying, What is that? Thus liv'd they joyfully, being ſuſtain'd by this kind of meat ſent them from Heaven, and us'd the ſame for the ſpace of 40 years, during the time they were in the Deſart.
But afterwards when they were diſlodg'd from that place, and encamped near to Raphidim, they were extremely troubled with thirſt; for upon their firſt arrival, they found E ſome few Springs, but afterward they found the land wholly deſtitute of water. They therefore once more were incens'd againſt Moſes. But he withdrawing himſelf apart from the fury of the people, betook himſelf to God in prayer, beſeeching him, that as he had given them food in their neceſſity, he would now alſo give them drink, ſince they were ready to periſh with thirſt; and praying him to provide them drink alſo, otherwiſe their meat was unprofitable to them. God preſently granted his prayer; promiſing Moſes, that he would give him a Fountain, and abundance of Water, from that place from whence he leaſt expected it. To which end, he commanded him to ſtrike with his Rod the Rock which was there hard by, and promis'd to make the water come forth immediately, ſo that the people ſhould have ſufficient without taking pains to F ſeek for it. Which command when Moſes had receiv'd, he return'd to the people, who expected him, and had their eyes fix'd upon him, with great impatience as he deſcended from the Rock, where he had made his prayer. No ſooner was he arriv'd, but he told them that God would deliver them from the neceſſity wherein they were, and would graciouſly grant them an unexpected relief, by cauſing a ſtream ſuddenly to break from that Rock. But they being amaz'd at that which they heard, and doubting, leſt tyred with thirſt, and ſpent with journeys, they ſhould be enforc'd to hew and cleave the Rock; Moſes ſtruck the ſame in ſuch ſort with his Rod, that it divided aſunder, and there iſſu'd out moſt clear and pure water in great abundance. The people were greatly aſtoniſh'd at this ſo ſtrange accident, and no leſs rejoyced. They fell to drink of the Water, and G and found it very ſweet and pleaſant, as being a miraculous Water, and a Preſent of the goodneſs, divine bounty and power of God. For this cauſe they highly eſteem'd Moſes, ſeeing that God had honour'd him in this ſort; and they acknowledged God's provi-

CHAP. II.

How the Amalekites and their Aſſociates were overcome, and how great a Prey the Iſraelites obtained thereby.

The year of the World, 2454, before Chriſt's Nativity, 1510.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 2. Exod. 17. 8, 9. The Amalekites war againſt the Iſraelites.

BUt when the Renown of the Hebrews was become great, and ſpread abroad in all parts, it came to paſs, that the Neighbouring Nations were in very great fear of them: whereupon (ſending Ambaſſages the one unto the other) they mutually con- I ſpir'd to expel, and, if poſſible, utterly extirpate the whole people.

Amongſt the reſt, thoſe of the Countrey of Cobol, and the City Petra, who are call'd Amalekites, (a Nation very warlike, and more active than the reſt) were the chief Agents in this Expedition: whoſe Kings both encourag'd one another, and ſtir'd up the Neighbour Nations to the Iſraelites deſtruction; telling them, that a Foreign Army, flying from the thraldom of the Egyptians, had invaded their Countrey, whoſe multitudes were not a little to be ſuſpected; counſelling them (before they had gather'd head, and recover'd more means, and a Countrey to dwell in, and grew more confident, by their forbearance) to charge them firſt, rather than to expect their increaſe, and ſo to oppreſs them; eſteeming it a better point of wiſdom, to repreſs their inſolency and for- K wardneſs in the Deſart, than to expect whil'ſt they were poſſeſs'd of ſtrong and rich Cities. For this (ſaid they) is the part of wiſe men, to reſiſt the beginnings of power of their Adverſaries, and not to expect, till by daily Exploits they more and more increaſe; and rather to provide to prevent, than deliver themſelves from peril. After theſe Ambaſſages, it was decreed by general Council, That they ſhould endevor to invade and aſſault the Hebrews. Theſe determinations and deſigns of theirs, troubled Moſes very much, for that he expected no Hoſtility. When therefore he perceiv'd that the people were affrighted and amaz'd, to ſee themſelves (being wholly unprovided) to be charg'd by ſo ſtrong and well-furniſh'd an Army, he re-comforted them, and will'd them to bethink themſelves of God's promiſes, who by his power had ſet them at liber- L ty; aſſuring them, that they ſhould overcome all thoſe that made head againſt them, to deſtroy them; wiſhing them to think, that though they were inferior to their Enemies in Weapons, Wealth, and Munition, and the like; yet ſince they had God to friend, and ready to fight for them againſt their Enemy, they ought to be of good courage, as being furniſh'd with more than humane ſupplies. Alledging further, that they were not ignorant how great an Aſſiſter God was, having had ſo often tryal of his goodneſs in their greateſt dangers, as an Enemy to their enemies, and favorable to their proceedings: which favor of his he moſt manifeſtly expreſs'd, by his miraculous deliverance of them from hunger and thirſt; by procuring them free eſcape, when they were ſhut in by the Sea and Mountains: And that which ſhould moſt animate them to the Fight and Victory, M was, That if they came off victorious, they ſhould want nothing that appertain'd to a more commodious and peaceable life. Moſes thus having encourag'd the people by his words, call'd unto him the chiefeſt of the Tribes, and every one of them that had the charge of them, both in private and publick Aſſembly, commanding the younger to obey the elder, and the elders to be obedient to their General. Hereupon the people contemn'd their danger, and were deſirous of Fight, hoping that this Conflict would prove the end of their calamities. For which cauſe, they earneſtly deſir'd Moſes to lead them forth againſt the Enemy, and not to dull the alacrity of the Soldiers by any untimely delay.

Ver. 9, 10. Moſes encourageth the people to expect nothing but victory.

Ver. 9. Joſuah made Captain over the Iſraelites.

Whereupon (chooſing out among the whole multitude ſuch as were moſt fit for War) he appointed the ſon of Naveus the Ephramite, to lead them, a man N valiant in Arms, and prudent in counſel, and of great piety, as having been train'd up therein by Moſes his Maſter. He alſo in ſuch ſort diſpoſed certain Bands, that he might not be cut off from water: he left ſo many as might guard the Camp and weaker company. Thus ſtood they all Night long in Arms, expecting only the Signal of their General, and the Order of their Captains, to attack their Enemies. On the other ſide Moſes ſlept not, but inſtructed Joſuah how he ſhould conduct the Army. And as ſoon as the day appear'd, he encourag'd Joſuah to ſhew himſelf ſuch an one in that Battel, as both the place wherewith he was honour'd, and the Cauſe for which they fought, requir'd; wiſhing him, by his proweſs and good conduct, to give life and courage to his Soldiers that follow'd him. He likewiſe exhorted the chiefeſt of the Hebrews in particular, and in O general heartned and emboldned all others that entred the Battel.

A After he had thus diſpos'd the Army, and given all neceſſary orders, he, committing the Army to God's protection, and Joſuah's conduct, retir'd upon a Mountain. Then encountred the Armies on both ſides, and every one fought moſt valiantly; neither wanted there encouragement on either ſide. And as long as Moſes lifted up his hands, the Hebrews had the better againſt the Amalekites. But for that he was unable continually to ſupport the ſame, (and becauſe he obſerv'd, that as often as he held down his hands, ſo long the Enemies drove the Iſraelites to retreat) he willed his brother Aaron, and Vron his ſiſter Maries husband, to ſtand on each ſide of him, and ſuſtain his hands. Which when they had perform'd, the Hebrews by main force overcame the Amalekites; ſo that all of them had been ſlain, if the Chaſe had continu'd, and had not been cut off B by the approach of the night. Thus our Anceſtors obtain'd a moſt happy and advantagious Victory: For beſides the glory they got in having overcome ſo potent Enemies, and caſt a terror into the hearts of the Nations round about, to whom they have ever ſince been formidable, they became Maſters of the Enemies Camp, and both in general and in particular got Riches; whereas before than time they had not neceſſary means to maintain themſelves. And this Victory of theirs, was the cauſe of their very great good fortune, not only for the preſent, but alſo for the time to come: For not only had they their Enemies bodies under their ſubjection, but alſo their ſpirits, ſo as they were fear'd by all the Nations round about. And they multiplied both in ſtrength and riches; for there was a great quantity of gold and ſilver taken in the Camp. Divers C Veſſels likewiſe, and Tables of Braſs were found therein: likewiſe great quantity of Tiſſue-work, and excellent Furniture for War. Moreover, they had all their Baggage, Tents, Harneſs, and Horſes, and generally, the whole proviſion of an Army became their prey. Thus ended this Battel. The ſucceſs whereof ſo exalted the courage of the Iſraelites, that they thought henceforward nothing would be unpoſſible to them. The next day, Moſes cauſed the Enemies that were ſlain, to be rifled, and the ſcatter'd Arms of thoſe that fled to be gather'd up. He honour'd them alſo, that had bravely demeaned themſelves in the Battel, and praiſed the Captain Joſuah in publick; whoſe honour was confirm'd by the applauſe of the whole Army. There was not one Hebrew that periſhed that day: though ſo many of the Enemies were there put to the Sword, as their D number cannot be expreſs'd. He offer'd likewiſe a Sacrifice of Thankſgiving unto God, and erected an Altar unto him, and dedicated it To God, the Victor. He propheſied moreover, that all the Amalekites ſhould be utterly extinguiſh'd, ſo that none of them ſhould be left alive, in that they had aſſaulted the Hebrews, and that in the Deſart, and at ſuch time as they were in affliction. After which, he made a Feaſt for the General, to teſtifie the joy he had for his Victory. This iſſue had this Battel, which was the firſt that they fought after their departure out of Egypt. But as ſoon as Moſes had celebrated a Feaſt in memory of the Victory, to the end he might give the Hebrews ſome refreſhment after the Battel, he cauſed them to march in aray; for now the Arms gotten from the Enemies, being given to thoſe that wanted, there were more armed Soldiers than before.
E Thus paſſing onwards by little and little, they arriv'd the third month after their departure out of Egypt, near to the mountain of Sinai, where (as before is declar'd) Moſes ſaw the Viſion in the Buſh, with other Wonders.

What counſel Raguel gave to his Son-in-law, Moſes.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 3. Exod. 18. 1, 2. Raguel cometh to Moſes to the Deſart of Sinai.

WHen Raguel, Moſes Father-in-law, underſtood of this his good ſucceſs; he came with great joy to Moſes, with purpoſe to ſalute him, his daughter Zephora, and her F children: who (greatly rejoycing at his arrival) offer'd a Sacrifice to God, and feaſted the People, near the Buſh that could not be conſum'd by fire; and in the Banquet, the People were ranked according to the order and place of every Family. But Aaron, with Raguel, and all the multitude, ſung praiſes to God, aſcribing to him both the means and manner of their liberty. They alſo ſpake much in honour of Moſes, by whoſe virtue all things had ſo fortunate an iſſue: and Raguel particularly celebrated the honour of the People, and Moſes their Governour, by whoſe prudence ſo many good and valiant men were guided. The next day, Raguel ſeeing Moſes oppreſſed with the multitude of buſineſs, (by reaſon that he decided all their differences that were brought to him; as all were out of an opinion of his ability and integrity, ſo that even they that were condemned G by him, endur'd the Verdict patiently, knowing that their Cauſe was by him decided rather by the rule of Juſtice, than by Intereſt or Affection) he for that time kept ſilence, ſilence, (being loth to hinder them, who pretended to receive benefit by the juſtice of H his Son-in-law.) But when he found him at convenient leiſure, he took him apart, and told him privately what he ought to do; counſelling him to diſcharge himſelf of that trouble, concerning affairs of ſo little conſequence, and to reſerve only to himſelf thoſe of the greateſt importance, and which concern'd the publick eſtate of them all. There being divers perſons amongſt the Hebrews to be found, capable and ſufficient to hear and determine the ordinary Pleas; but for thoſe which regarded the general good of the People, he alone was fit to undergo the burthen of them. Knowing therefore (ſaid he) thy vertue, and how worthily thou haſt behaved thy ſelf toward the People, being the Miniſter of God, for their ſafety; ſuffer them to determine amongſt themſelves thoſe differences that ariſe amongſt them, and reſerve thy ſelf wholly to intend the ſervice of God, to the end thou may'ſt I more eaſily aſſiſt the People in their important neceſſities. If therefore thou giveſt credit to my counſel in humane affairs, thou ſhalt muſter thy whole Army, and eſtabliſh Chieftains, that ſhall command over Ten thouſands, and thouſands, and five hundreds, and over fifties, and ſhalt ordain Governors over them, who dividing them by thirties, twenties, and tens, may conduct and rule them. And let ſome be appointed amongſt them, who may receive Titles, according to the number and names of thoſe they commanded; who being approved by the whole company, to be of good fame and upright conſcience, may hear and determine all their differences. And if any controverſie ſhall fall out amongſt any of them in authority, they ſhall refer the deciding of that difficulty to thee. By this means neither ſhall any of the Hebrews be defrauded of his right, and thou thy ſelf ſerving God without moleſtation, may'ſt render him more and more favourable K unto thine Army.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 5. Ver. 24. Moſes alloweth his father-in-laws advice.

This counſel of Raguel highly pleas'd Moſes, ſo that he order'd all things according to his advice; not concealing the Author of it, nor attributing it to himſelf, but declaring publickly to all men, that his Father-in-law was the Inventor thereof. He hath likewiſe written in his Books that Raguel was the Author of this Government: accounting it no leſs honour, to attribute praiſe to thoſe that deſerve it, than ſhame to uſurp upon another mans merit; ſo that hereby you may conjecture his virtue: of which, hereafter, in many places we have more to ſay. Moſes afterwards aſſembling all the People, told them that he would aſcend the mountain of Sinai, to talk with God; to the end, that he might afterwards return to them, and impart to them whatſoever good things he L ſhould receive from him on their behalf. He likewiſe commanded them to pitch their Tents about the mountain; and to have it in reverence, by reaſon of the preſence of God.

CHAP. IV.

Exod. 19.

Moſes aſcends the Mountain, and receives the Tables of the Ten Commandments from God, and gives them to the People.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 6. Moſes aſcendeth the mountain of Sinai. Exod. 19. 2, 3, 4. 14, &c.

THis ſaid, he aſcended the mountain Sinai, (which is the higheſt, beyond compariſon, M of all that Countrey; and which, by reaſon of its ſteep and inacceſſible ragged Rocks, is not only unfrequented by men, but alſo cannot be beheld, without ſome fear.) Beſides, it being reported, that God commonly dwells on the ſame, it is held ſacred by the Inhabitants, and dreadful and inacceſſible to all that behold it. But the Hebrews, according to the commandment of the Prophet, removing their Tents, pitched them at the foot of the Hill, being full of hope of the favors which he had promiſed them to obtain of God for them. And in the mean ſpace, while they expected their Guide, they kept Holy-day, and feaſted, and purifi'd themſelves for the ſpace of three days, with all ſorts of purification, and abſtinence from the company of their Wives, as Moſes had commanded them. They beſought God alſo, that he would favourably receive N Moſes, and by his means bleſs them with the favours of which he had given them hope. They banquetted alſo in great pomp, and their Wives and Children were richly attired. Now, on the third day, before Sun-riſing, a Cloud cover'd all the Hebrews Camp, (a thing before-time unſeen by them) and environ'd all the place where they had pitched their Pavilions. And though all the reſt of the Countrey had a clear and untroubled sky, yet thereabout violent Winds were rais'd, which hideouſly roared, and a tempeſtuous Rain ſucceeded them; and Thunderclaps dreadful to hear, and Lightnings horrible to behold, ſignifi'd that God was there preſent. Let thoſe that read this, judge thereof, as it ſhall pleaſe them: as for my ſelf, it is not any ways lawful for me to depart in any ſort from that which is written in Holy Scripture. That which the Hebrews O both heard and ſaw, being ſtrange and unaccuſtomed to them, troubled them greatly.

Further-

The year of the World, 2455. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1510.

A Furthermore, the report that was publiſh'd touching the mountain, That God dwelt on the ſame, marvailouſly amaz'd their ſpirits. They therefore ſad and penſive, contain'd themſelves within their Tents, thinking that Moſes was deſtroy'd by the wrath of God, and expecting no leſs miſery themſelves. But whil'ſt they were thus troubled in mind, Moſes preſented himſelf to them, (with a countenance full of pleaſing majeſty, and looks ſo contented, that they teſtified the inward ſatisfaction of his mind) whom they no ſooner beheld, but ſuddenly all their fear vaniſh'd, and in place thereof a hope of ſome great good ſucceeded; and withal, the air, upon his arrival, recover'd its former clearneſs and ſerenity. Hereupon he ſummon'd the People to a ſolemn and general Aſſembly, to the end he might report, and they hear, what Commandments God had given them by B him. No ſooner were they aſſembled, but he (from an high place, from which all the People might both ſee and hear him) ſtood up, and ſpake after this manner:

Ver. 25. Moſes Oration to the Iſraelites.

Know (ſaith he) you Hebrews, that Almighty God, as he hath never deſpiſed my prayers hitherto, ſo at this time alſo hath he entertained me very graciouſly: and behold he hath vouchſafed to honour your Camp with his preſence, and to preſcribe to you by me, the moſt happy manner of living that can be imagin'd. I conjure you therefore by him, and by the many admirable works which he hath done for you, to hear with the reſpect you owe to him, that which he hath commanded me to tell you, without ſticking at the meanneſs of the perſon whom he hath employ'd for this purpoſe. Do not conſider that 'tis but a man that ſpeaks to you; but reflect rather upon the advantages which you ſhall receive, by obſerving the Commandments which I C bring to you in the Name of God; and reverence the Majeſty of him who hath not diſdained to make uſe of me for procuring you ſo great happineſs. For it is not Moſes, the ſon of Amram and Jocabel, that is going to give you thoſe admirable precepts, but he it is that conſtrained Nilus to flow with blood, and that through divers plagues tamed the pride of the Egyptians: it is he that gave you paſſage thorow the midſt of the Sea: it is he that furniſh'd you with meat prepared from Heaven, when you were in extremity: it is he that made water ſpring out of the Rock, to quench your thirſts: it is he that put Adam into poſſeſſion and fruition both of the fruits of the Earth, and the fiſhes of the Sea: by him, Noah eſcaped from the Deluge: by him, our forefather Abraham, of a wandring Pilgrim, became an Inhabiter of the Land of Canaan: by him, Iſaac was born, at ſuch time as his father and mother were old: D by him, Jacob became the father of his ſons ſo accompliſht in all ſorts of virtue: by him, Joſeph became Lord over all the Forces of the Egyptians: he it is that graciouſly imparteth theſe words unto you, by me his meſſenger. Let therefore theſe wholſom Laws of his be holy and inviolable amongſt you, and more dear to you than either your Wives and Children: for in obſerving the ſame, you ſhall lead a happy Life, enjoy a fruitful Countrey, a calm Sea, and a numerous Iſſue, and be always dreadful to your Enemies: for I have talked face to face with God, and have heard his immortal voice; ſo dearly beloved are you unto him, and ſo careful is he of the proſperity of your Nation. This ſaid, he conducted the People, (both Men, Women and Children) to the end they might hear God talk unto them, and teach them what to do, leſt the Law ſhould have been of leſs regard, if it had been preſented to their E underſtandings by a humane tongue. They all of them therefore heard his voice deſcending from the Mountain, ſo that every one underſtood the precepts which Moſes gave them afterwards written in the two Tables of the Law. I may not relate the very words of them, but I will expreſs the ſenſe.

But ſome few days after they preſented themſelves before his Pavilion, beſeeching him to obtain of God ſuch Laws, as might ſerve for government, and regulating the G Commonwealth. He promiſ'd them to do it, and perform'd it in ſome time after, as in due place it ſhall be expreſs'd. cended the Mountain of Sinai (having premoniſh'd the People thereof) and aſcended H the ſame in their ſight: but when the time ſeem'd tedious unto them (for he was abſent from them 40 days) they were in great fear, leſt ſome evil had hapned unto him: ſeveral ſpoke variouſly concerning it. They that lov'd him not, ſaid that he was devour'd of wild Beaſts. Others, that he was taken up unto God: but they of the wiſer ſort among them, who took no pleaſure to hear any of theſe ſuppoſitions, contain'd themſelves; being equally affected in reſpect of both the opinions: for that the one ſeem'd not inconſiſtent with humane condition, and the other had ſome correſpondence with the virtues of the man: ſo that they endur'd his fortune with an equal mind, and lamented their own miſhap, in that they were depriv'd of ſuch a Governor and Patron as he was, whoſe like they thought it impoſſible to find: neither did their care ſuffer them to hope, I neither depriv'd of hope could they chooſe but complain: neither durſt they remove their Tents, in that he had commanded them to expect his return. At length (when 40 days and 40 nights were paſt) he return'd to them: having (during that time) taſted no humane ſuſtenance; and by his arrival the whole Hoſt was repleniſh'd with great joy; whom he certifi'd that God's providence was always aſſiſting them, and that during the time of thoſe days, he had learn'd the means how they ſhould live civilly, orderly, and bleſſedly, telling them, that God commanded them to make him a Tabernacle, whereinto he would deſcend as often as it pleas'd him, which alſo in their Travel they might carry about with them: ſo that they ſhould have no more need to aſcend unto Sinai, but he himſelf would deſcend into that Tabernacle to hear their prayers. K He told them likewiſe the meaſure, and order of the ſaid Tabernacle, and that there wanted nothing, but that they preſently addreſſed themſelves to the building thereof.
This ſaid, he ſhew'd them the two Tables, containing the Ten Commandments written therein, (in each of them five) by the hand of God. The People (rejoycing at that which they had heard and ſeen) ceas'd not to beſtir themſelves to their uttermoſt, for the building of the Tabernacle: ſo that they brought in ſilver, gold, braſs, and ſtore of wood fit for building, and which would not be worm-eaten; the hair of Goats, and the skins of Sheep; the one died azure, and the other white; wools of the ſame colour, fine linnen, ſtones inchaſed in gold, wherewith men were accuſtom'd to deck themſelves, with great quantity of perfumes. Such was the matter of the Tabernacle, L which was made like to a portable and moving Temple: this ſtuff being thus gather'd together, and collected with ſo great affection, (according to each man's utmoſt ability) Moſes appointed Workmaſters, according to the Commandment of God, but ſuch, as the like could not have been choſen, although the matter had been committed to the Peoples ſuffrages; their names are now likewiſe extant in the Volumnes of the Sacred Scriptures; Beſeleel of the Tribe of Juda, the ſon of Uron, and of Mary Moſes's ſiſter: and Eliab the ſon of Iſamach, of the Tribe of Dan. The People ſhew'd themſelves ſo forward for the finiſhing of this work, that Moſes was compell'd to reſtrain them, cauſing it to be proclaim'd, That they had ſufficiently contributed for the work already; for the Workmaſters certifi'd him no leſs. They therefore addreſs'd themſelves to finiſh the M Tabernacle, being particularly inſtructed by Moſes of the meaſure and greatneſs thereof, and how many veſſels they ought to have, according to the model which God had given Moſes. The Women alſo ſtrove with emulation to exceed each other in making the Veſtures of the Prieſts, and other things which were convenient for that work, to the end to honour the ſervice of God.

CHAP. V.

Of the Tabernacle made by Moſes in the Deſart, reſembling a portable Temple.

NOw when all things were thus prepar'd, and the Veſſels of Gold and Braſs, the ſundry Ornaments and Pontifical Veſtments finiſht, Moſes commanded them to feaſt, and ſacrifice, each one according to his ability, and ſet forward the building of the Tabernacle. Firſt of all therefore he meaſur'd the outward Court, which in breadth contain'd fifty, and in length an hundred Cubits, in ſuch manner as followeth. He raiſed B 20 Columns or Pillars, five Cubits high on each of the longer ſides, and ten on the ſhorter; in the backſide to every one of theſe Pillars, there were faſtned Rings of Silver; their Corniſhes were alſo Silver, and the Baſes Braſs gilded, the lower parts of which reſembled the point of a Spear, the better to fix them in the earth. Thorow the Rings there paſs'd certain Cords of five Cubits length, which on the one ſide faſtned in the ground with brazen Nails of a Cubits length, did faſten each of the Pillars, and defended the Tabernacle againſt the force of winds. Then was there a Curtain of very fine Linnen drawn about the ſame, which hanging from the Chapters to the Baſes, and incloſing all the place, ſeem'd to differ in nothing from a Wall. And after this manner were the three ſides of the incloſure ſurrounded. But the fourth ſide, being of fifty Cubits, C was the Front of the whole Frame; the Door whereof was 20 Cubits wide, having on both ſides double Pillars; and theſe alſo were of Braſs cover'd with Silver, except the Baſes; and more inward there ſtood three Pillars well faſtned, which were alſo hung round about with a Curtain of fine Linnen; but at the Gate there hung a Veil of 20 Cubits long, and five deep, woven of Purple and Violet, fine Linnen embroyder'd with divers figures, but none of any living creature: within the Gates there was a brazen Ewer, with a foot of the ſame metal, wherein the Prieſts might waſh their hands and feet. After this manner was the Incloſure of the Court; in the midſt hereof he plac'd the Tabernacle, turning it toward the Eaſt, that the riſing Sun might ſhine upon it: the length thereof was thirty Cubits, and the breadth twelve; one of the Walls thereof lookt to- D wards the South, another towards the North, but the hinder part was towards the Weſt; and it was as high as long; and on each ſide there were 20 wooden Planks fourſquare, and join'd together four Fingers thick, and a Cubit and an half broad, lined both within and without, with plates of Gold; and every Board had two hinges, which were put thorow the two Baſes that were of Silver, and in their Sockets receiv'd the hinges of the Boards; the planks of the Weſt-wall were ſix in number, and gilded both within and without; all of them ſo cloſed together, as it ſeem'd to be but one Wall. But on both ſides there were certain Boards cloſe join'd together, which in breadth contain'd one Cubit and an half, and in thickneſs, the third part of an hands breadth, and ſo made up 30 Cubits; but ſix Boards made up the nine Cubits of the hinder Wall, to which were E join'd other two Boards half a Cubit broad, which they plac'd in the corners in ſtead of whole ones: every Board had Rings of Gold faſtned to the outward Front thereof, rivetted in order, and anſwering one another on every ſide. Thorow theſe Rings were put certain Bars which were cover'd with Gold, every one five Cubits long, which join'd the Boards together: and the end of every Bar was put into the beginning of the other, after the manner of a Box. And on the backſide of the Walls of the Tabernacle, there was one rank of Bars plac'd long ways, paſſing thorow all the planks, in which by hooks or haſps, the ſides of it were held together, and rivetted and faſtned one within the other; by which means the Tabernacle was ſecur'd from the force of Winds, and kept ſteddy and unmoveable. Within, the length thereof was divided into three parts: next to one F part thereof, containing ten Cubits, on the inſide, were plac'd four Pillars made of the ſame work and matter, planted on like Baſes, and diſtant one from the other by equal ſpaces overthwart, beyond theſe was the ſecret place. The reſt of the Tabernacle was for all the Prieſts; and this tripartite diviſion of the Tabernacle, reſembled the nature of the World; for the third part (which was contain'd within the four Pillars, to which the Prieſts had no acceſs) did, in a manner, repreſent Heaven, the Seat of God: but the ſpace of twenty Cubits (which was only permitted to the Prieſt, and was unacceſſible to others) reſembled the Sea and Land. In the Front where the entrance was, they plac'd five Pillars upon brazen Baſes; after theſe, the Curtains were ſpread about the Tabernacle, woven of Silk, and embroyder'd with Purple, G Violet, and Scarlet Colours; the firſt of theſe was ſpread ten Cubits every way, and was drawn about the Pillars, which ſeparated the Adyt from the other ſpace, and from the ſight of men; and all this Temple was call'd Holy. As for the Adyt, that A that was ſituate beyond the four Pillars; it was called the Sanctum Sanctorum, or Holy of Holieſt; and this Curtain or Vail was adorn'd with all ſorts of flowers which the earth bringeth forth; but there were no figures of living creatures to be found therein. The ſecond Vail equalled the firſt in greatneſs, workmanſhip, and colour, and incompaſſed the five pillars of the entry; which reaching from the top to the midſt of them, and faſtned to each of them by a certain Ring, gave acceſs to the Prieſts that entred the ſame. To this was there annex'd on the outſide, another Vail of like highneſs, and woven of Linnen, drawn upon Cords from the one ſide to the other, by means of certain Rings; which was ſometimes ſpread, and other times (eſpecially on the Holy-dayes) unſpread, leſt it ſhould hinder the peoples ſight: on the other days (eſpecial- B ly ſuch as were cloudy) it was ſpread, and ſerv'd for a coverture to defend the painted Vail from the weather, Which cuſtom hath continued ſince the building of the Temple, that the like Vail ſhould be ſpread in the entrance. Beſides this, there were ten other Veils, four cubits broad, and twenty eight cubits long, with certain golden hooks, enchaſed the one within the other, to the end to conjoin them, ſo that they ſeemed to be one; which being ſpread, did cover the Tabernacle in the upper part, and the walls on the ſides, and behind, not extending to the earth by a foot. Moreover, there were eleven other hangings of equal breadth, but longer; namely, every one of them of thirty cubits, woven, with as great art, of Hairs, as the other of Wooll; which covering all the reſt, and extending to the earth, reſembled the form of a Bedchamber; the eleventh, ſerv'd to cover the entrance. Theſe alſo were cover'd with certain skins C ſewed together, which protected the ſame againſt the injuries of the weather. For which cauſe to them that beheld it from far, it ſeemed a thing moſt worthy of admiration. For the colours of the Tabernacle did in no other ſort ſhine, than as if a Man ſhould have beheld the Heavens. But the Vails of hair and skins hung after ſuch manner about the entrance of the Tabernacle, that they ſerv'd to reſiſt the force and outrages of ſtorms and tempeſts.

AFter that the Tabernacle vvas after this manner built, they erected alſo an Ark vvhich vvas dedicated to God, of a certain Wood that vvas naturally ſtrong, and permanent, and that reſiſted corruption, in our Native Tongue, call'd Heoron, It was framed after this manner: The length thereof was five hands breadth; and the G breadth and height, three; and both within and without it was covered with golden plates, and it had a cover fitted with golden hinges, equal on every ſide. And to every ſide

H ſide in length there were faſtned two rings of gold, driven and riveted thorow the whole wood, and thorow them certain bars of gold were thruſt, that whenſoever there were need, it might be carried any wayes: for never was it born on Beaſts backs, but the Prieſts bare it on their ſhoulders. On the cover thereof there were two figures of Cherubins, having wings, according as Moſes ſaw them near the Throne of God; for no man before him ever had any knowledge of them. In this Ark he placed the Tables, containing the Ten Commandments, in each Table five, two and an half in one Column, and two and an half in the other; and this Ark he plac'd within the Sanctuary.

M IN the Tabernacle he placed a Table, not unlike to that at Delphos, two cubits in length, and one in breadth, and of the height of three hand breadths, the feet thereof, from the midſt downwards, were like thoſe feet which the Doriens ſet to their Beds; but that which aſcended from the other half upwards, was ſquare. The body of this Table was ſurrounded with a border, ſtanding out four fingers: and in every of the feet, there were rings faſtned about the top of the foot, through which were put bars of wood, gilded, and framed of moſt firm wood, which were not thruſt thorow the circle on both ſides, but with a button took hold of the upper border of the Table, and beneath reſted upon another upright bar, and ſo ſerv'd to carry it whitherſoever need required. This was wont to be plac'd in the Temple towards the North-wall, not far from the Sanctuary: and on it were placed twelve unleavened loaves, ſet ſix by ſix, the one over againſt the other, and made of two Aſſars of the pureſt wheat, which meaſure N of the Hebrews, contained ſeven Cotylas of the Athenians; and above theſe loaves, two golden pots filled with frankincenſe; but after ſeven dayes, other loaves were ſet in their place on the feſtival day, which we call the Sabbath. The cauſe of which Ceremony ſhall hereafter be declared.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. The Golden Candleſtick.

Hard by the Table near the South-wall, was placed a Candleſtick of gold (but not maſſie) of an hundred pound weight, (this weight the Hebrews call Cinchares, the Grecians name it a Talent in their Tongue) and it was wrought with bowls, lillies, pomegranates, and little cups; then ariſing upwards from one Baſe, it was divided into ſeven branches, according to the number of the Sun, and the reſt of the Planets; it ſtretched out likewiſe into ſeven heads, having orderly correſpondence the one with the other, on which were planted ſeven candles, according to O the number of the ſeven planets, which branched out towards the Eaſt and South, the Candle-Candleſtick being ſet ſide-long. Between this and the Table (as is ſaid) was a little Altar erected for Incenſe, made of laſting wood likewiſe, and cover'd on every ſide with a ſolid plate, being a cubit broad from every corner, and twice as high, on which there ſtood a little hearth environ'd with a golden crown, in which were rings with their bars and ſtaves, whereby it might be born by the Prieſts in the way. There was another Altar of wood alſo before the door of the Tabernacle, cover'd with plates of braſs, five cubits E ſquare, and three high, decked with gold in like ſort, and plated with braſs, the hearth whereof was made after the manner of a grate, ſo that the earth received whatſoever fire fell from above, by reaſon there was no Baſe under; but near unto the Altar there were tunnels and pots, and cenſors, and cups, with other inſtruments, made for the divine ſervice, all which were of pure gold.

Manachaſſes.

Abaneth.

Maſſabaſſanes. Maſnaemphetes.

SUch was the Tabernacle with all that belongeth thereunto. Now it remaineth to diſcourſe as well of the Veſtments of the ordinary Prieſts, which they call Chanees, as of the Prieſt whom they name Sar-Hazbachim, ſignifying thereby the High Prieſt. And firſt of all, touching the ordinary Prieſt. When as the Sacrificer puriſi'd according to the purification which is ordained by the Law, addreſſeth himſelf to Sacrifice: he firſt of all inveſteth himſelf with Manachaſſes (which is as much as to ſay, a Truſs or Reſtrainer, which is a kind of Drawers or Slops, covering the privities, made of woven ſilk) where thorow he thruſts his feet, as in a pair of upper Hoſe, and faſtens the ſame about his Loyns: over this he puts a Linnen Shirt or Surplice made of double Linnen, (which we call Chetonem, and the word ſignifieth a Linnen Garment or Surplice, for we call Linnen Cheton) this Garment is a Coat coming down to the ankles bound to the Body, having narrow ſleeves about the arms, and tyed upon the breaſt a little beneath the armholes, with a Girdle four fingers broad, ſo looſely wrought, that it ſeem'd like a Serpents skin. It was likewiſe adorn'd with red, purple Hyacinthine, and ſilken flowers, but the ground only ſilk, which being twice doubled about the breaſt, extendeth down to the ankles at ſuch time as he deſiſteth from Sacrifice, (and this they ſeemed to wear in way of ornament) but when he is to miniſter in Sacrifice, then (leſt blown up by the wind, it ſhould hinder his work) he caſts it on his left ſhoulder. This Girdle Moſes call'd Abaneth, and we, by a word borrow'd from the Babilonians, name it Emian. This Coat was in no manner pleited, and in the neck hath a broad opening, faſtned about the two ſhoulders with claſps, from the edge of the collar to the breaſt, and the midſt of the back: this call'd they Maſſabaſſanes. But on his Head he weareth a Hat, (not made with a high crown, neither comprehending the whole Head, but ſomewhat more than the half:) this is call'd Maſnaemphthes; it reſembleth a Crown, and is of woven Linnen oftentimes doubled and ſowed, which in the upper part is cover'd with another

The High Prieſt alſo uſeth the very ſame (omitting none of thoſe things which we have reckoned up) but beſide the reſt, he puts on a Violet coloured Coat, extending in length to his heels (we call it Methir) this he girdeth to him with a girdle of divers The High Prieſt's ornament Methir colours (not unlike the former) but that it is ſtudded with Gold: the skirt of the Veſt is bordered with Fringes, to which are tied certain Pomegranates, and Golden Bells intermix'd; ſo that between two Pomegranates, there is placed a Bell, and between two Bells one Pomegranate. This Coat is all of one piece without ſeam, open B in the colar, not athwart, but long ways, from the Breaſt to the middeſt of the Back.
To it is a Riband or Hem faſtned, leſt the opening ſhould be perceived: it is likewiſe open in that place where the Hands ſhould be put out. Beſides theſe veſtures, he hath this manner.) It is woven of divers colours, intermixed with Gold; in the midſt of Ephod. the Breaſt there is a ſpace left open (the ſleeves, and all the reſt are in ſuch ſort composed, that it ſeemeth to be a Coat) in this void ſpace there is a piece enchaſed of the length of a ſpan, embroydred with the ſame colours, Gold and Flowers, as the Ephod is. This piece is called Eſſen, which ſignifieth Rational (and wholly filleth the ſpace that v. 5. was left void by them that wove the Ephod.) And it is joyned with the Ephod, and Eſſen ſeu Logion.

C to every corner thereof, with Buckles of Gold, which are tyed with a Lace of Hyacinth applied to tie them together with theſe Buckles. And to the end the ſpace between the Buckles be not ſlack, the opening is filled with a Hyacinthine Riband: but on either ſhoulder are two Sardonix Stones enchaſed in Gold (inſtead of Buttons) to tie the Hood or Ephod; in theſe are ingraven the names of Jacob's Sons, in Hebrew Characters, in either Stone ſix: ſo that the elder of them were placed on the right ſhoulder.
Moreover twelve precious Stones diſtinguiſh the Eſſen or Rational it ſelf, of excellent greatneſs and beauty, which for their ineſtimable price could not be bought by any private Man. They were enchaſed three and three in four ranks in certain Crowns of Gold, to the end they might not fall out: in the firſt order was a Sardonyx, a Topaze, D and a Smaragd: in the ſecond a Carbuncle, Jaſpis, and a Saphir: in the third, a Lyncurius, an Amethiſt, and an Agate: in the fourth, a Chryſolite, an Onyx, and a Beril Stone. In theſe v. 10,11, &c. were the names of Jacob's Sons engraven, whom we eſteem for the firſt Authors of our Tribes; every Stone being honoured with a ſeveral name according to the order of their Birth. But whereas theſe Rings (whereof before we have ſpoken) were too weak, to ſuſtain the weight of the Precious Stones, they faſtned two greater in the top of the Rational toward the neck, being eminent above the texture, which might receive the Golden Chains which met at the top of the ſhoulders to be faſtned with the little Chains, the end whereof was crooked, and conveighed certain Pipes, put thorow the Rings, and were more prominent than the brim behind the Ephod, to faſten the E Rational, to the end it ſhould neither ſway this way nor that way. To the ſame Rational alſo was there a Girdle ſewed, diſtinguiſhed with the ſaid colours and Gold; which compaſſing the whole; and again knit upon the ſeam, was ſuffered to hang downwards. And as touching the Fringes, they were faſtned to hollow loops of Gold from the on end to the other. Now his Hat was ſuch as the other Prieſts uſed, on which there ſtood another ſewed thereto, and flouriſhed with Hyacinthine: this was invironed with a Golden Crown, in which there were divers Cups of Gold made after ſuch ſort as may be ſeen in that Herb which we call Daccar, and the Grecian Herbaliſts, Henbane. And leſt any Man that hath not heretofore ſeen the ſame, ſhould be ignorant of the nature thereof, v. 30.
I have thought good to ſet down the deſcription in this place. This Herb is of the The High Prieſts triple F height of three ſpans, hath a root like a Turnep or Navew, and Leafes that reſemble golden crown.
Smallage or Rocquet: out of the ſtem it putteth forth a certain bud cleaving to the branches of it, inveſted with a coat, which it caſteth off when the Fruit waxeth ripe.
This bud is as big as the joynt of a little finger, having a circumference like unto a Cup; which I will deſcribe more plainly, that the ignorant may the better comprehend it.
In the lower part thereof about the bottom it reſembleth in roundneſs a half bowl: and according as it groweth up it is ſtreightned, until being again dilated in the extremity or brim, it ends in a partition, not much unlike to a Pomegranate cut in the middeſt, to which there is annexed and groweth a round cover, as if turned and framed on purpoſe, having theſe eminent clefts (as I ſaid) like to the middeſt of a Pomegranate, G reſembling the pointed and ſharp thorns, and pricking blades. Now it containeth a certain fruit under the cover, and the whole Cup is like to the ſeed of the Herb Sideritis; Sideritis.
its flower is not much unlike that which ſpringeth from the Poppey. This Miter cover'd the back part of the head, and the two temples; for theſe cups came not near the front H or brow. For on the ſame there was as it were a plate of Gold, on which the Name of God was engraven. Such were the Ornaments of the High Prieſt.

I cannot therefore but greatly wonder at the ſtrange and cauſeleſs malice which other Nations have conceived againſt us, as if we were injurious againſt the Divine Majeſty, which (they ſay) they ſo much honour. For, if a Man mark the compoſition of the Tabernacle, and examine the habit of the High Prieſt, and conſider all the Sacred veſſels which we uſe in celebrating the Divine Service, he ſhall find, that our Law-giver was a Man of a Divine Spirit, and that we without any cauſe are injured by other Nations. For, if without partiality a Man will duely examine it, he ſhall find, that all things have been done to repreſent and figure the World. For the Tabernacle is of I thirty Cubits, divided into three parts; whereof two are left for the Sacrifices, as a place prophane, and common, ſignifying the Land and Sea, wherein all ſorts of Creatures are converſant; but the third part is ſequeſtred, and reſerved for God alone; in like ſort, as the Heaven is unacceſſible by Men. The Table on which the twelve Loaves were placed, ſignifieth the year divided into twelve months. The Candleſtick, made of ſeventy pieces, ſignifieth the twelve Signs, thorow which every one of the ſeven Planets paſs: the ſeven Lamps that were therein, repreſent the ſeven Planets. The Veyls made of four ſeveral kinds of ſtuff, reſemble the four Elements: for the Linnen ſeems to repreſent the Earth, from whence it was drawn and derived: the Purple reſemble the Sea, becauſe the Purple colour is made of the blood of a ſhell-fiſh, called K Murex: the Hyacinth, ſignifieth the Air: and the Scarlet, denoteth the Fire. The Tunicle likewiſe of the High Prieſt typifies the Earth, for it is made of Linnen. The Hyacinth which inclines to Azure, ſhews the Heaven, the Pomegranats reſemble the Lightning, as the Bells the noiſe of the Thunder. The Surcot ſheweth, that the whole World is compoſed of four Elements, reſembled by its four colours: to which Gold is annexed (as I interpret it) for that Light is annexed to all things; Eſſen alſo is planted in the middle thereof, in ſuch ſort, as the Earth obtaineth the middle place of the World. Likewiſe, the Girdle wherewith he is girt, reſembleth the Sea, which enfoldeth and begirteth all things. The two Sardonix Stones (ſet as Buttons or Loops in the High Prieſts Garment) ſignifieth the Sun and Moon. The number of the Gems allude to L the number of the Months, or the twelve Houſes, or the equal number of parts of that Circle, which the Grecians call the Zodiack. The Thiara or Mitre likewiſe hath an alluſion to Heaven, by reaſon of its Azure or Hyacinthine colour; for otherwiſe the Name of God might not be placed therein: and the, Triple Crown of Gold, by its brightneſs, repreſents his glory and Soveraign Majeſty. Let this ſuffice for the preſent; for that which we will diſcourſe hereafter, will furniſh us with ſufficient and ample matter, to ſhew and ſet out the Wiſdom of our Law-giver.

Of Aaron's Prieſthood, and the Laws which appertain to the Feaſts and Sacrifices. M

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 12. Exod. 28. v. 1, 2, 3, 29. 1. ad 28. God elected Aaron, Moſes Brother, for High Prieſt.

AFter theſe things were thus order'd, and it remained onely to conſecrate the Tabernacle, God appeared to Moſes, commanding him to eſtabliſh Aaron, his Brother, High Prieſt (who, in reſpect of his vertue, deſerved that Title of Honour above all the reſt.) For which cauſe Moſes (aſſembling the congregation) diſcourſed unto them his vertues, and diſcovered his good affection, and reckoned up unto them, how many dangers he had ſuffered in their behalf. Every one approved this choice, declaring the forward zeal and love they alwayes bare unto him. Whereupon he ſpake unto them after this manner: The work is now brought unto ſuch an end as it hath pleaſed God, and hath been poſſible for us: and for that you know we are to receive him into N this Tabernacle, we ought above all things to have a ſpecial care in the election of ſuch an one, who is to make ſacrifice and ſupplication for us. Touching my ſelf, if the matter depended on my private choice, I ſhould eſteem no Man more worthy than my ſelf to execute this Function, both for that naturally Men love themſelves, and for that I am well aſſured, how many travels I have ſupported for your ſake. But God himſelf hath judged Aaron worthy of this honour, and hath choſen him for his High Prieſt, in that he excelleth all other in equity and juſtice; commanding, that he ſhould be inveſted with the Sacred Robes, and take charge of the Altars and Sacrifices. He ſhall make Prayers for you unto God, who will hear them willingly; by reaſon that he hath care of your Race, and will receive them, proceeding from a perſon whom he himſelf O hath elected. Theſe words of his were grateful unto the People, and they all approved the election which God had made. For Aaron was more capable of that honour than any

A other, both by reaſon of his race, and in regard of the gift of prophecy which he had receiv'd, and alſo for the eminent vertue of his Brother. He had at that time four Sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. But whatſoever remained of thoſe things which were gathered for the building of the Tabernacle, was imployed to make Veyles to cover the Tabernacle, Candelſtick, Altar, and the other Inſtruments, to the end, that in their travel they might not be ſoyled either by rain or duſt. And having once more aſſembled the People together, he commanded them to offer every one of them half a Sicle; (the Sicle is a kind of Hebrew Coyne, that is as much in value as four Athenian Drams) whereunto they obeyed willingly; The number of them that offered, was ſix hundred five thouſand five hundred and fifty. And they that brought this Money, B were ſuch as were of a free condition, and betwixt the years of twenty and fifty; and that which was received, was imployed in the neceſſaries of the Temple. Then did he purifie the Tabernacle, and the Prieſts in this manner. He took the weight of five hundred Sycles of choſen Myrrh, and the like quantity of Ireos; of Cinamon, and of Calamus (which is a moſt Odoriferous Drug) the half of the ſaid weight; and he cauſed all theſe to to be beaten and infuſed into a Hin of Oyl of Olive; (this Hin is one of our Meaſures, containing two Choas of Athens) all which he mixed and boyled together, according to the Art of Perfumers, and he made thereof a moſt Odoriferous Oyntment; which he took, and anointed the Prieſt therewith, and all that which belonged to the Tabernacle, to the intent to purifie them: offering many and ſundry ſorts C of Perfumes, of great price, upon the Altar of Gold, (whereof I forbear to ſpeak any further, for fear I ſhould grow tedious to the Readers.) Twice a day before Sunriſe and Sun-ſet, they were to burn Incenſe, and ſupply the Lamps of this purifi'd Oyl; whereof, three were to burn every day upon the ſacred Candleſtick, in honour of God, and the reſt were lighted in the evening. Amongſt them that wrought and finiſhed theſe things, Beſeleel and Eliab were the moſt excellent and expert workmen; for whatſoever had been enterprized by others, they in their Art poliſhed and perfected. And they found out many new things, of their own invention: yet was Beſeleel judged the moſt excellent of the two.

All the time imployed in this work, was ſeven months; and at that time was the year accompliſhed, which began at their departure out of Egypt. In the beginning of the D ſecond year, in the moneth which the Macedonians call Xantichus, and the Hebrews Niſan, upon the new Moon; they dedicated the Tabernacle, with all things belonging thereunto, according as I have made mention. And God preſently teſtified, that both their Gifts and Works were acceptable in his ſight; by his preſence honouring the Tabernacle after this manner: The Sky being elſewhere clear and fair, over the Tabernacle alone there was a Cloud; not wholly thick, like a Winter ſtorm, nor yet ſo thin, that a Man could ſee thorow the ſame; from whenc there deſcended a Dew, that gave teſtimony of Gods preſence unto them that had Faith. Moſes having recompenced all the Work-maſters with ſuch rewards as appertained unto them by deſert, offer'd ſacrifice E according as God had commanded him, in the Door or Porch of the Tabernacle, a Bull, and a Ram, and a Kid for their ſins; (but with what ceremony theſe things are done, I will declare, when I treat of Sacrifices, as alſo what Offerings are to be burnt by fire, and according to the Law are allowed to be fed upon) and with the blood of the ſlaughtered Beaſts he ſprinkled the Veſtment of Aaron, and purified both him and his Children with Fountain water and the precious Oyntment, to the end they might be ſanctified to God. And for ſeven days ſpace he conſecrated both them, and their Veſtments, and the Tabernacle, with thoſe things which appertained thereunto, with the Oyle abovementioned, with the Blood of Bulls and Rams ſlain every other day, after their kind. But on the eighth day he proclaimed a Holy day and feſtival to all F the People, and decreed, that every one of them ſhould particularly ſacrifice, according to his ability; and they with emulation (ſtriving to exceed one another) obeyed him, and offered up their Sacrifices, according as it was commanded them.

Whilſt thus the Sacrifices were upon the Altar, ſuddenly there iſſued a fire from them, which kindled of it ſelf; the flame whereof reſembled the Light or brightneſs of Lightning, and conſumed all that was upon the Altar. At that time, there hapned an affliction to Aaron, the greateſt that could befall a Father, yet he ſupported it with a conſtant and generous mind: for he was a Man of much conſtancy, and ſuch an one as knew, that nothing could befall him without the preſcience and providence of God. Of his four Sons, the two eldeſt Nadab and Abihu, bringing other ſacrifices to the Altar G than thoſe that were appointed by Moſes, were burnt by the violent flame that iſſued from the Altar, ſcorching both their Breaſts and Faces, in ſuch ſort that they dyed without poſſibility of being ſuccoured. Moſes commanded their Father and Brothers to take their bodies, and carry them out of the Camp and bury them decently: All H

But Moſes forbad both the Father and his Sons to lament; to the end they might make it appear that being honoured with the dignity of Prieſthood, they were more ſenſible of Gods honour, than of their own miſfortune. But as touching Moſes, he refuſed all honours which were offered him by the People, neither applied he himſelf unto any other thing but to the ſervice of God. He went up to the Mountain of Sinai, and entred into the Tabernacle to take counſel of God concerning thoſe things, whereof and peace amongſt themſelves. And all this he eſtabliſhed, following thoſe directions which God inſtructed him in. But now will I return and bend my ſtile to ſpeak of that which I omitted in the ornaments of the High Prieſt; for this apparel of theirs leaveth not any occaſion to falſe Prophets, to excecute their wicked impoſtures: and if there be any ſuch, as dare intermeddle with that which appertaineth to Gods Majeſty, this habit maketh them know, that God never honoured their ſacrifices with his preſence; but he gave viſible ſigns thereof not onely to the Hebrews, but to all thoſe ſtrangers, K who by any occurrence might be eye-witneſſes of the ſame. For of thoſe Stones which the High Prieſt bare on his ſhoulders (which were Sardonixes, whoſe nature is ſo well known to all Men, that it were unneceſſary to ſpeak of it) that which was faſtned on his right ſhoulder, ſhined very clearly at ſuch time as God was preſent at the ſacrifice, and caſt its rayes afar off, that it might be perceived by thoſe that beheld the ſame, contrary to its nature and cuſtome: which truly deſerveth admiration amongſt all Men, except thoſe who through contempt of Religion, do hunt after an opinion of wiſdom.

But that which I will now ſpeak of, is more to be admired at: which is, that by the twelve Stones which the High Prieſt bare, Enchaſed in his Rational in the midſt of his Breaſt, God was wont to fore-ſignifie victory to thoſe that were prepared L for Battel. For ſuch brightneſs lightned out of them, even before ſuch time as the Army did diſlodge or enter skirmiſh, that it was maneſeſtly known to the People, that God was preſent and ready to aſſiſt them: for which cauſe the Greeks that have no averſion for our myſteries, and are convinced by their own eyes of the truth of this miracle, call it Logion, i. e. oracle, which we term Eſſen. This Rational and the Stone Sardonix gave over to ſhine two hundred years before I began to write theſe Antiquities, by reaſon of Gods wrath which he had conceived againſt us for the breach of his Laws (of which at another time I will more fitly treat, and at this time continue and proſecute my intended diſcourſe and purpoſe.) After the Tabernacle had been thus conſecrated, and that which appertained to the Prieſts was ſet in order, the People M tranſported with joy that God dwelt with them in his Tabernacle, began to ſacrifice and to ſing Hymns of praiſes, as to him that had driven far from them all fear of evil, and from whom they expected in time to come, far better and more proſperous things, and both in general and in particular they offered gifts unto God according to their tribes: and the Governors of the tribes (aſſembling themſelves together two by two) prepared a Chariot and a yoak of Oxen, ſo that there were ſix Chariots to bear the Tabernacle by the way. Furthermore, every one of them offered a vial of the weight of 70 Sicles, and a Cenſor containing 10 dariques, and a Coffer or Baſin, weighing 130 Sicles.
The Cenſor was filled with odoriferous perfumes, and the coffer and vial ſerved to hold the Meal and Oyl, which they were wont to uſe at the Altar, at ſuch time as they offred N ſacrifice. They offered likewiſe a Calf and a Ram, with a Lamb of one year old, for a burnt-ſacrifice; and a Goat for a ſin-offering. All the other Governors likewiſe brought every one of them their ſacrifice called Salutarie, for every day two Oxen and five Rams, with a Lamb and a Goat of a year old, and ſacrificed them during the term of twelve days, every one his day. But Moſes aſcended no more to the Mountain of Sinai, but entred into the Tabernacle, where he was inſtructed by God of that which he had to do, and what Laws he ought to make, which are ſo good and laudable as they ought not to be attributed to humane wiſdom: So that our Anceſtors obſerv'd them ſo religiouſly during ſome ages, that they thought that neither the pleaſures of Peace, nor the diſtreſſes of War could render them excuſable O if they violated the ſame. But I will now ceaſe to ſpeak of theſe Laws, being reſolved to compoſe another Treatiſe touching them.

CHAP. V.

The Ordinances of Sacrifices and Purifications, Levit. 1.

I will here mention onely ſome few Laws touching Purifications and Sacrifices (in that we have begun to ſpeak of Sacrifices.) The ſacrifices are of two ſorts : ſome particular, others publique; and theſe are made after two different manners; for in the one, all is conſumed which is upon the Altar, which for that cauſe are called Holocauſts, that is to ſay, Burned. The other are of thankſgiving, and they are made with banquets of thoſe that ſacrifice. But firſt of all I will ſpeak of the firſt kind. B The particular perſon that offers a burnt-offering brings an Oxe, a Lamb, and a Goat of one year old, (yet it is lawful to kill Oxen that are older.) But all thoſe Creatures which muſt be conſumed by fire, ought to be males; and after their throats are cut, the Prieſts beſprinkle the Altar round about with the blood; then dreſs the Beaſt, and cut it in pieces, and powder it with ſalt, and lay it on the Altar already charged with cleft wood, already kindled: after they have well cleanſed the feet and entrails, they lay them with the reſt; and the Prieſts take the skins. Such is the manner of a burnt-offering or Holocauſt. They that offer ſacrifices of thankſgiving, kill likewiſe ſuch ſort of beaſts without ſpot, and more than a year old, both male and female; and after they have cut their throats, they ſprinkle the blood on the Altar; C then take they the rains, the caul, and all the fat, with the lobe of the liver, and the tail of the Lamb, and lay it on the Altar; but the breaſt and the left leg is left to the Prieſts: and as touching the reſt of the fleſh, the Prieſts banquet therewith for the ſpace of two days; and if then there remain any thing thereof, it is burned. The ſame cuſtome and ceremonie likewiſe is obſerved in the ſacrifice for ſins: but thoſe that are not of ability to offer the greater offerings, offer two Pigeons, or two Turtles, the one of which the Prieſts have to feaſt withal, and the other is conſumed with fire. We will treat more expreſly of the ſacrifice of ſuch beaſts, at ſuch time as we ſhall diſcourſe of ſacrifices. For he that hath ſinned through ignorance, offereth a Lamb, and a ſhe-goat at the ſame time. The Prieſt beſprinkleth the Altar with the blood D thereof, not in ſuch manner as is ſaid before, but the Horns of the Altar only: and on the Altar they offer the kidneys, and the reſt of the fat, with the lobe of the liver: the Prieſts carry away the skins, and eat the fleſh within the Temple the very ſame day; becauſe the Law permitteth them not to reſerve any thing till the next morning. He that hath ſinned voluntarily but ſecretly offereth a Lamb, according as the Law commandeth, the fleſh whereof is in like ſort eaten by the Prieſts the ſame day. But if the Governors offer for their ſins, they ſacrifice in like manner as private Men do, and are different from them in that they bring a Bull, or a male-kid. The Law alſo ordaineth, that in ſacrifices both private and publique, there ſhould be fine flower brought for a Lamb, the meaſure of an Aſſer; for a Ram, the meaſure of two; for a Bull, E three; which flower is firſt of all mingled and wrought with Oyl, and ſet upon the Altar to be ſanctified. They that ſacrifice likewiſe do bring Oyl, the half part of a Hin for a Bull; for a Ram, the third part of the ſame meaſure; and for a Lamb, the fourth part: This Hin is an Hebrew meaſure, which containeth two Attique Choas. They bring alſo the like meaſure of Wine as of Oyl, and pour out the Wine about the Altar. And if any one to accompliſh a vow, without ſacrificing offer up fine flower, he putteth the firſt-fruits upon the Altar, that is to ſay, one handful, and the reſt is taken by the Prieſts for their maintenance, either fryed by kneading it in Oyl, or making cakes thereof: but whatſoever the Prieſt offereth, all that muſt be burned. The Law likewiſe forbiddeth to offer the young of any Beaſt whatſoever with its Dam, F if it hath not fed eight days at leaſt. There are alſo other ſacrifices made for deliverance from ſickneſs, or for other cauſes; in which ſacrifice they imploy Wine to make cakes, which are eaten with the fleſh of the Beaſts; of which it is not lawful to reſerve any thing againſt the next morning when the Prieſts have taken that portion which belongeth to and ſufficeth them. The Law commandeth, that on the common purſe there be every day killed a Lamb of a year old, the one in the morning, the other at the ſhutting up of the evening: and on the ſeventh day, which is called the Sabbath, that two be offered in that manner as hath been declared. And on the new Moon, beſides their daily offerings, they ſacrifice two Oxen, ſeven yearling Lambs, and a Wether and a Kid, for the abolition of thoſe ſins which are committed through forgetfulneſs. G On the ſeventh month (which the Macedonians call Hyperbereteon) beſides the abovenamed, they ſacrifice a Bull, one Mutton, ſeven Lambs and a Kid for a ſin offering. The tenth day of the ſame month, according to the Moon, they faſt till the evening; and on the ſame day they ſacrifice a Bull, two Muttons, ſeven Lambs, and a Goat, for H limits of the Camp into the deſart (on whom all the evil may fall, if ſo be any be threatned to the People) the other is carried without the Camp, into a clean place, where it is burned with the Skin, without reſerving any thing thereof. In like manner they burn a Bull, which is not allowed out of the common charge, but at the proper coſts of the Prieſt. This Bull being opened and ſlain, and the blood thereof (with that of the Goat) being carried into the Tabernacle, he ſprinkleth the cover thereof with his finger ſeven times, and the pavement as often, and the Tabernacle and the Altar of Gold, and all the reſt about the great Altar, which is abroad in the court. After this, they ſet on the Altar the reins and the fat with the lobe of the liver, and the Prieſt offereth I unto God a Mutton for a burnt-offering. The fifteenth day of the ſaid month (at ſuch time as it draweth towards Winter) he commanded them to pitch Tents every one for his Family, againſt the approching cold weather which that ſeaſon is wont to bring; and that when they ſhould enjoy their Countrey, and enter that City which they ſhould hold for their Metropolitan, (by reaſon of the Temple which ſhould be there builded) they ſhould celebrate a Feaſt during eight dayes ſpace, in offering burnt-offering and ſacrifices to God: and that in witneſs of their thankſgiving, they ſhould bear in their hands a branch of Mirtle, and of Willow, tyed together with Wool, and a bough of Palm likewiſe, to which a Citron was to be faſtned; and that the firſt day they ſhould ſacrifice thirteen Oxen, and fourteen Lambs, and two K ſheep, with a Goat, for a ſin-offering. Thoſe dayes that enſued, they ſacrificed likewiſe a like number of Lambs, and Weathers, with a Kid; and in rebating day by day the number of Oxen, they come back to the ſeventh. The eighth day they ceaſe from work. On this day (as we have ſaid) they ſacrifice a Calf, a Ram and ſeven Lambs, and a Kid, for a ſin-offering. Theſe are the ceremonies of the Tabernacles which have been alwayes obſerv'd by thoſe of our Nation. In the month Xantique (which we called Niſan) which is the firſt month of the year, the fourteenth day after the new Moon, the Sun being in Aries, (for at that time were we delivered out of Egypt) he ordained, that every year we ſhould renew the ſacrifice, which we call the Paſſover, and which (as I ſaid,) was celebrated the ſame time that we departed out of Egypt. L We celebrate this Feaſt according to our Tribes, without reſerving any thing of that which is offered, till the next day; which is the fifteenth day of the month, and the firſt of the feaſt of unleavened bread which followeth that of the paſſover; and during ſeven days, it is unlawful to eat any unleavened bread: and every day are ſlain two Bulls, one Ram, and ſeven Lambs, which are all conſumed with fire; to which there is added a Kid, for a ſin-offering which the Prieſts eat. The ſecond day of this feaſt of unleavened bread (which is the ſixteenth of the month) they begin to enjoy the Fruits that are reaped, and till that time untouched. And for that it is very convenient, that God ſhould be honoured with the firſt-fruits, from whom we receive ſuch abundance, they offer the firſt-fruits of Barley after this manner: After they M have dryed a handful of the ears, they beat or thraſh it, and cleanſe the Barley from the chaffe, and offer an Aſſer of the ſame upon the Altar to God; and after they have caſt a handful of the ſame on the Altar, they leave the reſt for the Prieſts uſe: and from that time forward it is lawful for them to reap as well in publick as in private.

With theſe firſt-fruits, they ſacrifice to God a Lamb, for a burnt-offering. Seven weeks after the feaſt of the Paſſover, that is forty nine days, on the fiftieth (which the Hebrews call Aſartha:) that is to ſay, fulneſs of favours, and the Greek Pentecoſte) they offer to God leavened bread, made of Wheat flower, of the quantity of two Aſſars, and ſacrifice two Lambs, which are onely offered up to God, and afterwards are prepared for the Prieſts dinner, and it is not lawful for them to reſerve any thing thereof till the next day. But the burnt-offerings are three Calves, two Wethers, N and fourteen Lambs; beſides two Kids, for a ſin-offering. There is not any feaſt wherein they offer not a burnt-offering, and deſiſt not from all manual labour: but in every one of theſe there is ordained a certain ſort of ſacrifice which they ought to do: and it is firſt ordered, that they reſt from their labours, and after ſacrifice, fall to banquet. On the common charge they offer unleavened bread, of twenty four Aſſars of flower: and thoſe loaves they bake two by two the day before the Sabbath; and the day of the Sabbath, in the morning they bring it, and ſet it on the ſacred Table, oppoſing ſix to ſix, the one againſt the other; and by them are placed two diſhes full of incenſe: and theſe things remain after this manner till the next Sabbath, and then O ſet they new in the place of the firſt, which are given to the Prieſts for their maintenance.

ſeven days, ſhould ſacrifice two Wethers, one of which ſhould be ſacrific'd, and the other given to the Prieſts. Alſo that he that hath unnatural pollution, ſhould waſh himſelf with cold water. The like muſt Husbands do after they have had uſe of their Wives. He likewiſe order'd that the Leprous ſhould be ſeparated for ever, not permitting them to frequent any Mans company, but eſteeming them as little differing from the dead: And if any one by his prayers made unto God was delivered D from this diſeaſe, and his skin reduced to its native colour, ſuch an one preſented himſelf before God with divers oblations and ſacrifices; of which, we will ſpeak hereafter.
Whence it appears how ridiculous a fable it is, that Moſes fled out of Egypt, becauſe he was a Leper, and that all the Hebrews whom he conducted with him, and brought into the Land of Canaan was troubled with that diſeaſe. For if that were true, Moſes would not have made theſe ordinances, to his own ſhame: and if any other had propoſed them he would have oppoſed himſelf againſt them; eſpecially, ſince among divers other Nations there are Lepers, who are held in great honour, and who are ſo far from diſdain and contempt, that they have been made Generals of Armies, and elected for Governors of Common-wealths, having liberty to enter the Temples, and to be preſent at the ſacrifices.
E What therefore hindred Moſes (if he had been infected with this malady) to make ſuch Laws, and ordain ſuch Statutes among thoſe People, who honoured and obeyed him; whereby ſuch as were therewith infected, might be preferred? By which it is manifeſt, that thoſe things that are objected againſt him, are rather of malice than probability.
But Moſes being clean from ſuch ſickneſs, and converſing amongſt his Countrey-men which were untainted, made theſe ordinances for them that were ſick, having regard to the honour of God. But of theſe things let each Man cenſure as beſt liketh him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 14.
The Laws of Women that are brought a-bed.
Numb. 5. v. 15. ad finem.
The Laws of adultery and jealouſie.

He forbad women to enter into the Temple ſoon after their deliverance, or to aſſiſt at the ſacrifice, until forty days were expired (if they had been brought a-bed of a Son;) but if it were a Daughter, he appointed that the number of the dayes ſhould be F doubled; and that when they ſhould enter, they ſhould preſent their offerings to God, whereof one part was conſecrated, and the other belonged to the Prieſts. And if any one ſuſpected that his Wife had committed adultery, he brought an Aſſar of Barly Meal, and caſt an handful thereof upon the Altar, and the reſt was reſerved for the maintenance of the Prieſts; and then the Prieſt placing the Woman in the porch which is right over againſt the Tabernacle, and taking the cover from her head, writeth the name of God upon a Parchment, and maketh her ſwear that ſhe hath not violated her faith to her Husband; and wiſh if ſhe had tranſgreſſed the bounds of chaſtity, that her right thigh might be put out of joynt, her belly burſt, and death follow thereupon: but if her Husband had been inconſiderately drawn into that ſuſpition through exceſs of love, then it pleaſed G God at the end of ten months to give her a Son. And after ſuch an oath miniſtred unto her, the Prieſt dippeth in water the Parchment on which the name of God was written, and then taking ſome of the earth of the Temple, according as he findeth it, and having mingled the ſame, giveth it to the Woman to drink; and if ſhe had been H unjuſtly accuſed, ſhe became with child, and brought forth happily: but if ſhe had falſified her faith to her husband, and forſworn her ſelf before God, then dyed ſhe a ſhameful death, in the manner above mentioned. You ſee what Laws Moſes provided for the ſacrifices and purifications; He furthermore made theſe Laws which enſue. He generally forebad Adultery, judging it to be a great felicity, if Men demeaned themſelves honeſtly in Marriage: and that both in politick Eſtates, and private Families, it was a thing moſt profitable, that children ſhould be born in Lawful Matrimony.

Exod. 21. Deut. 17. Levit. 18. 20, 21, 29.

He condemn'd alſo as a horrid crime for a Man to have the uſe of his Mother or his Fathers Wife, his Aunt, or his Siſter, or his Sons Wife: and deteſteth it as a moſt I heinous and hideous offence. He prohibited alſo the uſe of a Woman when ſhe hath her monthly ſickneſs; alſo the lying with Beaſts or boys, by reaſon that ſuch affections are abominable: and againſt the tranſgreſſors of theſe Laws he eſtabliſhed Capital puniſhments. He willed alſo that the Prieſts ſhould be more chaſte than the reſt, for he not onely forbad them that which he prohibited others; but moreover he enjoyned them not to marry Women that had been caſt off, or Slaves, or Priſoners, or Victualers and Taverners, forſaken by their Husbands for any occaſion whatſoever. And touching the High-Prieſt, he permitted him not to match with a Widow, (although it were Lawful for the other Prieſts) and granted him onely liberty to take a Virgin to his Wife, and to keep her. The ſaid High-Prieſt is alſo forbidden to approach a dead Man K (although the other Prieſts are not forbidden to approach their Brothers, Fathers, and Mothers, and children deceaſed,) Requiring that they ſhould be ſincere and true in all their words and actions.

Lev. 21. 7, 8, 9, What Wife the High-Prieſt might marry with.

He likewiſe ordained that the Prieſt which had any bodily defect, ſhould be maintained by the other Prieſts, but in the mean time that he ſhould not approach the Altar, nor enter into the Temple: willing that not onely they ſhould be pure in that which concerned the divine ſervice, but alſo that they ſhould ſtudy and endeavour to be ſo in all the actions of their life, to the end that no Man might reproach them. For which cauſe, when they wore the habit of Prieſts, beſides their general obligation to be always pure and ſober, they were forbidden to drink Wine; and they were to offer up entire ſacrifices, and no ways maimed. L Theſe Statutes did Moſes make in the Deſart, and cauſ'd to be obſerv'd during his life. Afterwards he made others alſo, which both the People might practiſe in that place; and then alſo when they ſhould poſſeſs the Land of Canaan. He gave reſt unto the earth every ſeventh year; ſo that it was neither tilled nor planted (in like manner as he had commanded them to reſt from their labours on the ſeventh day of the week) and he ordained, that the fruits which the earth of it ſelf brought forth, ſhould be common to all thoſe that would make uſe thereof, as well to thoſe of the Countrey, as Strangers, without any forbidding, or reſervation. He likewiſe decreed that the ſame ſhould be done after ſeven times ſeven years, and that the year following which is the fiftieth year, and which the Hebrews call Jubile, i. e. Liberty, M the debtors ſhould be acquitted by their creditors, and the Bond-Men made free, meaning thoſe that having offended againſt ſome Law had been puniſhed with ſervitude, and not put to death; and to thoſe, who from the beginning had been poſſeſſors of Lands, the ſame were reſtored in this manner following. The Jubile being at hand (which word ſignifieth Liberty) both he that ſold, and he that bought the Land, met together, and caſt up the account of the profits and expences that had been reaped and beſtowed on the Land: and if it were found that the profits exceeded the expences, he that ſold the Land repoſſeſſed it: but if the charges exceeded the value of the profits, he payed the ſurpluſage to the buyer, and retained the Land to himſelf. And if the profits and expences were equal, the reſtitution was made to him that had the antient inheritance. N He ratified likewiſe the ſame Law in houſes that were bought in Villages or Cities. For if he that ſold, counted down the money he had received before the year were finiſhed, he compelled the purchaſer to reſtore him his houſe: but if he ſtayed till the year were fully finiſhed, the poſſeſſion and free purchaſe remained unto him that bought it. Moſes received all theſe Laws from God, upon the Mountain of Sinai, and he gave them in writing to the Hebrews, that they might obſerve the ſame.

A to take a preciſe view and muſter of thoſe Men that were able to bear Arms (for the Levites were Sacred, and exempt from thoſe Functions) and the ſearch being made, there were found 603650 fighting Men, betwixt the years of twenty and fifty. But in the place of Levi, he put the Tribe of Manaſſes the ſon of Joſeph, and Ephraim in the place of his father Joſeph: according as Jacob had entreated Joſeph to give him his ſons, that he might adopt them (as hath been before declared.) When they pitched the Tabernacle, it was planted in the midſt of the Camp, guarded and defended with the Tribes, which were encamped three by three on every ſide. There were certain ways or paths likewiſe laid out between them, and a Market-place, and Shops for all ſorts of Merchandize diſpoſed by order, and Workmen and Artizans of all Occupations, travelling in their ſhops; B ſo that to look upon it, it reſembled a City.

The Prieſts firſt were placed next the Tabernacle, and after them the Levites (for there was a view alſo made of them, accounting all the Males exceeding the age of 30 days; and they were found to be 23880.) During all the time that the Cloud before mention'd cover'd the Tabernacle, as a token of God's preſence, the People remain'd always in the ſame places; and if it departed from the ſame, then remov'd they likewiſe. Moſes invented alſo a certain kind of Trumpet made of ſilver, after this manner. In length it was almoſt a Cubit, and it was like the narrow whiſtle of a Fife, but a little thicker; it had but one hole at which it was to be blown, and the end thereof was like a little Bell, in form of an ordinary Trumpet. They call it in the Hebrew Tongue Aſoſra. There C were two of them, whereof the one ſerv'd to call the People to Publick Aſſemblies; and the other, to ſummon the Princes of the Tribes, when they were to conſult about Affairs of State; and if both of them were ſounded, then all in general gather'd together. When the Tabernacle was remov'd, this manner was obſerv'd; As ſoon as the firſt Charge was ſounded, they that were incamped toward the Eaſt, diſlodged; at the ſecond Charge, they to the Southward, diſincamped; then was the Tabernacle unpitched, and carried in the midſt, ſix of the Tribes marching before, and ſix after: the Levites were all about the Tabernacle. And when they ſounded the third time, the three Tribes toward the Weſt removed: and at the fourth ſounding, thoſe on the North follow'd them. They made uſe alſo of all theſe Trumpets in the Divine Service, both on D the Sabbath and other days. Then alſo was the firſt Paſſeover celebrated by our Forefathers with ſolemn offerings after their departure out of Egypt, they being in the Deſart.

Sedition againſt Moſes, through the ſcarcity of Victuals: and the puniſhment of the Rebellious.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 16. Numb. 11. 1, 2. Sedition againſt Moſes.

NOT long after this, they remov'd their Camp from the Mountain of Sinai: and after certain encampings (of which we will ſpeak) they came to a place which is call'd Iſeremoth: There the People once more began to murmur, and to revive their E Seditions, and lay the fault of their laborious Pilgrimage upon Moſes; charging him, That by his perſuaſion, they had left a fertile Countrey; and now not only were deſtitute of the plenty thereof, but alſo in ſtead of hoped felicity, forc'd to wander here and there in extreme miſery, ſo that they had not ſo much as water to drink; and that if Manna likewiſe ſhould fail them, they muſt all inevitably periſh for want of ſuſtenance. Hereunto added they divers Contumelies, which were every where caſt upon him, though a man of ſo great deſert and conſequence. Mean while there aroſe one amongſt the People, who (admoniſhing them of the forepaſs'd benefits receiv'd by the hands of Moſes) counſell'd them to be of good courage; aſſuring them, that at that time they ſhould not be fruſtrate either of that hope, or help, which they expected at God's hands. But the F People were the rather incenſed by theſe words, and more and more whetted their ſpleens againſt the Prophet: who ſeeing them ſo deſperate, exhorted them to be of a good courage; promiſing them, that although by injurious ſpeeches he had undeſervedly been offended by them, yet he would obtain of God for them ſtore of fleſh, not for one day onely, but alſo for many. But they being incredulous, (and ſome one amongſt them demanding, How he could make proviſion for ſo many thouſand men? God (ſaith he) and I, although we be evil ſpoken of by you, yet will we never deſiſt to be careful for you, and that ſhall you ſhortly perceive. Scarce had he ſpoken this, but that all the Camp was filled with Quails, of which every one took as many as he would. Yet God, not long after, puniſhed the inſolency and mutiny of the Hebrews, by the death of no ſmall number: from G whence at this day the place hath its name, which for that cauſe was impoſed thereon, and it is called Cabrothaba; that is to ſay, The Sepulchres of Concupiſcence.

Of the Spies that were ſent to ſearch the Land of Canaan*: and how returning to the* Iſraelites*, they diſcourag'd them with fear.*

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 17. Num. 13. 1. ad 24.

BUt after Moſes had led them out of that place, and brought them into a Countrey not ſo apt for habitation, not far from the borders of the Canaanites, call'd Pharan; he called the People to a Council, and ſtanding up in the midſt of them, ſpake after this manner:

I God (ſaith he) having decreed to grant you two great benefits, Liberty, and the Poſſeſſion of a happy Countrey, hath made you already enjoy the one, and will ſhortly make you maſters of the other. For we are upon the borders of Canaan; from whence both the Cities and Kings are ſo far from driving us, that the whole Nation being united together, is not of power to expel us. Let us therefore addreſs our ſelves very confidently to attempt the matter: for neither without fight, will they reſign the Title of their Countrey unto us; nor without great conflicts, can we obtain the Palm of Victory. Let us therefore ſend out certain Spies, to diſcover the Forces of the Countrey, and how great their power is: but above all things, let us be at unity one with another; and let us honour God, who aſſiſteth us in all dangers, and fighteth for us.

Moſes ſendeth Spies to ſearch the Land of Canaan.

After Moſes had ſpoken this, the People (applauding his counſels) choſe Twelve out of the Nobleſt Families of the Tribes, to go and view the Countrey; out of every K Tribe one: who beginning from the parts extending towards Egypt, viſited all the Countrey of the Canaanites, until they came to the City of Amath, and the Mountain of Libanus. And having conſider'd both the Land, and the nature of the Inhabitants, they return'd home again, having ſpent 40 days in this journey. Moreover, they brought with them ſuch fruits as the Countrey yielded; and by the beauty thereof, and by the abundance of riches, (which they reported to be in that Countrey) they encourag'd the hearts of the People to fight valiantly: but on the other ſide, they diſmay'd them with the difficulty of the Conqueſt, ſaying, that there were certain great Rivers unpaſſable, both for their wideneſs and depth; that there were therein alſo unacceſſible Mountains and Cities, fortifi'd both with Walls and Bulwarks. Moreover, they told them, L that in Hebron they ſaw a race of Gyants; and that they had ſeen nothing ſo terrible ſince their departure out of Egypt. Thus the fear of theſe Meſſengers, brought the reſt of the multitude into a dangerous conſternation and perplexity: who conjecturing by their diſcourſe, that it was impoſſible to conquer the Land, diſſolving the Aſſembly, returned each to their Houſes, lamenting with their Wives and Children, ſaying, That God had only in words promis'd many things, but that they ſaw no effects of them. Moreover, they blam'd Moſes, and revil'd both him and his brother Aaron, the High-Prieſt. And thus ſpent they all the Night in diſquiet, venting their diſcontents both againſt the one and the other. But on the morrow they re-aſſembled their Council tumultuouſly, with intention to ſtone Moſes and his brother, and then return back again to M Egypt, from whence they came. But two of the diſcoverers (namely Joſua the ſon of Nave, of the Tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the Tribe of Juda) ſeeing this diſorder, and fearing the conſequences of it, they went into the midſt of them, and appeas'd the multitude: Praying them to be of good hope, and not to accuſe Almighty God of unfaithfulneſs, by yielding certain ſlight belief to ſome, who ſpreading vain rumors of the affairs of Cannan, had terrified the credulous multitude; but rather, follow them, who both would be the Actors and Conductors alſo of them in the Conqueſt of the Countrey: and that neither the greatneſs of the Mountains, nor the depth of the Rivers, could hinder them, that like valiant men were prepared to attempt, eſpecially God being their Guide, and ready to fight for them in that Battel. March forward therefore, (ſaid they) and laying aſide all fear, (and being aſſured of the divine ſuccors) follow us with a bold courage whitherſoever we lead you. N With theſe words labour'd they to appeaſe the tumultuous multitude. In the mean while, Moſes and Aaron falling proſtrate on their faces, beſought God, not for their own ſafety, but that it would pleaſe him to reſtore the deſpairing multitude to a better mind, who were troubled with ſo many preſent neceſſities, and vain apprehenſions of the future. Whereupon ſuddenly a Cloud appear'd on the Tabernacle, and gave teſtimony, that God was there preſent. Which when Moſes perceiv'd, (being full of confidence) he preſs'd into the midſt of the multitude, and told them, That God was provoked to take puniſhment of the outrage which they had committed againſt him; yet not ſo ſeverely, as the iniquity of their ſins deſerved, but in that diſcipline which fathers are accuſtomed to uſe, for O the amendment of their children. For at ſuch time as he ſtood before God in the Tabernacle, and beſought him with tears for the ſafety of the multitude, God had recounted unto him how Notwithſtanding all which, he would not utterly conſume them all, nor exterminate their whole Race, (whom he had honoured above all the Nations of the earth) but for puniſhment of their ſin, they ſhould not poſſeſs the Land of* Canaan, *nor taſte the ſweetneſs and plenty of its fruits; but they ſhould live in the Deſart, without Houſe or City, for the ſpace of forty years. Ver. 23. 33. The Iſraelites ſhould wander in the Deſart 40 years.

B After Moſes had diſcours'd theſe things in this manner, the People were in great ſorrow and calamity, and beſought Moſes, that he would appeaſe God's wrath conceiv'd againſt them, beſeeching him, that forgetting their faults that were paſt in the Deſart, he would make good his promiſes to them; Moſes anſwer'd them, That God was not incenſed againſt them according to the manner of humane weakneſs, but that he had given a juſt ſentence againſt them. In this place it is not to be ſuppos'd, that Moſes (who was but a man only) did appeaſe ſo many multitudes of diſpleaſed men, but that God aſſiſted him, and brought to paſs, that the People were wrought upon by his words (having by divers diſobediences, and by the calamities whereinto they were fall'n, known, that obedience was both good and profitable.) But what greater proof can be deſir'd of C the eminent virtue of this Lawgiver, and of the ſtrange Authority he acquir'd thereby, than that not only they who liv'd in his time, but even at this day, there is not any one amongſt the Hebrews, but takes himſelf oblig'd to obey the Ordinances made by him, and regards him as preſent and ready to puniſh the Tranſgreſſors of the ſame? There are beſides divers great and evident ſigns of the more than humane virtue which was in him: and amongſt the reſt, this was not the leaſt, That of certain ſtrangers that have Travel'd out of the Regions beyond Euphrates, a four months journey, to their great charges, and with no leſs peril, to honour our Temple, and offer Sacrifice; yet ſome have not obtain'd licence or permiſſion to offer, in that by our Laws it was not lawful for them to do it, and ſome other, without ſacrificing, (others the Sacrifice half finiſh'd, the D reſt not permitted to enter the Temple) have return'd back again to their homes, without finiſhing their purpoſe, chooſing rather to ſubmit to Moſes's Law, than to ſatisfie their own wills; and that without the leaſt repining or complaint. So much did the opinion once conceiv'd of this man prevail, that he is eſteem'd more than a man, out of the conſideration that he had receiv'd Laws from God, and deliver'd them to men. Of late alſo, (not long before the Wars of the Jews, during the Empire of Claudius, when Iſmael was High-Prieſt amongſt us) ſo great a Famine oppreſs'd our Nation, that an Aſſar of Meal was ſold for four drams, and there was brought to the Feaſt of Azymes the quantity of ſeventy Cores, (which make 30 Sicilian and 40 Athenian Medimni, almoſt two Buſhels of ours) none of the Prieſts were ſo bold as to eat one grain of it, E notwithſtanding the Countrey was in that extremity) fearing the Law, and God's diſpleaſure extended always againſt ſins conceal'd. For which cauſe, we ought not to wonder at that which hapned at that time, conſidering, that the Writings left by Moſes, are in ſuch force, even at this day, that they themſelves who hate us, confeſs, that God inſtituted our Government by the means and miniſtry of Moſes, and his virtue. But of theſe things, let every man think as it pleaſeth him.

CHAP. I.

The Fight of the Hebrews with the Canaanites, and their overthrow by them, without Moſes's knowledge.

Numb. 14. 4. The Iſraelites, without Gods or Moſes command, deviſe how to aſſail the Enemies.

WHilſt thus the Hebrews paſſed their Lives in great penury and perplexity in the Deſart, groaning under the burthen of their grievous Afflictions; there was nothing that more diſtracted and diſtemper'd them than this, That God had forbidden them to fight with the Canaanites. They would now no longer give ear unto Moſes, (who perſuaded them to Peace) but growing confident in themſelves, that both without his conduct and counſels, they might eaſily obtain Victory over their Enemies; they accuſed him, as if he ſought after no other thing, but that they being daily preſſed with great wants, might be enforc'd continually to depend upon his counſels. Whereupon they reſolv'd upon a War againſt the Canaanites, preſuming with themſelves, that God would ſuccor them, not only in regard of Moſes, but alſo for that he had a general care of their Nation, ever ſince the time of their Forefathers, whom he had always held under his protection; and by reaſon of whoſe virtues, he had already granted them liberty. They ſaid likewiſe, that if they fought valiantly, God would give them Victory; that they were ſtrong enough to overcome their Enemies, though they were left to themſelves; yea, though Moſes ſhould endevor to eſtrange God from them. In a word, that it was more for their advantage to govern themſelves; and that being redeem'd from the ſervitude of Egypt, they ought not to ſuffer Moſes to Tyrannize over them, or to conform their Necks under his yoke; in a vain belief, that God had only diſcover'd to Moſes, that which was good for them, by reaſon of the affection which he bare him: As if all of them were not deriv'd from the loins of Abraham, and that he onely were the Guide of all, in foreknowing the things that ſhould happen unto them, by particular inſtruction from God. That prudence oblig'd them to condemn his pride, and fix their truſt onely upon God, for conquering the Countrey which he had promis'd them, in ſpite of Moſes's contradiction; who for this cauſe hindred them, pretending the Authority of God for it. That therefore conſidering their neceſſity, and the Deſart, which daily more and more aggravated their miſery, they ſhould prepare themſelves couragiouſly to march againſt the Enemy, the Canaanites; hoping, that God would be their Guide; ſo as they needed not the aſſiſtance of their Lawgiver. When this ſentence was approv'd by a general conſent, they flock out in multitudes againſt their Enemies: who neither affrighted by their boldneſs nor multitude, valiantly reſiſted them, who deſperately charg'd them: ſo that (the better part of the Hebrews being ſlain) they purſued the reſt (enforced ſhamefully to turn their backs) even unto their Camp. This overthrow (hapning beſides all mens opinion) wondrouſly dejected the minds of the multitude, ſo that they grew deſperate of all future good fortune; concluding, that God had ſent and inflicted that plague upon them, becauſe without his counſel and order they had enterpriz'd the Battel. But when Moſes ſaw that his Countreymen were diſmay'd with the overthrow which they had receiv'd, and the Enemy grown proud with their Moſes retireth the people into the Deſart.

A their late Victory, fearing likewiſe leſt (not content with their preſent ſucceſs) they ſhould attempt further, he determined to retire his Forces back again into the Deſart.
And whereas the People promiſed thenceforward to be obedient to him, (being taught by their own miſery, that nothing would fall out proſperouſly unto them, without the counſel and conduct of their Guide) they diſincamping themſelves, retired into the Deſart with this reſolution, that they would no more attempt a Battel againſt the Canaanites, till they received a ſign of their good ſucceſs from Heaven. But even as in a great Army it accuſtomably falleth out (eſpecially in time of trouble) that the common multitude wax head-ſtrong and diſobedient to their Governors, ſo did the like alſo happen amongſt the Jews. For whereas they were in number 600000, and even in their better B Fortunes ſufficiently diſobedient to their Governors, ſo much the more were they exaſperated by their wants and misfortunes, both amongſt themſelves, and againſt their Governor.
For which cauſe there aroſe ſo great a Sedition, as neither among the Greeks or Barbarians the like was ever heard. Which things, without doubt, had overthrown them, (being brought into ſo deſperate an eſtate) had not Moſes (forgetting the injury he had received, which was no leſs than a purpoſe to ſtone him to death) ſuccoured and relieved their diſtreſſed Fortunes. Neither did God utterly abandon the care of them: but although they were contumelious againſt their Lawgiver, and tranſgreſſed alſo againſt the Laws which he had delivered them by Moſes, yet delivered he them out of that danger; of which (without his ſpecial Providence) there could be expected no C other but a lamentable iſſue. This Sedition, as alſo how Moſes governed the eſtate when the troubles were ended, we will now declare, having firſt expreſſed the cauſe thereof.

Sedition againſt Moſes.

CHAP. II.

The Sedition raiſed by Chore againſt Moſes and his Brother, for the Prieſthood.

Numb. 16. 1. ad 4.

Chore endeavoureth to perſuade the multitude to mutiny againſt Moſes.

CHore (a Man noble by Birth, and famous for his wealth amongſt the Hebrews, and endowed with a certain kind of popular Eloquence) ſeeing Moſes placed in the higheſt place of Authority, was filled with jealouſie and envy thereat. For although he were of the ſame Tribe and Kindred, yet he thought it a great indignity to himſelf, to D be held his inferior, being both more potent in Riches, and his equal in Parentage. For which cauſe, he began to murmur and complain to the Levites, (which were of the ſame Tribe with him, and his Kinſmen) telling them, That it was not to be ſuffered, that Moſes, under a pretext of Communication with God, ſhould by ambitious policy (to other mens prejudice ) onely ſtudy his own glory; having of late, againſt all ſort of reaſon, given the Prieſthood to his Brother Aaron, and diſtributed other dignities, at his own pleaſure, like a King, without the ſuffrage and approbation of the People. That this injury done by him, was not to be endured, by reaſon that ſo covertly he had inſinuated himſelf into the Government; that before it could be obſerv'd, the People would be brought into ſervitude. For he that knoweth himſelf to be worthy of a Government, endeavors to obtain the ſame by the conſent of the People, and not E by force and violence; but they that deſpair by good means to attain thereunto, do notwithſtanding abſtain from force, leſt they ſhould loſe the opinion of their goodneſs and honeſty; yet endeavor they by malicious ſubtilties to attain thereunto. That it concerned the Commonweal to check the attempts of ſuch Men, leſt of private, they at laſt grow publick Enemies. For what reaſon (ſaid he) can Moſes give, why he hath beſtowed the High Prieſthood on Aaron and his Sons? If God had decreed, that this honour ſhould be beſtowed on one of the Tribe of Levi, there were more reaſon that I ſhould have it, who am of the ſame Kindred with Moſes, and who ſurpaſs him both in riches and age. On the contrary, If this honour appertain to the moſt ancient of the Tribes, that of Reuben ought by right to enjoy it, namely, Dathan and Abiram, and Phalal, who are the moſt ancient of that Tribe, and the moſt powerful in riches. Theſe things F ſpake Chore, under colour and pretence of the good of the Commonwealth, but in effect only to raiſe a Tumult amongſt the multitude, and intrude into the office of the High Prieſt. Which diſcourſe of his paſſing by little and little, from one ear to another, amongſt the multitude, and multiplied by the envious, and ſuch as maligned Aaron, at laſt brought all the Tribes into a mutiny: ſo that 250 of the chiefeſt Nobles grew at length to be partakers of Chore's Conſpiracy; and all of theſe conſpir'd together to take away the Prieſthood from Moſes's Brother, and to transfer it to him. The People likewiſe were in ſuch ſort incenſed, that they ſought to ſtone Moſes; and ran all of them confuſedly with noiſe and uproar, crying out before the Tabernacle of God, that the Tyrant was to be cut off, and the People delivered from thraldom, who under pretext G of Religion, had inſupportable thraldom impoſed on them. For if it were God that had choſen him to be High Prieſt, he would have preferred ſuch an one to the dignity who had been worthy, and would not have confer'd it on thoſe who were far inferior to others;

others: That if he had decreed to beſtow it on Aaron, he would have remitted the election to the People, and not left the diſpoſition thereof to his Brother. Although Moſes was inform'd of Chore's treacherous Calumnies, and ſaw the People highly incenſed, yet was he nothing at all abaſhed thereat: but being ſatisfi'd in his Conſcience, that he had governed the eſtate uprightly, and well aſſured, that his Brother obtained the Prieſthood, not by his favor, but Gods election, he came into the Congregation; where he uttered not one word againſt the People, but addreſſing himſelf to Chore, he expoſtulated with him, and accuſed him with great vehemency, being (beſides his other qualities) by nature eloquent and fit to ſpeak in publick Aſſemblies. H Moſes's Oration to ſeditious Chore. Ver. 8, &c.

I think (ſaith he) Chore, that both thou and every one of theſe (pointing with his finger at the 250 Men of his faction) are worthy of honour; yea, I contemn not the reſt of this Aſſembly, although they are not to be compared to you in Riches, and other endowments. But neither doth Aaron therefore poſſeſs the Prieſthood, becauſe he is richer (for thou haſt more ample poſſeſſions than either of us) neither becauſe he is more noble, (for God hath equally imparted the ſame unto us all, having given us one and the ſame Grandfather) neither have I been moved thereunto by Brotherly affection, to beſtow that on him which was due unto others. For had I conſider'd any thing but God, and the obedience I owe to him, I ſhould rather have taken this honour to my ſelf, than have given it him; ſince there is no man more near to me than my ſelf. For what wiſdom had it been in me, to expoſe my ſelf to thoſe dangers which they incur, who commit an injuſtice, and ſuffer another man to reap the advantage of it? But God forbid that my Conſcience ſhould be ſtained with any ſuch ſin; were I guilty of this fault, God would not leave me unpuniſhed, who had contemn'd him, nor you ignorant of what ye ought to do, in order to pleaſe him. 'Tis he, not I, that choſe the High Prieſt; and by this means he hath acquitted me of that accuſation, which in this reſpect might be brought againſt me. But though Aaron hath obtained this degree, (not by my favor, but by God's own appointment) yet notwithſtanding he referreth and remitteth the matter to the publick diſpoſition and order of you all; neither requireth he any prerogative, for that he hath already exerciſed the charge, but eſteemeth it to be the greateſt good fortune that may befall him, to ſee your Mutinies and Seditions ceaſe, although with the loſs of that honour which he hath received from your own election. For neither have we been guilty of diſreſpect towards God, in accepting that which it pleas'd him to give us; nor on the contrary, could we refuſe it without impiety. But ſince it is a thing moſt reaſonable, that he who gives, ſhould confirm the gift which he hath given; God therefore ſhall once again determine, who, amongſt you, ſhall be choſen to offer Sacrifice unto him, and to take charge of thoſe things which appertain to Religion. And ſurely Chore will not be ſo bold as to pretend by the deſire he hath to this dignity, to deprive God of the authority to diſpoſe the ſame as beſt liketh him. I K L

Ceaſe therefore to mutiny amongſt your ſelves, and to be tumultuous upon this occaſion; let every one of you that deſire the Prieſthood, to morrow bring each of you his Cenſer with perfumes, and fire from his houſe. And thou, O Chore, be not aſham'd to yield unto God; and to expect his judgment, without going about to raiſe thy ſelf above him: but come thou alſo amongſt the reſt of the Competitors in this honour, to hear the deciſion. Neither ſee I cauſe, why Aaron ſhould not be there alſo preſent; to be judged with thee, in that hitherto he hath virtuouſly and uprightly behaved himſelf in the execution of that office, and is likewiſe of the ſame Tribe and Race that thou art of. You ſhall all offer Incenſe in the preſence of the People, and let him whoſe offering ſhall be moſt acceptable in God's ſight, be declared and eſtabliſhed High Prieſt: ſo ſhall I be acquitted of that ſlander which is wrongfully urged againſt me, of having (by my particular grace and favour) beſtowed the office of the Prieſthood on my Brother. M

After Moſes had ſpoken in this manner, the People gave over murmuring, and the ſuſpitions which they had conceiv'd againſt Moſes; approving in themſelves all that which had been ſpoken, as being profitable for the Commonwealth. So the Aſſembly ſeparated. N

CHAP. III.

How the Authors of the Sedition were ſlain by God's judgment, and the Prieſthood confirmed to Aaron and his Sons.

The year of the World, 2455; before Chriſt's Nativity, 1509.

Ruffin. chap. 1; Numb. 16. 31, 32, 33.

THE next day the People re-aſſembled, to aſſiſt at the ſacrifice, and to ſee the controverſie decided amongſt the Competitors; neither was this Aſſembly without B ſome tumult: for the whole multitude were in ſuſpence, in expectation of the event; and ſome of them were deſirous that Moſes might be convicted of deceit. But the wiſer ſort, deſired to ſee an end of the Sedition; for they feared leſt the Commonwealth ſhould be utterly ruin'd, if the Tumult ſhould proceed any further. The multitude likewiſe (being naturally deſirous of novelty, and prone to ſpeak evil of their Magiſtrates) were diverſly diſpoſed upon every occurrent. Moſes ſent his ſervants to Abiram and Dathan, to ſummon them to appear (according to the accord) to attend the iſſue of the ſacrifice. But their anſwer was, that they would not obey him, nor any longer permit him to aſſume to himſelf a Soveraign authority over them. Which when Moſes underſtood, he took divers of the Elders of the People with him; C and though he was eſtabliſh'd by God to command over all in general, yet he diſdained not to go in perſon to theſe Revolters. Now when Dathan and thoſe of his faction underſtood that Moſes with the Nobles were coming unto them, they, their Wives and Children came out of their Tents to wait for him reſolutely; having with them alſo their Servants, who were armed to oppoſe themſelves againſt Moſes, if ſo be he ſhould offer them any violence. He no ſooner drew near to them, but lifting up his hands unto Heaven, he cried out with a loud voice in the hearing of the whole Multitude, and prayed after this manner: O God (ſaid he) Thou Lord over all that which either Heaven or Earth, or Sea containeth; thou art a ſufficient witneſs to me of all mine actions; for that I have managed all things by thy will, and thou art he who haſt given D me power to execute my purpoſes: thou that alwayes in commiſeration of the Hebrews haſt been my perpetual help and aſſiſtance, hear this my Prayer. For nothing that is either done, or thought, is hidden from thee: for which cauſe I hope thou wilt not diſdain to teſtifie and juſtifie my truth, and manifeſt the ingratitude of theſe Men. Thou knoweſt Lord every thing that hath paſſed in the firſt years of my life; not for that thou haſt heard it, but for that thou haſt ſeen and been preſent at it; Thou knoweſt alſo all that hath hapned to me ſince, nor is this People ignorant thereof; But becauſe they maliciouſly interpret my management of affairs, be pleas'd, O my God, to give them a teſtimony of my innocence. At ſuch time as I led a peaceable life, and that by thy help and my labour, and my Father-in-law Raguels favour, I liv'd quietly and happily, I forſook the poſſeſſion of my goods, and the fruition of my peace, E to ingage my ſelf in theſe miſeries which I have ſuffered for theſe Men: and particularly for their liberty; and now likewiſe for their ſafety, I have moſt readily undertaken grievous travels. Now therefore ſince I am grown into ſuſpition among thoſe Men, who by my care and providence have eſcaped ſo many miſchiefs and miſeries; thou that appearedſt unto me in that fire on the Mountain of Sinai, and vouchſafedſt both to ſpeak unto me, and to confirm me by the ſight of miracles; who in thy Name didſt ſend me a meſſenger into Egypt; who haſt abated the pride of the Egyptians, and haſt given us means to eſcape from their Servitude; and haſt humbled Pharaohs power, when we were ignorant of our way, by giving us a paſſage thorow the Sea, in whoſe bottom afterward the Egyptians were drowned; who gaveſt us Arms, when we were naked; thou madeſt the bitter water ſavory, and fit to be drunk of; and in our ſcarcity of water, F enforcedſt drink for us out of the bowels of the hard Rock; and when we found no meat on the Land, didſt ſend it us from the Sea; Moreover (as a thing never before heard of) affordedſt us meat from Heaven, and haſt eſtabliſhed our eſtate with admirable and holy Laws: Be thou, O Lord, my Judge in all things, and my unpartial witneſs, that I have not been corrupted by any bribe of any particular Hebrew, to favour injuſtice, nor ſuffered a poor Man, in his juſt cauſe, to loſe his right againſt a rich adverſary. And now having adminiſtred the Commonwealth with all ſincerity, I am called in queſtion for a crime, whereof I am altogether guiltleſs, as if I had conferred thy Prieſthood on my Brother for private affection, and not by thy command: make it known that all things are diſpoſed by thy providence, and that nothing is brought to effect by caſualty, but by thy ſpecial ordinance: And to ſhew that thou haſt care of the Hebrews, teſtifie G the ſame by thy juſt puniſhment inflicted on Dathan and Abiram, who accuſe thee to be inſenſible, and boaſt that thou art circumvented by my ſubtilties. But thou ſhalt make thy revenge moſt notorious upon the unbridled detractors of thy glory, if they periſh after no common manner, but let the earth, which they unworthily tread upon, open it'ſelf and ſwallow them up with all H their Families and ſubſtance. By this means both thy power will manifeſtly appear unto all Men, and thou ſhalt leave an example to poſterity, that no Man hereafter ſhall dare to think otherwiſe of thy Majeſty than becometh him; and my miniſtry ſhall be proved to proceed from thy direction. But if theſe crimes be truly urged which are inforced againſt me, then let the curſe return and light on mine head; and let thoſe whom I have curſed, live in ſafety. But Lord, after thou haſt inflicted puniſhment upon thoſe that diſturb thy People, keep the reſt of the multitude in peace, concord, and obſervation of thy commandments, ſince it is contrary to thy juſtice, that the innocent multitude of the Iſraelites ſhould anſwer their miſdeeds, and ſuffer their puniſhments. Whileſt he ſpake theſe words, and intermixed them with tears, I the earth preſently trembled, and ſhaking, began to be agitated (after ſuch a manner as the waves of the Sea are by the winds in a great Tempeſt.) Hereat were all the People amazed; and ſoon after with a dreadful noiſe the earth opened, and ſwallowed up the ſeditious, with their Families, their Tents, and all their Goods, ſo that nothing remained of theirs to be ſeen. Whereupon in a moment the earth cloſed again, and the vaſt gaping was ſhut, ſo that there appeared not any ſign of that which had hapned. Thus periſhed they all, leaving behind them an example of God's power and judgments. This accident was the more deplorable, in that their was none of their kindred or allies that had compaſſion of them: ſo that even thoſe that had ſided with them, praiſed God's Juſtice with joyful acclamations, eſteeming them unworthy to be bemoaned, but to be held as the plague and perverters of the People. After that Dathan with his Family K was extinguiſhed, Moſes aſſembled all thoſe that contended for the Prieſthood together, committing again the election of the Prieſthood unto God, concluding that that honour ſhould be ratified to him, whoſe ſacrifice was moſt acceptable in God's ſight. For which cauſe the two hundred and fifty Men aſſembled themſelves, who were both honoured for the virtue of their Anceſtors, and for their own abilities; with theſe alſo ſtood Aaron and Chore, and all of them offered with their cenſors before the Tabernacle, ſuch perfumes as they brought with them; when ſuddenly ſo great a fire ſhone, as the like was never ſeen, either breaking forth from the bowels of the burning earth, kindled in Foreſts by the Sun and Winds, but ſuch an one as ſeemed to be kindled by God himſelf moſt bright and flaming: by force and power whereof thoſe two hundred and fifty (together with Chore) were ſo conſumed, that there ſcarce appeared the leaſt L relique of their carcaſſes; onely Aaron remained untouched, to the end it might appear that this fire came from Heaven. Theſe things thus brought to paſs, Moſes (intending to leave a perpetual memory to poſterity of that puniſhment) to the end they ſhould not be ignorant thereof, commanded Eleazar the Son of Aaron to conſecrate their Cenſors, and faſten them to the Brazen Altar; that by reaſon of this Monument, all Men might be terrified, who think that the Divine power can be circumvented by humane policy.

Chore with two hundred and fifty Men is conſumed with fire.

What things hapned in thirty eight years ſpace to the Hebrews in the Deſart. M Numb. 17.1, 2,3. ad finem.

Another ſedition againſt Moſes.

AFter that by ſo evident an Argument it appeared ſufficiently, that Aaron neither by ſiniſter inſinuations, nor by the favour of his Brother, but onely by God's election, had obtained the Prieſthood; he ever after, held it without any contradiction. Yet for all this, a new ſedition brake out among the People with greater fury than at firſt, by reaſon of the Subject which occaſioned it. For though they were perſwaded, that all that had hapned was brought to paſs by God's order and will, yet they imagined that God wrought theſe things in favor of Moſes; to him therefore imputed they all theſe things, as if God had not puniſhed thoſe Men through indignation N againſt their ſins, but onely upon Moſes ſollicitation: and they alledged, that Moſes (having given this maim unto the People, by the loſs of ſo many Noble Men, who, as they ſaid, periſhed onely for the zeal they bear to God's Service) not onely had done them open wrong; but, which was more, had aſſured the Prieſthood to his Brother after ſuch a manner, that henceforward no Man durſt pretend to the ſame, ſeeing how miſerably thoſe others were puniſht by a violent death. Moreover, the Kinſmen of thoſe that were ſlain, ſollicited and ſtirred the People, praying them to reſtrain the Pride and overgreat power of Moſes, in that it lay in their power eaſily to perform the ſame. But Moſes perceiving that the People were incenſed, O and fearing leſt once more they ſhould fall upon ſome Innovation, whereby ſome great miſchief might ſucceed, he aſſembled them together, and gave audience to their accuſations: and without replying any wayes (for fear he might the more incenſe

A incenſe them) he onely commanded the heads of the Tribes, to bring every one a rod whereon the name of each Tribe ſhould be written, promiſing that the Prieſthood ſhould remain with them, in whoſe rod God ſhould ſhew any ſign. Which propoſal being allowed by all, both they and Aaron brought their rods with their inſcriptions; and Aaron had written on his the name of the Tribe of Levi. Theſe Moſes laid in the Tabernacle, and the next morning brought them forth every one, (which were eaſily known by the People to be the ſame which the Princes of the Tribes had brought, by the marks which they had made upon them) and they ſaw that all theirs remained in the ſame form which the day before they retained, when Moſes took them; but out of Aaron's rod there grew Branches and Buds: and which is more to be wondred B at, it bare ripe Almonds, becauſe it was of the Wood of the Almond-Tree. The People amazed at the ſtrangeneſs of this ſpectacle, changed their hatred againſt Moſes and Aaron, into admiration of the judgment which God gave in their favour; and forbare any more to repugn againſt God, or to oppoſe themſelves againſt Aaron's Prieſthood. Thus three times confirmed by the approbation of God, by all Mens conſent he remain'd High-Prieſt; and the People of the Hebrews turmoyled with long ſeditions, at laſt by this means became ſetled peace in and quietneſs. But after Moſes had made the Tribe of Levi (which was dedicated to God's ſervice) free and exempt from warfare; (for fear leſt they ſhould employ themſelves in providing neceſſaries for their maintenance, and ſo grow negligent in the ſervice of God) he ordained, that C after the Land of Canaan ſhould be conquered, Forty eight of the beſt Cities, with their Lands within two Miles compaſs, ſhould be given to the Levites. Moreover, he commanded that the tenths of all the yearly fruit that was gathered by the whole People ſhould be given to the Levites and Prieſts; which hath been ever ſince inviolably obſerved. Now muſt I declare what things are proper to the Prieſts. Of the forty eight Cities which were granted to the Levites, he commanded them to give thirteen to the Prieſts, and the tenth part of the Tythes. Beſides, he ordained that the People ſhould offer to God the firſt-fruits of whatſoever the earth yieldeth; and that the firſt-born of four-footed Beaſts allow'd for ſacrifice, if a male, ſhould de delivered to the Prieſts to ſacrifice, to the end they might be nouriſhed with all their Family in D the ſacred City of Jeruſalem; and that for thoſe which the Law forbids to eat, there ſhould be paid by the owners, in lieu of a firſtling, a Sicle and an half; and for the firſt-born of a Man, five Sicles. He allotted them likewiſe the firſt-fruits of Sheep-ſhearing; and thoſe that bak'd Bread of new Corn were to give them Cakes. But when they who are called Nazarites (becauſe they let their Hair grow and taſte no Wine) have accompliſht their vow, and come to preſent themſelves in the Temple to cauſe their Hair to be cut, the Beaſts which they offer in ſacrifice belong to the Prieſts. And as for thoſe that have conſecrated themſelves to the ſervice of God, when they deſire to be diſmiſſed from that miniſtery (whereunto by voluntary vow they bound themſelves) they muſt pay money to the Prieſts; a Woman, thirty Sicles, a Man E fifty; and thoſe that have not ſo much money, refer themſelves to the diſcretion of the Prieſts. And when any Man kills a Beaſt to eat in private, and not to offer to God, he ought to give the Prieſts the fat Gut, the Breaſt and the right Shoulder. This is the allowance which Moſes aſſign'd to the Prieſts, beſides what the People offer for ſins, as we declared in the precedent Book: and whatſoever is contributed by the People to the order of the Prieſts, he commanded that both their Wives, Children and Servants ſhould be made partakers of the ſame, except thoſe things which are offered for ſins, of which onely the Men which are imploy'd in divine ſervice may eat, and that in the Tabernacle, and the very ſame day that ſuch ſacrifices are offered. After all theſe conſtitutions were made by Moſes, and the mutiny appeaſed, he removed the F Camp to the borders of Idumæa, where he ſent Ambaſſadors to the King thereof, deſiring him to grant them free paſſage, on condition to give him what aſſurance he would demand, that no violence or injury ſhould be offered to his Countrey, and that he would pay for whatſoever victual or water either he or his Army ſhould receive. But the King ſetting light by the Ambaſſage, denied them paſſage, and with a well furniſhed Army marched forth againſt Moſes to withſtand him, if contrary to his will he ſhould attempt to paſs thorow his Countrey. Moſes asked counſel of God, who forbad him to begin the War firſt, and commanded him to retire back again into the Deſart. At that time died his Siſter Mary, the fortieth year after their departure out of Egypt, and the firſt Moon of the month Xantiqua: ſhe was Magnificently enterred G at the common charge, on a certain Mountain called Sein. And after the People had mourned for her thirty days, Moſes purified them after this manner: The High-Prieſt kill'd near the Camp in a very clean place a young red Heifer without blemiſh, (which

A man clean and chaſte gather'd up all the aſhes, and put them in a clean place; and all that needed to be puriſi'd, either for having touch'd one dead, or been preſent at a Funeral, caſt ſome of theſe aſhes into Fountain water, wherein they dip a Branch of Hyſſop, and therewith beſprinkled themſelves the third, and the ſeventh day; after which they paſs'd for purified. Moſes likewiſe ordained, that the like ceremony ſhould be uſed, when they had conquered the Countrey whereof God had promiſed them the poſſeſſion.

But after the Army (that had ſo long mourned for the dead Siſter of the General) were thus purified, he led them thorow the Deſart, into Arabia: and arriving in a place (which the Arabians account for their Metropolitan City, in times paſt called Arce, and at this preſent Petra) he ſpoke to Aaron to aſcend up a high Mountain, which ſerves for bounds to the Country; becauſe it was the place where he was to yield up his ſoul to God. Aaron went up, and in the ſight of all the Army, ſtanding on a high place, he put off his Prieſtly ornaments, and gave them to his Son Eleazer, to whom by eldership the ſucceſſion appertained. And thus (in the ſight of the People) he died in the hundred twenty and third year of his age, on the firſt Moon of the month of Auguſt, called by the Athenians, Hecatombeon; by the Macedonians, Lous; and Sabba, by the Hebrews. Thus Moſes loſt in the ſame year his Siſter and his Brother, and all the People mourned for him thirty dayes. After this, Moſes remov'd his Camp from thence, and pitched his Tents near unto a River called Arnon (which ſpringeth from the Mountains of Arabia, and runneth along the Deſart, and then entreth into the Aſphaltique Lake, ſeparating the Region of the Moabites from that of the Amorites.) The Countrey is ſo fertile, that it ſuffices to maintain all the inhabitants though very numerous. To Sehon, King of this Countrey, Moſes ſent Ambaſſadors, deſiring paſſage thorow his Kingdom, under ſuch aſſurance as ſhould beſt pleaſe him, that no wrong ſhould be offered, neither to his Countrey, nor the inhabitants thereof: and he would pay the price of whatſoever his Souldiers took either in Victuals, or Water. But Sehon refuſed him, and Arming his People, pitched his Tents on the Banks of Arnon, being ready to oppoſe the Hebrews, if they preſumed to paſs the River.

Numb. 21. v. 21. Ad finem The Hebrews addreſs themſelves to fight againſt the Amorites.

But when Moſes ſaw the Amorites diſpoſed to hoſtility, he judg'd that the injury and contempt was not to be endured, and conſidering the Hebrews were an untractable kind of Men, and ſuch, as idleneſs, and want together, might perſwade to renew their former ſeditions and tumults; in order to prevent all the occaſion, he asked counſel of God, whether he would permit him to force his paſſage by the ſword: God not only allowed his purpoſe, but alſo promiſed him Victory; whereupon he determin'd upon a War with great confidence, and animated and encouraged his Troops; telling them, that the time was now come, wherein they might enterprize their long deſired War with God's approbation and encouragement. They rejoicing at this liberty that was granted them, preſently took Arms, and being ranged in battel, haſted to charge the Enemy. On the other ſide, the Amorite (as ſoon as he ſaw them march forward, and begin the onſet) forgetting his former fierceneſs, was both himſelf terrified; and his Souldiers (who before the fight of their Enemies, were as cruel and bloody as Lyons) now waxed as fearful and as meek as Lambs. So that they ſcarcely had endured the firſt aſſault, but they fled; repoſing the whole hope of their ſafety in their retreat, to their Walled Towns (which notwithſtanding did nought at all avail them,) For no ſooner did the Hebrews perceive, that their Enemies began to flie, and that their ranks were broken, but they more eagerly charged them, and put them to the rout. And being extremely nimble, and lightly Arm'd, and beſides very expert in uſing the Sling, and all other weapons proper for fighting at diſtance, either they overtook ſuch as fled, or with their Slings, Darts and Arrows, ſtopt the flight of thoſe whom they could not overtake. So that there followed a very great ſlaughter, eſpecially near the River; becauſe thoſe that fled being no leſs moleſted with thirſt, than with the pain of their wounds, (in that it was Summer-time) went thither to drink in great multitudes. Their King, Sehon, alſo was ſlain in this Fight. And the Hebrews ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlain, and took many foraging and ſpoiling the ſame without any reſiſtance; by reaſon that the Enemy, and all his Forces were defeated. This was the deſtruction which hapned to the Amorites, who neither uſed their Counſel prudently, nor manag'd their War valiantly. But the Hebrews poſſeſs'd their Countrey which is encloſ'd between three Rivers, after the manner of an Iſland. For Arnon terminates the Southern Coaſts thereof, and Jobac the Northern, (which flowing into Jordan, loſeth its name) the Weſtern Coaſts is water'd by the River of Jordan. Amidſt this proſperity of the Iſraelites, there aroſe a new Enemy againſt them; Og King of Galaad, and of the Countrey of Gaulanitis, was coming as a B Friend and Companion to aſſiſt Sebon, and underſtood the loſs of the Battel; yet being very daring, he was in hope to obtain a Victory, and determined to make tryal both of his own Mens and his Enemies valour: which hope of his fail'd him, for he both died in the Battel, and his whole Army was likewiſe defeated. Moſes no ſooner paſſed over the floud of Jobac, but entring Og's Kingdom, he overthrew one City after another, and deſtroy'd all the Inhabitants thereof, who were exceeding rich. Og was a man of a moſt gigantick ſtature, and prodigious ſtrength; his Bed which was of Iron, and which was found in his chief City call'd Rabatha, was four Cubits in breadth, and nine in length.

This ſucceſs did not only bring preſent advantages to the Hebrews, but alſo open'd them a way to greater Conqueſts; for they took ſixty well fortifi'd Cities which were under C his Government: ſo that there was not any of the meaneſt Soldiers but were greatly enrich'd with pillage. After this, Moſes remov'd his Camp toward Jordan, and pitched it in a broad Plain near the City of Jericho (which is rich and fruitful, and aboundeth with Palm-trees and Balm.) And now were the minds of the Iſraelites in ſuch ſort confirm'd, that they deſir'd nothing more than War and Battel; and Moſes thinking good to make uſe of this their forwardneſs, (having ſacrific'd to God in way of Thanksgiving, and feaſted the People) he ſent part of them arm'd to deſtroy the Countrey of the Madianites, and to force the Cities of that Region: which War had this Original.

Of the Prophet Balaam.

When Balac King of the Moabites (who was both an old Friend and Confederate with the Madianites) ſaw the progreſs of the Iſraelites, he began to ſuſpect the ſecurity of his own fortune and eſtate: for he knew not that God had inhibited the Hebrews to attempt the Conqueſt of any other Countrey but the Land of Canaan. And therefore more raſhly than prudently, he reſolv'd to oppoſe them: and for that he durſt not aſſail them in Battel, whom he knew elevated with the ſucceſs of many Victories; yet deſirous to hinder them from proceeding any further, he ſends Ambaſſadors to the Madianites to conſult with them what was fit to be done. The Madianites knowing that E beyond Euphrates there liv'd a famous Prophet call'd Balaam (who was their eſpecial Friend) ſent ſome of their moſt honourable Princes together with Balac's Ambaſſadors, beſeeching him that he would come unto them, and curſe the Iſraelites. The Prophet entertained the Ambaſſadors with great humanity, and ask'd counſel of God concerning what anſwer he ſhould give them: God forbad him to do that which they deſir'd.
And ſo Balaam told them, that he wanted not will to gratifie them, but that God, to whom he owed the gift of Prophecy, forbad him; for that Army which they deſired ſhould be curſed, was dearly beloved of God. For which cauſe he gave them counſel to make peace with the Iſraelites upon any conditions: which ſaid, he diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors.
But the Madianites (being inſtantly requeſted by Balac) once more ſent their Ambaſſadors F to Balaam, who deſirous to ſatisfie them in their demands, conſulted with God. But God (offended with him) commanded him to aſſent to the Ambaſſadors: and he not conceiving that God ſpake thus to him in his anger, becauſe he had not obey'd his order, departed onward with the Ambaſſadors. But as he Travelled upon the way, the Angel of God came and met him in a narrow place, between two ſtone walls; which when the She-aſs, whereon Balaam was mounted, perceived, ſhe ſtarted out of the way, and cruſhed her Maſter againſt one of the walls; and neither by the ſtrokes which he gave her (being grieved by his bruiſe) nor by any other means, could ſhe be drawn forward. Whil'ſt the Angel kept his ſtation, and the Prophet continu'd tormenting the Aſs, God caus'd the Beaſt to ſpeak to Balaam with a humane and articulate voice: blaming him, for that having G never before that time received damage by her, he had ſo cruelly tormented and beaten her; and underſtood not that God did prohibit him from the performance of that which he deſired. As he ſtood amazed at the Prodigy, an Angel appeared to him, bla- H ming him, and telling him that the Aſs was not in fault, but that himſelf deſerv'd to be puniſht for reſiſting God's will. Theſe words encreaſed Balaam's aſtoniſhment, and he prepar'd himſelf to return back again: but God commanded him to continue his intended journey, charging him to ſay nothing but that which he ſhould inſpire to him.

After God had given him this charge, he went unto Balac, who entertained him honorably, and cauſed him to be brought to a certain Mountain, from whence he might behold the Hebrews Camp. Balac alſo himſelf being Royally attended, accompanied the Prophet, conducting him unto a Mountain, which was but 60 Furlongs from their Camp.
Balaam having well conſider'd it, deſir'd the King to build ſeven Altars, on which to offer ſeven Bulls, and ſeven Rams. All which being readily executed by the King, he offer'd I a burnt Sacrifice, to the end he might preſage on which ſide the Victory would turn;

*Happy People, of whom God himſelf vouchſafeth to be the Conducter, on whom he beſtoweth ſo large bleſſings, and abundance of riches, and over whom his Providence inceſſantly watcheth!
No other Nation ſhall equal you in the love of virtue; your Succeſſors alſo ſhall ſurpaſs you, becauſe amongſt Men God only favoureth you, and taketh care that no Nation under the Sun ſhall either exceed or equal you in happineſs. You ſhall likewiſe poſſeſs that rich Land which he hath promis'd you: and your poſterity ſhall be perpetual Lords thereof; and the glory of your name ſhall fill both the whole Earth and Sea; and ſo ſhall your Nation be multiplied, that there ſhall be no place of the World where it ſhall not be diffus'd. Bleſſed are you (moſt worthy Army)* K and deſerving great admiration, being compoſed of the deſcendants of one ſingle Man. The Land of Canaan at this preſent will ſuffice you, but know that hereafter, the whole World will not be too great for your inhabitation; ſo that both in the Iſlands, and in the Continent, you ſhall live in ſo great number, that you ſhall equal the Stars of the Firmament. And though you are like to grow ſo innumerable, yet notwithſtanding God will furniſh you with all ſort of good things in abundance, in Peace, and in War, he will render you victorious. Wherefore we ought to wiſh that our Enemies may reſolve to take Arms, and to aſſault you, ſince they cannot do it without their own total deſtruction. So greatly are you favoured and loved by God, who takes pleaſure to abaſe the proud and great, and to raiſe the weak and humble. L

Ver. 11,12. Balac being diſpleaſed, reprehendeth Balaam.

Thus ſpake Balaam in his prophetical ſpirit, being inſpired by the Spirit of God. But Balac was much incenſed againſt him, exclaiming that he had not kept his promiſe; for by great Rewards he had been by his Confederates drawn thither to curſe them, and in ſtead of Execrations againſt them, he had given them the greateſt Benediction. The Prophet thus anſwer'd.

A tinguiſhed: though they may come into ſome affliction for a time, yet they will afterwards flouriſh more than they did before, being by ſuch chaſtiſement render'd more wiſe. But if you deſire to obtain ſome ſhort Victory over them, by this my counſel you ſhall bring your wiſhes to effect. Send to their Camp the faireſt of your daughters, as trimly decked and beautified as is poſſible, who by their beauty may conquer, and by their love allure their hearts; let theſe wander about, and offer themſelves to the converſation of the youngeſt and braveſt amongſt them: and as ſoon as they ſee them enamour'd, let them pretend to go away; and being deſir'd to ſtay, let them not yield, except they will be perſuaded to forſake their Countrey Laws, and the ſervice of God from whom they received them, and to adore the gods of the Madianites and Moabites. For by this means they ſhall incenſe God's wrath againſt themſelves. Having given B this advice, he departed. Now when the Madianites (according as they were counſelled) ſent out their daughters, the younger ſort of the Hebrews became intangled with their beauty: and converſing with them, deſir'd them not to deny them the pleaſure and enjoyment of their beauty. The young Women ſeeing them enamour'd, made ſemblance of a deſire to leave them, and depart. Whereupon the young Men earneſtly intreated them to tarry, and promis'd to marry them, ſwearing, that they would not only love them as their Wives, but render them abſolute Miſtreſſes of themſelves and all their Goods. Theſe promiſes they ſeal'd with Tears; and the Women anſwer'd after this manner: Valiant young Men, we want not at home either riches, or the affections of our Parents and friends; neither come we hither to you for want of theſe things, or to make ſale of C our beauties: but conſidering you as ſtrangers, for whom we have great eſteem, we have not diſdained to ſhew you this civility. Now therefore becauſe you ſay you love us, and are ſo troubled at this our departure, we have thought good not to gainſay your entreaties; if therefore you will plight your faith, and promiſe us marriage (which is the onely condition that can detain us) we will willingly live with you as your lawful Wives; but we fear leſt when your luſts are ſatisfied, you will with ſhame and contumely ſend us back again to our Parents; which ſo reaſonable apprehenſion of ours you ought to pardon. Theſe paſſionate Lovers promiſed to give their faith in what manner ſoever, and refuſed no condition (by reaſon of their extreme love.) Well then (ſaid the Virgins) ſince you are ſo pleaſed, and that you have Cuſtoms ſo different from other Nations, that you uſe onely certain meats and drinks; it is D neceſſary, if you will marry us, to adore our gods. For by no other argument can you perſuade us, that your love is unfeigned, except you honour, as we do, the ſame gods: neither ſhall you be blamed, if you honour the gods of that Countrey into which you are come, conſidering that our gods are common unto all Nations, whereas your God is adored by none but your ſelves. Chooſe therefore (ſaid they) either to conform your ſelves in opinion with other Men, or ſeek out another World wherein you may live according to your particular ways and cuſtoms.

Cap.25.1.ad 9. The daughters of the Madianites come to the Camp of the Hebrews.

Ver.1,2,3. The daughters of Madian allure the Iſraelites to Idolatry.

The Hebrews blinded with the love which they bare to the Virgins, liked well their words, and conſented to that which they ſaid, ſuffering themſelves to be ſeduc'd according as they were invited; ſo that they tranſgreſs'd the Ordinances of their Fathers in following ſtrange gods, to whom they offer'd Sacrifice, according to the manner of the E Countrey. They alſo fell to eat all thoſe meats which were prohibited them by the Law, and addicted themſelves to all kinds of pleaſure, according as the Women perſuaded them; ſo that the whole Army was infected with diſſoluteneſs and diſorder (amongſt the younger ſort) and a worſe mutiny aroſe thereby than the precedent, by reaſon whereof it was to be fear'd, the whole courſe of Law and Government would be perverted. For the youth once having had a taſte of theſe foreign and laſcivious faſhions, were unſatiably tranſported with the ſame: and if there were any more excellent than others in Nobility, they, together (with the reſt of the multitude) were wretchedly corrupted. Zambrias chief of the Tribe of Simeon, married Corby the Madianite, daughter of Zur, a Prince of the Countrey, and, to pleaſe her, ſacrificed after the manner of the F Countrey, contrary to the Law of God. During this ſtate of affairs, Moſes being afraid leſt ſome more grievous miſchief ſhould ſucceed, call'd the People together, and accuſing no man in particular (for that he was unwilling to caſt thoſe into deſperation, who, whil'ſt they thought their fault lay hidden, might be reduc'd to a better mind) he told them, That it was a thing unworthy their virtue, and that of their Anceſtors, to prefer their pleaſure before their Religion. That it behoved them whil'ſt they had time, to repent, and to ſhew themſelves to be valiant men; not by contemning all holy and divine Laws, but by repreſſing their diſordinate Paſſions. That it was a ſtrange thing, that having in the Deſart lived modeſtly, they ſhould now in a plentiful Countrey grow ſo diſſolute and diſordinate, as to loſe that merit in affluence, which they had acquir'd in neceſſity. By ſuch like ſpeeches, he endeavoured G to reclaim the youth, and to reduce them to a better mind: whereupon Zambrias riſing up, ſpake after this manner: Moſes (ſaith he) uſe thou, if thou pleaſeſt, thine own Laws, whereunto by long uſe thou haſt added authority, without which thou hadſt long ago ſuf-

fered puniſhment for them, and learnt at thine own coſt, that the Hebrews ought not to be deluded by thee: For my ſelf, thou ſhalt never tye me to thy tyrannical decrees; for hitherto haſt thou endeavored nothing elſe, but under pretext of Law and Religion, to bring us into ſervitude and ſubjection, and thy ſelf to power and ſovereignty, by forbidding us the pleaſures and liberties which all men that are born free, ought to enjoy. Was there any thing worſe in our Egyptian thraldom, than the power which thou aſſumeſt to puniſh every man by the Laws of thy own making; whereas thou thy ſelf art more worthy to be puniſhed, in that thou deſpiſeſt thoſe of all other Nations, and wilt have none but thine obſerved, and ſo preferreſt thy own particular judgment before that of all other men whatſoever? But I, as touching that which I have done, in that I ſuppoſe it to be well done, am not afraid to confeſs in this Aſſembly, that I have taken a ſtranger to wife: thou heareſt mine actions from mine own mouth, as from a free and reſolute man; neither do I deſire that they ſhould be hidden. 'Tis true alſo, that I ſacrifice to the gods to whom thou forbiddeſt to ſacrifice, becauſe I think not my ſelf bound to ſubmit to the tyranny, of learning nothing that pertains to Religion but from thee alone; and I take it as no obligation to me for any man to aſſume, as thou doeſt, more authority over me than I have my ſelf. Whil'ſt Zambrias ſpoke thus both for himſelf, and others of his Faction, the People ſilently expected the iſſue of this great quarrel, eſpecially for that they ſaw their Lawgiver would not contend any longer, leſt he ſhould make an inſolent man more outragious; and leſt others, in imitation of him, growing impudent in their ſpeeches, ſhould ſtir up Tumults amongſt the People: ſo the Aſſembly for this time was diſſolved, and perhaps the miſchief had gone further, had not Zambrias been ſuddenly cut off in the manner I am going to relate. Phinees (who as well for his own excellent qualities, as the dignity of his Father Eleazar the High Prieſt, and his great Uncle Moſes, was accounted the moſt conſiderable of thoſe of his age) was much diſcontented with Zambrias's contumacy; and leſt by his impunity the Law might grow into contempt, he reſolv'd to be reveng'd upon the Tranſgreſſors, well knowing how much the example of great men prevaileth either way. And being of no leſs courage than zeal, he repaired to Zambrias's Tent, and at one ſtroak ſlew both him and Choſbi, his wife. By this example, many of the youth being animated by this worthy act, to do juſtice on thoſe that had committed the like offence, ſlew a great number of them with the Sword, and a Peſtilence, (which was ſent by Gods judgment) deſtroy'd not only all the reſt, but alſo thoſe, who when by reaſon of Conſanguinity they ought to have reſtrained and diſſuaded their Kinſmen from Lewdneſs, yet either diſſembled or encourag'd them in their Luſt; the number of thoſe that periſh'd on this manner, was 14000 men. At the ſame time, Moſes (being incenſed againſt the Madianites) ſent out an Army to deſtroy that Nation, of which Expedition we will preſently diſcourſe, after we have annex'd that which muſt not be omitted in this Hiſtory, as tending to the praiſe of our Lawgiver. Though Balaam, ſent for by the Madianites, to curſe the Hebrews; which he could not do, being hindred by the Providence of God, had afterwards given that counſel to the Enemy, by means whereof, within a little ſpace, a great multitude of the Hebrews were corrupted in their Religion; yet Moſes hath done him the honour to inſert his Prophecy in his Writings: although it had been eaſie for him to have depriv'd him of the glory, and to have appropriated it to himſelf, by reaſon that there was not any Witneſs that might contradict him; yet he hath not neglected to give teſtimony, and to make mention of him in his Writings: yet let every one think of this, according as it ſhall ſeem good unto him. But Moſes (as I began to ſay) ſent an Army of 12000 Men againſt the Madianites, chooſing out of every Tribe a Thouſand, and appointed Phinees Captain over theſe Forces, by whoſe courage (as a little before I have declared) both the Laws were vindicated, and Zambri, that brake them, puniſhed.

BUt the Madianites (having intelligence that their Enemies drew near them, and that they were not far from their borders) gather'd their Forces together, and beſet all thoſe paſſages of their Country, by which they thought their Enemy might break in, preparing themſelves to repell them with force and valor. Yet no ſooner did Phinees with his Forces charge them, but upon the firſt encounter ſo great a multitude of the Madianites was ſlain, that the number of the Carcaſſes could hardly be reckoned. Neither were their Kings ſaved from the Sword: theſe were Och, Sur, Robeas, Ubes, and Rechem, (from whom the chiefeſt City of the Arabians deriveth its name, and at this day retaineth the ſame, and is call'd Receme, and by the Grecians Petra.) The Hebrews having thus put their Enemies to flight, ravaged the whole Region, and carried away with them great ſpoils;

A ſpoils; and killing all the Inhabitants thereof, both Men and Women, they onely ſpared the Virgins, according to the command Phinees had received from Moſes: who returning home with his Army in ſafety, brought with him a memorable and glorious prey; of Oxen, 52067; of Aſſes, 60000; of gold and ſilver Veſſels, an incredible number, which the Madianites were wont to uſe for their domeſtick occaſions, ſo great was their great Riches and Luxury. There were alſo led Captives about 30000 Virgins. But Moſes (dividing the prey) gave the fiftieth part thereof to Eleazar, and the Prieſts, and to the Levites another fiftieth; the remainder, he diſtributed amongſt the People, who after this Battel lived in great ſecurity, having gotten Riches by their Valor, and Peace alſo to enjoy the ſame. Now for that Moſes was well ſtricken in years, he appointed Joſhua to B ſucceed him in the Offices both of a Prophet, a Prince, and a Governor; for God had ſo commanded, that he ſhould make choice of him to be his Succeſſor in the principality; for he was moſt expert in all divine and humane knowledge, being therein inſtructed by his Maſter Moſes. About that time, the two Tribes of Gad and Reuben, with the half Tribe of Manaſſes (being abundantly ſtored with Cattel, and all other manner of Riches) by common conſent, requeſted Moſes to give and aſſign to them in particular the Country of the Amorites, which not long ſince they had conquered by the Sword, for that it was full of rich Paſtures. But he (ſuſpecting that through fear, they ſought to withdraw themſelves from the War with the Canaanites, under pretext of care of their Cattel) ſharply reproved them, ſaying, that they were fearful; and that their deſire was to C poſſeſs that Land which was conquered by the Valor of the whole People, to the end they might lead their lives in idleneſs and pleaſure; and not to bear Arms with the reſt of the Hoſt, to help them to poſſeſs the Land beyond Jordan, which God had promiſed them, by overcoming thoſe Nations which he commanded them to account for their Enemies. Theſe Tribes, leſt he ſhould ſeem to be deſervedly incenſed againſt them, anſwered, that neither through fear they fled danger, neither through ſloth ſhunned labour, but onely deſign'd to leave their prey in commodious places, to the end they might be more fit to follow the War: ſaying, that they were ready (if ſo be they might receive Cities for the defence and receipt of their Wives, Children, and Subſtance) to follow the reſt of the Army whitherſoever they were conducted; and to adventure their lives with them, D for the common intereſt. Moſes ſatisfi'd with their reaſon in the preſence of Eleazar the High Prieſt, and Joſhua, with the reſt of the Magiſtrates, granted them the Land of the Amorites, with this condition, that (together with the reſt of the People) they ſhould march againſt their common Enemies, till the War were accompliſhed according to their deſire: accordingly having received that which they demanded, they built them walled Cities, and left their Children, Wives and Subſtance in the ſame. Moſes alſo built ten Cities in that Region (which are to be reckoned in the number of thoſe 48 abovemention'd) in three whereof he appointed Sanctuaries, and places of refuge, which they only might take benefit of, who fled thither for Caſual Homicide; and he appointed them their term of Exile, till the time of the death of the High Prieſt, under whom the E Manſlaughter was committed, at which time they might ſafely return into their Countrey. And during the time of their Exile, it was lawful for any of the Kin to take revenge upon the Offender by killing him, only at ſuch time as he was found without the City of Refuge: which right he gave onely to thoſe that were akin, but not to others. Now the Cities of Refuge were theſe; in the Confines of Arabia, Boſora; in the Region of Galadena, Arimanum: in the Countrey of Bazan, Gaul. Moſes alſo ordained, that after the Conqueſt of Canaan, three more Cities of the Levites ſhould be appointed, to that end that they might give refuge and habitation to ſuch ſort of Offenders. At that time, when one of the Magiſtrates, called Salphates, of the Tribe of Manaſſes, was dead, and had onely left Daughters behind him, the Governors of the Tribe came unto Moſes, F and asked his counſel, Whether they ſhould inherit the Lands of their Father? Moſes anſwered them, That if they married within their Tribe, they ſhould inherit; but if they made choice to marry themſelves into another Tribe, then they ſhould loſe their Patrimony in their own: and for this cauſe made he this Ordinance, to the end, that every Tribe ſhould continually poſſeſs its proper inheritance. But whereas now there remained but 30 days only, to fulfill the number of 40 years ſince their departure out of Egypt, Moſes ſummoning an Aſſembly in that place near to Jordan, where now the City of Abila is ſcituate, environed with fields beſet with Palm-trees, as ſoon as he ſaw the People ready to hear him, ſpake unto them after this manner.

Moſes Laws, and how he was taken out of this world, from the company of Men, Deut. 4. H Moſes oration unto the people before his death. Deut. 4. 1, ad 43.

MY dear friends, and companions, in my long Travels, with whom I have run through ſo many dangers; ſince it is thought requiſite by God, and mine age (amounting to the number of one hundred and twenty years) requireth no leſs, that I muſt depart out of this life; and ſince it ſeemeth not good in Gods ſight, that either I ſhould be agent or aſſiſtant in your affairs beyond Jordan: I have reſolv'd to employ that little ſpace of life which remains to me, in order to eſtabliſh your felicity according to the Grace that is given me; and to provide that by laying open the way unto you that leadeth to the ſame, I may oblige you to retain ſome affection for my memory. I Give therefore ear unto me, that when I have firſt declared unto you, wherein both your felicity, and the happineſs of your poſterity conſiſteth, and have left this perpetual teſtimony and monument of my intire love towards you, I may willingly depart out of this life: For well I know that I deſerve to be credited by you, both for that hitherto I have inceſſantly (in ſtudying for your profits) never deceived you, and becauſe the ſentiments of our ſouls are never ſo pure as when they are ready to be ſeparated from the body. Ye ſons of Iſrael, there is but one onely way whereby men attain to felicity, to wit, the favour of God, which he onely gives to thoſe that deſerve it, and withdraws from thoſe that offend him. Towards him if you contimue dutiful (according as he requires, and in ſuch manner as I by his direction have inſtructed you) you ſhall never fail to encreaſe in virtue, and to draw all men to envy your happineſs: and which is more, K thoſe goods which you have now obtained, ſhall be perpetual; and that which you want ſhall ſhortly be plentifully beſtowed on you. Only take heed to be obedient to Gods Will, and Commandments: and never prefer any other Laws before thoſe I have given you, or through contempt innovate any thing in your Religion. Which if you ſhall perform, you ſhall excel all other Nations in war, and be invincible by your enemies: for by Gods aſſiſtance all things are poſſible. Moreover there are great rewards (in all the courſe of life) propoſed unto virtue, which is alſo to it ſelf a great reward: beſides, by it all other bleſſings are eaſily obtained; and if you practiſe it among your ſelves, you ſhall both lead a bleſſed life, and obtain immortal glory, not onely amongſt ſtrangers, but alſo to all poſterity. Theſe things are you to hope for, if neither you your ſelves violate thoſe Laws, (which by Gods command, and my L means) are preſcrib'd to you, nor ſuffer any other to violate the ſame, but in your ſelves continually meditate upon the underſtanding and uſe thereof. As for my ſelf, I depart this life in fulneſs of joy, and the comfort to leave you in great proſperity, commending you all to the Laws of piety and prudence, and the virtue of your Guides and Magiſtrates, who hereafter are to take care of your ſafety and felicity. God likewiſe, under whoſe conduct you have lived, (and to whoſe favour you owe whatſoever you have received by me) will not fail to take care of you; but as long as you ſhall honour both him and piety, ſo long ſhall you remain in ſecurity under his protection: neither ſhall you want ſuch men, who ſhall give you excellent inſtructions; whoſe counſels if you obey, you ſhall be fortunate (namely Eleazar the High Prieſt, and Joſua, with the Senate and Magiſtrates of the Tribes) towards whom M beware leſt you grow ſtiff-necked; knowing and remembring this, that he that is inſtructed to obey well, will, when he ſhall attain unto dignity, govern well. Neither imagine to your ſelves that liberty conſiſteth in diſobeying your Superiors, as hitherto you have done; from which ſin if hereafter you ſhall keep your ſelves, you ſhall ſee your eſtate become ſtill more flouriſhing and fortunate: And God forbid that you ſhould ever be ſo exaſperated againſt them, as you have been ſometimes incenſed againſt me. For you may remember, that I have been more often in hazard of my life by your means, than by the enemy: Which I ſpeak not to upbraid you, for I would not leave you afflicted with the remembrance hereof, at the hour of my death, (who even at that time entertained the injury with a quiet mind) but to the end that being by me admoniſhed, you may henceforward be wiſer in thoſe things which N hereafter ſhall concern you, and leſt you ſhould grow contumelious againſt your Governors, being made proud with affluence of your riches, which you ſhall enjoy at ſuch time as you have paſſed over Jordan, and conquered Canaan. Otherwiſe if made more inſolent by theſe bleſſings you fall into contumacy, and contempt of virtue, Gods favour will never be extended towards you; and if by your ſins you ſhall incenſe him againſt your ſelves, you ſhall both loſe the Land which you have conquered by your courage, by being ſhamefully oppreſſed by your Enemies; and being diſperſed over the face of the whole earth, both the Land and Sea ſhall be full of the marks of your ſervitude; which if it ſhould come to paſs, then were it too late to repent you, that you have not obſerved his holy Laws. Wherefore to avoid this danger, ſuffer not any one of your Enemies, after your victory is once gotten, to live; and think it O moſt conducible for your affairs, to kill all, without ſparing any; for fear leſt living with them, and being intangled in the like cuſtomes and delights, you fall into Idolatry, and

The Iſraelites are commanded to kill their enemies, and deſtroy their idols.

A abandon your Countrey, Laws and Inſtitutions. Moreover, I command you to deſtroy their gods, their Altars and Temples, as many as you ſhall meet with, and ſo to ruine all the woods conſecrated to their falſe gods both with Fire and Sword, that there may not remain any token or memory of them any more: For ſo ſhall you more ſafely maintain the poſſeſſion of the goods which you enjoy. But leſt through ignorance of better things you become depraved, by Gods commandment I have written you Laws, and a form of adminiſtration, both of the Commonwealth, and your private eſtates; from which if you ſhall no ways divert, or wander, you ſhall prove the moſt fortunate People of the earth.

Moſes delivereth the Iſraelites a book, wherein their Laws and manner of life was written.

When he had ſpoken theſe things, he delivered them a Book, containing in Writing their Laws, and cuſtoms of good life: which when they had received, they melted B into tears, and now lamented both for the loſs of their Captain, and for that they remembered how many perils he had ſuffered for their ſakes, and how diligently he had procured their ſafety and ſecurity; and their ſorrow increas'd, by their belief that they were not like to have ever again ſo good a Prince: and they feared likewiſe that God would not hereafter be ſo favorable unto them, in that they had not a Moſes to pray for them. Theſe thoughts produc'd in them a repentance of thoſe things which (through fury) they had committed againſt him in the Deſart, ſo that all the People (breaking out into tears) would admit no conſolation. But Moſes comforted them, and deſiring them to give over weeping, encouraged them to obſerve faithfully the Laws of God: and ſo for this time the aſſembly diſſolved. But before I proceed, I C have thought fit to declare in this place what theſe Laws were; to the end the Reader may know how worthy they are of the virtue of ſo great a Lawgiver as Moſes, and ſee what our cuſtoms have been, even from the firſt inſtitution of our Commonwealth.
For all thoſe things are extant which this Man wrote, ſo that we need not faign or affix any thing by way of ornament: we have onely changed the order, and thoſe Laws which he ſcatteringly ſet down according as he received them from God, we have generally digeſted into their places: whereof I thought good to admoniſh the Reader; for fear leſt hereafter any of our Tribes coming to the view hereof, ſhould raſhly accuſe me, of not having faithfully delivered the Writings and Inſtitutions of Moſes. Firſt will I reckon up thoſe Laws particularly which appertain to the publick inſtitution D and policy of our Nation; but thoſe that concern private cuſtoms and contracts, either betwixt our ſelves or foregin Nations, I have deferred to be diſcourſed of in that commentary, wherein (by Gods aſſiſtance) I intend to ſpeak of our manners, and of the reaſons of thoſe Laws.

Laws made by Moſes.
Ruffin. chap. 7.
The excuſe of the writer of the Hiſtory, why he innovated the order of the Laws.

After you have conquered the Land of Canaan, and built your Cities, you ſhall in ſecurity reap the fruit of the Victory, if by obſervation of theſe following Commandments, you ſhall render your ſelves wellpleaſing to God. Let there be one ſacred City in the region of Canaan, ſituate in a commodious and fertile place, which God ſhall make choice of: in the ſame let there be one only Temple built, and one Altar erected of rough and unpoliſhed ſtones, but choſen with ſuch care, that when they ſhall E be joyn'd together, they ſhall appear decent and agreable to the ſight: let not the Aſcent of the ſame be made by ſteps, but let the earth be eaſily and fitly raiſed. But in any other City let there be neither Altar nor Temple; For God is one, and the Hebrew Nation is one. Whoſoever ſhall blaſpheme God, let him be ſtoned to death, hanged on a Gibbet for a day, and afterwards ignominiouſly and obſcurely buried.

Item, the Iſraelites ſhall live in the Land of Canaan.
A ſacred City and Temple in Canaan.

Blaſphemy againſt God.
Deut. 4.
Levit. 16, 1, 10, 13.
Thrice in the year the Hebrewes ought to meet.

Let all the Hebrews, from their ſeveral Provinces, aſſemble themſelves thrice in the year in the ſacred City and Temple, that they may give thanks to God for the benefits they have received, and by their prayers implore his future aſſiſtance; and that by their converſation and mutual entertainments, they may increaſe their benevolence and F love one towards another. For it is reaſonable that they ſhould know one another, who are of the ſame ſtock, and are govern'd by the ſame Laws. For which purpoſe nothing is ſo fit as their meetings after this kind of manner, which both by the ſight and converſation cauſe deeper impreſſion in the memory; as contrariwiſe, they that never ſee one another paſs for ſtrangers one to the other.

Beſides, let the tenth part of the fruits (beſides them that are due to the Prieſts and Levites) which you are accuſtomed to ſell in your Markets (being reduced into ready money) be ſpent on Sacrifices and Banquets in the ſacred City. For it is juſt to celebrate feaſts to Gods honour, of the fruits of the earth, which we have received from his hands.

The hire of a Harlot.
Deut. 23. 18.
Micha. 1. 7.

G Let no Sacrifice be made of the Hire of an Harlot: for neither doth any thing delight God which is gotten by ill wayes: or is there greater uncleanneſs, than the ſhameful and unlawful mixture of our bodies.

The year of the World, 2493. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1471.

Other gods. Deut. 1. Linnen and Woollen.

Likewiſe if any man take reward for covering a bitch (whether ſhe be for the chaſe, or for the flock) it is not lawful to make ſacrifice unto God thereof. Let no man ſpeak ill of thoſe gods which other Countries reverence. Let no Man ſpoil any ſtrange Temple, nor take that which is dedicated to any god. Let no man wear a Garment woven of Linnen and Woollen, for it belongeth onely to the Prieſts.

Deut. 22. 11. Deut. 11. The book of the Law is to be read on the feaſt of the Tabernacles.

Deut. 11. 19. Children ſhall learn the Law. Deut. 6. 6, 7.

Every ſeventh year, when the People ſhall be aſſembled together in the ſacred City to ſacrifice at the feaſt of Tabernacles, the High Prieſt from a high Pulpit (from whence he may be heard by the whole multitude) ſhall read the whole Law publickly: ſo that neither Women nor Children ſhall be kept from hearing the ſame, nor yet ſlaves and bondmen. For it is good that they retain the perpetual memory thereof, alwayes imprinted in their minds: for ſo ſhall they ſin the leſs, in that they underſtand what is decreed in the Law. And the Laws likewiſe will be of more force in the conſcience when they themſelves ſhall hear the puniſhments which they threaten, and with which thoſe that dare to violate them ſhall be chaſtis'd: ſo that the will to perform the Law ſhall never be inwardly extinguiſhed; and beſides, the remembrance will live in them, how many plagues they incur by contempt thereof. Let children eſpecialy learn theſe Laws, than which diſcipline there is not any more profitable for them, nor more conducible to their felicity. For which reaſon, twice a day, in the morning and in the evening, they ſhall be minded for what benefits they are bound to God, and how he deliver'd us out of the bondage of Egypt. For it is a thing in nature reaſonable, to give thanks to God, as well in acknowledgement of the Goods which we have before time received, as in expectation of his future mercies. The chief of theſe things alſo are to be written over our doors, and worn on our arms; and thoſe things which declare his power and benificence, are to be born about, written on the head and arms, that the remembrance of Gods goodneſs towards his People may continually be renew'd. In every City let there be choſen ſeven Governours, ſuch as are approved in Virtue, and able for Juſtice. Let each one of theſe Magiſtrates have two Miniſters of the Tribe of Levi. Let thoſe that are appointed Judges in the Cities, be held in high reputation; ſo that in their preſence no man preſume either to utter contumelies, or injurious ſpeeches; for ſo ſhall it come to paſs, that men accuſtomed to reverence good men, ſhall alſo exerciſe themſelves in piety and reverence towards God. Whatſoever ſeemeth good to the Judges to decree, let that be held inviolable; except it be apparent that they are corrupted with money, or that they be manifeſtly convicted of wrong judgement. They ought likewiſe to judge without reſpect of intereſt or dignity, and prefer juſtice before all other things; for it is contumelious to God, to ſuppoſe, that he is weaker than they, for whoſe ſake they wreſt the Law, contrary to juſtice, which is the power of God. He therefore that giveth judgement in favour and partiality to great men, maketh them greater than God himſelf. And if the Judges cannot determine of the matter in queſtion (as it oftentimes falls out) let them refer the cauſe to the Holy City, and there ſhall the High Prieſt and the Prophet, with the aſſiſtance of the Senate, determine that which ſhall be convenient.

Deut. 19. 16, 17, 18.

The puniſhment of a falſe Witneſs.

Of Homicide committed.

The teſtimony of one witneſs ſhall not be received, but of three, or at leaſt of two; whoſe teſtimony ſhall be made good by the examination of their behaviour and life. As for women, it is not lawful for them to bear any witneſs, by reaſon of the levity and temerity of that ſex. Neither is it lawful for a bond-man to bring in teſtimony, by reaſon of his degenerate and ignoble mind; for it is to be ſuſpected, that either for lucre ſake, or for fear, he will depoſe an untrue teſtimony. And if any falſe witneſs ſhall be convicted of perjury, let him be ſubject to that penalty which he ſhould have endured that ſhould have been caſt by his falſe accuſation. If man-ſlaughter be committed in any place, and the Offender cannot be found out, and it appear not likely, that the man was ſlain out of malice, let there be a diligent and careful inquiſition made (with rewards propos'd to the diſcoverer;) but if no probabilities or conjectures can be gathered, then let the Magiſtrates of the Cities adjoining to the place where the ſlaughter is committed, and the Elders of the ſame, aſſemble together, and meaſure from the place where the dead body lieth: and let the townſhip that is found to be neareſt, and the inhabitants thereof buy a Heifer; which they ſhall bring into a place unlaboured and unplanted, where the Prieſts, and the Levites, having cut the nerves of the Neck, ſhall waſh their hands, and lay them upon the head of the ſaid Heifer, and proteſt with a loud voyce, that they, and the Magiſtrates with them, are not defiled with that homicide; that they did it not, nor were they preſent when it was perpetrated; and they ſhall call and pray to God to avert his anger, and not to permit that any ſuch misfortune ever fall out in that Countrey.

Ariſtocracy

The year of the World, 2493. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1471.

Ariſtocracy the beſt kind of Government. Deut. 17, 15.

A Ariſtocracy is without doubt a very good kind of Government becauſe it puts the authority into the hands of more honeſt and good men; take therefore heed that you deſire no other form of policy, but retain and continue the ſame, having no other ſuperiours but the Laws which God gives you; For it ſufficeth you that God is pleas'd to be your Governour.

Of the election of a King.

Yet notwithſtanding, if you ſhall chance to deſire to have a King, ſee that ye elect one of your own Nation, who in all things may be ſtudious to procure juſtice, and all other virtues, attributing more to God and the Laws than to his own wiſdom and conduct. Let him not undertake any thing without the advice of the High Prieſt, and the Elders. Let him not have divers Wives, neither let him delight to get great B Treaſures, or multitude of Horſes: leſt thereby, he become ſo inſolent, as to raiſe his power and will above the Laws: and if you ſee him affected to theſe things, beware leſt he grow more puiſſant than is expedient for you.

Deut. 19. 14. The bounds of Lands are not to be removed.

It is not lawful for any man to remove the Land-marks either of his own Land, or any other mans whatſoever; for by them is peace preſerved: But they ought to remain for ever firm and immovable, as if God himſelf had placed them: ſince ſuch an alteration may give occaſion to great conteſts, and thoſe whoſe avarice cannot ſuffer that bounds be ſet to their greedineſs, are eaſily led to contemn and violate the Laws.

Levit. 25. 3. The plants that are not of four years growth are prohibited.

If a man plant a piece of Ground, and the Trees fructifie before the fourth year, C the firſt fruits thereof ſhall not be offered to God, neither ſhall any man eat thereof by reaſon that they are abortive fruits: and that which is contrary to nature is neither fit to be offer'd to God, nor convenient for the uſe of man. But all that fruit that ſhall grow in the fourth year (for then is the time that the Trees ſhould bear) ſhall be gathered and brought into the holy City (together with the tenth of all other fruits) and they ſhall be eaten during the Feaſt which the owner thereof maketh to his Friends, and with Orphans and Widows; but in the fifth year it ſhall be lawful for him to gather the fruit for himſelf.

Vines to be planted. The Law of the Plough. Deut. 22. 10.

Sow not a Field that is planted with Vines, for it ſufficeth that it nouriſheth one ſort of plants: ſo that it needeth not to be laboured and manured with the Plough. D The Land is to be Ploughed with Oxen, and no other ſort of Beaſts yoked with them; but the tillage muſt always be performed by Beaſts of the ſame kind.

The ſeeds alſo ought to be clean and without any mixture; ſo that two or three ſorts ought not to be ſowed together; for nature alloweth not a commixion of things that are different,

It is not lawful alſo to cover the female with the male of another kind, leſt this example ſhould draw men to abominable mixtures, and to a contempt of that ſex which is appropriate to them; for it often falls out, that from ſmall beginnings, effects proceed of great and dangerous conſequence. For which reaſon nothing ought to be admitted, by the imitation whereof, there may chance to grow a corrupting of good E manners; whence it is that the Laws regulate even the lighteſt things, to the end to retain every one within his duty.

Levit. 19. 10. Deut. 24. 21, 22.

They that Mow and Reap Corn, ought not to gather up all the ears too exactly, but leave ſome for thoſe that are in neceſſity, to the end to ſuccor them. They likewiſe that plant Vines, ought to leave ſome cluſters for the poor, and ſome fruit on the Olive-Trees, to the intent that they that have none of theſe, may gather ſomething for their relief: for the owners of the Field ſhall be ſo far from ſuffering damage by the negligent gathering of their Corn, that on the contrary they ſhall draw profit form their charity: for God will bring to paſs that their Land (who regard not their particular profit, but have care of the nouriſhment of thoſe that are in neceſſity) ſhall be far F more fat and fertile to bring forth its fruit.

Deut. 25. 4. Oxen treading or grinding

Neither is the mouth of the Ox to be muzled, at ſuch time as he treadeth the Corn in the Mow: For it ſtandeth not with reaſon, that they who have been partakers of the labour, and have travelled for the encreaſe of the fruits, ſhould be reſtrained from all uſe and benefit thereof.

Deut. 23, 24. Travellers are not to be driven away from ripe fruits.

Neither ought the Traveller in his journey be denied to gather and taſte the fruits of Autumn, but he is to be permitted to take the ſame freely, whether he be of the Countrey, or a ſtranger; who ſhall depart joyfully, in that they have been made partakers of ſuch Fruit: but it is not lawful for them to carry any away with them.

They likewiſe that gather Grapes, ought not to forbid any man to taſte of them, G as they bear them to the Preſs; for it is an unjuſt thing, that the goods which are given by the will of God for the ſuſtenance of man, ſhould be denied them, that deſire to taſte the fruit which God gives us in a ſeaſon, which ſuddenly paſſes away.

Yea, they are to be invited, that through modeſty make nice to touch the ſame (if H they be Iſraelites) for ſuch are to be eſteem'd Friends and Maſters of what we have, in that they are of the ſame race: and if Strangers, we ought to exerciſe hoſpitality, towards them without thinking that we loſe any thing by the ſmall preſent we make them of the fruits which we have by God's bounty. Nor is it to be ſuppoſed, ill imployed, which in way of courteſie a man permitteth another to take, ſince it is God that furniſheth and giveth the abundance of all things; not to the end to enjoy the ſame in private, but alſo to beſtow them liberally. And he it is, that by this means, would declare unto other people the good will he beareth to the people of Iſrael, and the felicity whereof he maketh them partakers; by reaſon, that in that abundance which they have, his will is, that other men ſhould have part thereof. But I whoſoever ſhall do the contrary, let him be chaſtiſed for his ſordidneſs, and in publick receive thirty nine ſtripes, becauſe of a free man he maketh himſelf a ſlave to his gain, and ſo diſhonours himſelf.

Thirty nine ſtripes. Deut. 25. 3. The Law laid on 40. but the Jews of ſuperſtition uſe but 39. as you may ſee. 2. Cor. 11. 24

It ſhall very well become you (ſaid Moſes) ſince you have taſted miſeries both in Egypt and the Deſart, that you have compaſſion of thoſe who are in like eſtate; and for that you are made rich by Gods mercy and providence, it behoveth and becometh you to impart ſomewhat to the indigent, who at the preſent are in that condition, in which you were.

The Tenth for the poor

Beſides the two Tenths which I commanded you yearly to pay, (the one to the Levites, and the other for your Feſtivals) you ſhall for every year pay a third, to be K diſtributed among the poor, Widows, and Orphans.

The firſt-fruits. Deut. 26, 2, 3. &c.

When a man hath gathered his Firſt-fruits, he ſhall bring them to the Temple, and after he hath given thanks unto God (that the Land which he hath given him in poſſeſſion, hath brought forth fruit) and accompliſhed that Sacrifice, which the Law commandeth him to make, he ſhall give the firſt-fruits to the Prieſts. And after he hath done all that which concerneth him to do, (as well concerning the Tenths of the Levites, as thoſe ordained for the Feaſts,) being ready to return home, let him preſent himſelf at the door of the Temple, and give thanks to God, That having delivered them from the grievous ſervitude of Egypt, he hath given them a plentiful and ample Land to enjoy: and making proteſtation, that he hath paid the Tenths according to L Moſes Law, let him beſeech God, that he will be favourable both to himſelf in private, and the Hebrews in publick; and that he will continue thoſe goods unto him which hitherto he hath beſtowed upon him, and of his great goodneſs and mercy vouchſafe to encreaſe them.

Of Marriage Lev. 21, 13, 14.

Free-men ought not to marry Servants

The marriage of an Harlot.

The penalty of a woman married for a Virgin, and not found ſo, Deut. 24.

Let thoſe that are of full years to be married, match themſelves with virtuous Virgins, and ſuch as are born of honeſt Parents. And he that will not take a Virgin to Wife, let him not meddle with one that is married to another man, leſt he breed diſcontent and ſorrow to her firſt husband. Let not free-men match themſelves with ſuch as are ſlaves, or bondwomen, although they be thereunto moved by love; for it is a thing praiſe worthy, and honorable, to ſurmount a mans affections. Let no man marry with an harlot, M whoſe ſacrifice God refuſeth, by reaſon ſhe hath diſhonor'd her body: beſides that the children the more laudably and virtuouſly inclin'd, who are of virtuous parents, than thoſe who iſſue from a ſhameful alliance contracted by unchaſte affection. If any one that is married for a virgin, be afterwards found to the contrary, let her be brought before the Judge, and let her Husband produce all the ſigns he can of his ſuſpition, and let the new-married Wife's cauſe be defended by her Father or Brother, or by them that are next in blood; and if the Wife be found innocent, let her return and dwell with him that hath accuſed her, who may not any more refuſe her, except ſhe give him great occaſions, whereunto ſhe cannot contradict. But he that without cauſe, and raſhly ſhall accuſe and ſlander his Wife, ſhall be puniſhed with thirty nine ſtripes; and in way of amends, N ſhall pay fifty Sicles to her Father. But if it be proved that ſhe hath been deflowred, and hath been common, then ſhall ſhe be ſtoned to death, for that ſhe hath not chaſtly conſerved her Virginity, till the time of her lawful marriage; and if ſhe be of the Race of the Prieſts, ſhe ſhall be burnt alive.

Deut. 21. 15, 16, 17. The firſt begotten ſhould hold his right.

If any man have two Wives, the one of which he holdeth in greater honour and amity, either for Love, or by reaſon of her Beauty, than the other; if the Son of her that is more loved, demand to have the prerogative of the elder, which is a double portion of his Fathers patrimony, (for ſo much import our Ordinances) and challenge the ſame, by reaſon that his Father more dearly loveth his Mother than the other, let it not be granted him; For it is againſt juſtice, that the eldeſt ſhould be deprived O of that which appertaineth unto him by birthright, becauſe his Mothers condition is inferior to that of the other, on account of his Fathers affection.

A If a man ſhall have corrupted a Maiden betrothed to another man, and ſhe hath conſented, they ſhall both be puniſht with death, for they are both equally guilty of ſin: the man, becauſe he hath perſuaded the Maiden to prefer her luſt before an honeſt marriage; and the maid, for ſuffering herſelf to be overcome, and abandoning her body to leudneſs, either for luſt or lucre ſake. But if meeting her he alone, enforce her, and ſhe have none near to ſuccour her, let him die alone.

The year of the World, 2493. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1471.

The puniſhment of adultery, or rather raviſhing. Deut. 22. 23. 24.

He that ſhall deflowre the Virgin that is unmarried, ſhall take her to Wife: but if he condeſcend not to the Father to take her in wedlock, he ſhall pay fifty Sicles, for amends of the injury.

v. 25. The deflowring of a virgin.

If any man pretend to ſeparate himſelf from his Wife for certain cauſes, ſuch as ordinarily B happen amongſt married couples, let him confirm it in writing, That he will never more entertain her again; and then ſhe may marry again unto another, and refuſe the former Husband: and if it happen that ſhe be ill us'd by the ſecond, or that, he being dead, the firſt would take her again in marriage, it is not lawful for the Wife to return to him.

Let the Brother of him that is deceaſed without iſſue, take to Wife her whom his deceaſed Brother had married, and let the Son born by this ſecond wedlock bear his name, and be brought up as the ſucceſſor of his inheritance. For it is advantageous to the commonwealth, that Families ſhould not come to ruine, and that the goods remain to thoſe of the ſame kindred. And it will be a comfort to the Widow to be joyned C in marriage with one ſo near akin to her firſt Husband. But if the Brother will not take her to Wife, ſhe ſhall repair to the Senate, and make this proteſtation, that the Brother of her deceaſed Husband will not marry her, (although ſhe had deſired to remain in that line, and bring forth children to it) and that by him only the memory of her deceaſed husband is diſhonoured. And when the Senate ſhall have examined the cauſe, why he declineth this marriage, his excuſe ſhall be allowed of, how great or ſlight ſoever it be; and then ſhall the Widow unlooſe his ſhooe, and ſpit in his face, and tell him, that he hath deſervedly ſuffered theſe things, in that he hath injured the memory of his dead Brother. And thus ſhall he depart out of the Court, being defamed for his whole life-time, and the Woman may marry whomſoever ſhe D pleaſe.

Deut. 25. 5. ad. 9. The Wife of the dead Brother married.

If any man take a Virgin priſoner, or ſuch an one as hath been already married, and be deſirous to take her to his Wife, it is not lawful for him to touch or approach her till ſhe is ſhaven, and (having put on her mourning apparel) hath bewailed her Parents, or Friends ſlain in Battel: but after ſhe hath in this ſort aſſwaged her ſorrow, ſhe may afterwards addict herſelf to mirth and marriage. For it is a matter both honeſt and juſt, that he that entertaineth her, to have iſſue by her, ſhould condeſcend unto her will, in all wherein he may gratifie her; and that he ſhould not only addict himſelf to the purſuit of his pleaſure; but when the thirty dayes of mourning ſhall be expired, (for that time is ſufficient for the Wife to bewail her Friends) then E may ſhe hearken after marriage. And if after he hath had his pleaſure with her, it happen that he miſlike her, and will not accept her for his Wife, he can no more make her his ſlave, but ſhe may go whitherſoever ſhe pleaſeth, for that ſhe beareth with her, her liberty.

Marriage with a Bond-woman. Deut. 21. 11, 12, 13.

The lamentation and mourning of thirty dayes.

All thoſe Children that ſhall make no reckoning of their Fathers and Mothers, nor ſhew them that honour which belongeth to them, but contemn them, and behave themſelves inſolently towards them, the Parents, whom Nature hath made their judges, ſhall begin by remonſtrating to them, that they were matched together in Matrimony, not for their pleaſures ſake, or that by uniting their poſſeſſions, they might become the richer, but to the end they might beget Children, who might nouriſh them in their F age, and miniſter unto them in their neceſſities; that they had received them at God's hands with great thankſgiving and infinite joy, and brought them up with care and diligence, ſparing nothing that conduc'd to their ſuſtenance or inſtruction. But ſince ſome pardon is to be allow'd to the follies of youth, let it ſuffice, my Son, that hitherto you have forgotten your duty, recollect your ſelf and grow wiſe; remembring that God is grievouſly offended againſt thoſe who diſobey or diſdain their Parents, becauſe he is the Father of all mankind; and takes himſelf to be concern'd in that diſhonour which is done unto thoſe that bear that name, when they receive not ſuch duty from their Childrens hands as he commandeth; and that the Law likewiſe inflicteth an inevitable puniſhment againſt ſuch, which I ſhould be very ſorry if thou G ſhouldeſt be ſo unhappy as to incur. If by theſe remonſtrances the child amend, it is fit to pardon him the faults committed by him, rather out of ignorance than malice; for in ſo doing, the Lawgiver ſhall be accounted wiſe, and the Parents ſhall

It is not lawful for any Hebrew to lend upon Uſury; neither money, nor meat, or I drink; for it is an unjuſt thing to make profit of the miſery of thoſe of our Nation: but it is better to ſuccour their neceſſities, and expect Gods retribution, as a gain to them, who practice ſuch kind of benefits. But they that have borrowed either money, or any fruit, dry or moiſt; when by the favour and aſſiſtance of God, they ſhall reap their own harveſt, and gather their fruit, let them make a willing reſtitution to thoſe that have lent them, as if they had laid them up for themſelves, to poſſeſs at ſuch time as they had need of them. But if there be any ſo ſhameleſs as they will not make ſatisfaction, yet let not the Creditor enter into their houſe to take a Pawn, before the Judges have given order, that the pledge be demanded at their door; and then the debtor without contradiction ſhall bring it to him, becauſe it is not lawful K for him to oppoſe him that comes arm'd with the Law. If he, of whom the Pledge is taken, have ſufficient ability, the Creditor may retain the Gage, till ſuch time as he be paid: but if he be poor he ſhall reſtore him his Pawn before the Sun-ſet, and eſpecially if it be Garments with which he may cover himſelf in the night; for God hath compaſſion on thoſe that are Poor. It is not lawful to receive in way of Gage either a Mill, or ought elſe that belongeth thereunto, leſt any Debtor ſhould be deprived of the neceſſary Inſtruments to provide his Victuals with, and endure any miſery through want of the means to get his living. Let him that retaineth a Free-man in Bondage be puniſhed with death; but he that hath ſtoln either Gold or Silver, let him reſtore it two-fold. If any man kill ſuch as break into houſes to rob, L or that break their walls; let not ſuch an one be puniſhed. Whoſo ſhall ſteal a Beaſt, ſhall reſtore four times the value for it; except it be an Ox, for which he ſhall ſatisfie five-fold: and if the Thief want means to pay this penalty, let him be their ſlave againſt whom he hath treſpaſſed, and at whoſe ſute he is condemned. If any one be ſold unto one of his own Tribe, let him ſerve him ſix years; and in the ſeventh year, he ſhall depart with liberty. But if during the time that he remaineth with the buyer, he beget any Child upon a female fellow ſlave, and that he be willing to ſerve, by reaſon of the good affection that he bareth unto the houſe; in the year of Jubile (which hapneth every fiftieth year) let him be ſet at liberty, leading away with him his Children, and Wife, with freedom. If any man find Money or Gold by the M way, let him ſeek out him that hath loſt it, and make known the place where he found it, to the intent he may reſtore it; knowing that the profit is not good which cometh by another man's injury. The like is to be done with Beaſts: for if any man find them ſtrayed in the Deſart, and find not out the owner, let him preſently keep them by him, taking God to witneſs, that he has no deſign to detain with him another man's goods. If any man find another mans Beaſts myred or bog'd, let him not paſs further, but ſuccor them, and help to ſave them, as if they were his own.

Deut. 22. The Law of violence.

Let each man direct the ignorant Traveller in his way, and ſet him in the right path, if he wander, without deluding him, or hindring him in his neceſſity, or miſ-leading him in his journey. Let no man ſpeak ill of him that is either abſent, or deaf. If N any man be ſtrucken in a quarrel, and it be not with a weapon, let him that ſtruck him be preſently puniſhed, by receiving the like number of blows as he hath given. But if he be carried into his houſe, and lye ſick upon it divers dayes, and in the end dye thereof, he that ſtruck him ſhall not be puniſht as a Murderer. And if he eſcape, and during the time of his ſickneſs, hath been greatly hindered, and charged; then let him that ſtruck him, pay all the charges he hath been at, during the time he kept his Bed, and ſatisfie the Phyſitians. He that with his foot ſhall ſtrike a woman with Child, if the woman miſcarry, he ſhall be, by the Judges, amerced in a ſumme of money, for that he hath leſſened the number of the people, by the loſs of him that is dead in his Mothers Womb. Let him likewiſe be condemned to pay a ſumme of money unto 9 the Husband: but if the woman dye of the ſtroke, he that offered the violence, ſhall be puniſht with death; becauſe the Law juſtly requireth, that Life be ſatisfied with Life.

Let

A Let not any one among the Iſraelites uſe any mortal Poyſon, or Drug, that may do hurt to any man: and if any be found with ſuch things about him, let him dye, becauſe it is juſt that he ſuffer the evil which he had prepared for another. Whoſo hath maimed any man, or pull'd out his eye, let him in like manner be maimed and blinded, being deprived of the ſame member of his body whereof he hath deprived another man; except he that is maimed, had rather have a pecuniary amends: for the Law remitteth it to the election of the offended, to eſtimate his injury; and if he will be more ſevere, he may. If any one have an Ox that ſtriketh with his horn, let him kill him: and if the ſame Ox ſtriketh and killeth any man in the Field or Mow, let him be ſtoned to death, and let no man eat the fleſh thereof. And if it be proved, B that the Maſter hath heretofore known the quality of the Beaſt, and hath not taken order he ſhould do no harm, let him alſo be put to death, as being the author of the murther committed by the Ox. But if the ſaid Ox kill a ſlave, either Male or Female, he ſhall be ſtoned; and the owner thereof ſhall pay thirty Sicles to the Maſter of the ſlave that is ſlain. If one Ox be ſtrucken by another, ſo as he dye thereof, let both of them (both that which was dead, and that which ſtruck the other to death) be ſold, and the price thereof parted equally betwixt both the owners. They that dig a Pit or Ciſtern, muſt be careful that they incloſe and fence it with Planks or Bars, not to hinder any man from drawing water, but leſt any man by misfortune fall into the ſame. And if any man's Beaſt fall into the ſame unfenced Pit, the owner C of the Pit ſhall pay to the owner of the Beaſt the price thereof: Alſo a Wall ſhall be made round the roofs of houſes, to the end no body may fall from thence. Let him that receiveth any thing in truſt, keep it carefully, as a thing ſacred; and let neither man nor woman attempt to alien that which is committed to his cuſtody, although thereby he might gain much Gold, and although there were no man that could convince him thereof. For ſince the conſcience knoweth the ſame, every one ought to endeavor to deal uprightly; and ſuppoſing himſelf a ſufficient witneſs againſt himſelf, let him do thoſe things which are laudable in the ſight of men, but eſpecially that which is pleaſing to God, from whoſe ſight no wrongful dealing is concealed. If notwithſtanding he to whom this truſt is committed, ſhall chance (without any fraud D on his part) to loſe the thing that is ſo left in truſt, let him preſent himſelf before ſeven Judges, and there take an oath, that nothing is loſt by his will, or conſent, and that he hath not converted any part thereof to his own uſe; whereupon let him be diſmiſſed, without any further inquiry. But if he have made uſe of the leaſt part of that which hath been committed to his charge and truſt, and that he happen to loſe it, he ſhall be condemned to reſtore all that was committed to his keeping. As it hath been ordained in matters of truſt, the like is decreed touching Hire due unto the Labourer: let each man take heed leſt he defraud a Poor Man of his Hire; knowing that God gave him his Hands inſtead of Lands and other poſſeſſions. For which cauſe, the payment of Hire ought not to be deferred, but ſatisfied the ſame day; by E reaſon, that God permitteth not, that the Labourer ſhould loſe the fruit of his travel.
The Children ſhall not be puniſhed for the miſdeeds of their Parents; for if they be virtuous, and are begotten by lewd Fathers, they rather deſerve that men ſhould have compaſſion of them, than hate them: neither are the offences of the Children to be imputed to the Parents, by reaſon that youth oftentimes engageth it ſelf in thoſe follies, which it never learned by examples, and for which it endureth not to be reproved.
Voluntary Eunuchs are to be deteſted, and their company to be fled, becauſe they have deprived themſelves of the means which God hath given to men, for the encreaſe of mankind. Such people therefore are to be driven far from us, and eſteemed wholly inexcuſable, as having kill'd their children before they be born.
F For it is a matter very manifeſt, that their ſpirits being effeminate, their bodies alſo are degenerate. Each thing alſo that is monſtrous to behold, is to be driven away: neither is it lawful to Geld either Men or Beaſts. Let this be the diſpoſition of thoſe Laws, wherewith you ſhall be Policied and Governed in time of Peace; to the end God may be favourable unto you, and I beſeech him to give you grace to uſe them in good order, and without alteration. And ſince it cannot otherwiſe be, but that humane affairs muſt ſometimes fall into troubles and dangers, ſometimes beyond deſire and expectation, and ſometimes of ſet purpoſe; I will briefly give you ſome advice touching that point; to the intent, that being fore-inſtructed of that which you ought to do, you may prevent, and not fall into any danger and calamity.

The Laws of War.

Deut. 20. 10. Heralds to be ſent.

raiſed amongſt you, which may cauſe what hath been well order'd and decreed H by your Anceſtors, to come to nought, when you ſhall abandon the Laws which God hath given you. Live therefore, and perſiſt to conform your ſelves to thoſe Laws, which both God hath approved for good, and hath alſo given you. But if perhaps you or your ſucceſſors hereafter, ſhall be oblig'd to undertake a War, I wiſh it may happen without the Confines of your Countrey: but if the matter muſt needs be tried by the Sword, you ſhall ſend certain Heralds to your declared Enemies. For before you enter battel, it ſhall be requiſite firſt of all to parley with them, and to declare unto them, that you have a great Army, and Horſes, and Weapons, and (beſides all theſe) that you have Gods favour and aſſiſtance; and you ſhall deſire them, that you may not be enforced to War againſt them, nor to make booty of their Goods, and to carry them I away captive. If they condeſcend to any reaſonable conditions, then entertain Peace; but if they contemn this propoſal, you ſhall lead forth your Army againſt them, having God for your General, and Soveraign Conductor; and for his Lieutenant, him whom you your ſelves ſhall chuſe, ſurpaſſing all the reſt in Valor. For when there are divers Commanders, it falleth out, that that which ought readily to be executed, is hindered, and commonly the iſſue is unfortunate. Let your Army generally conſiſt of men that are ſtrong in body, and hardy in courage; and remove from your Army him that is fearful, leſt ſuch men hapning to fly when they ought to fight, give your Enemies the advantage. Let them alſo be free from War, who having built a new houſe, have not enjoyed the ſame for a years ſpace; as alſo he that hath planted a Vineyard, and K hath not gathered the fruit thereof; and beſides theſe, he that hath wedded a Wife, and hath not as yet brought her home to his houſe: leſt through the deſire of theſe things, and of reſerving themſelves to their dear forſaken pleaſures, they fight but faintly and coldly.

Deut 20. 20. Fruitful trees are not to be cut down.

But when you have brought your Army into the field, take heed you commit no outrage: and when you ſhall aſſault any Cities, if you fortune to need Wood to make Engines of, ſee you cut not down Fruit Trees, but ſpare them; remembring, that they are planted for the good of men; and that if they could ſpeak, they would accuſe you; that without cauſe they are ill treated, againſt all right; and that if they had the power to depart from thence, they would tranſplant themſelves into L another Countrey.

Deut. 20. 15, 16, 17. The Canaanites are wholly to be extinguiſhed. Deut. 30. 31, 32, 33, 34.

But when the Battel is ended, and the day is yours, kill all thoſe Enemies that reſiſted you in the Fight; the reſt reſerve as your tributaries (except the people of the Land of Canaan, for they, with all their Families, are to be exterminated.) Beware alſo (but eſpecially in War) that neither a Woman uſe a Mans apparel, nor a Man that of a Womans.

Theſe are the Laws which Moſes left. He gave them likewiſe certain Inſtitutions, (which he had written forty years before,) whereof we will ſpeak in another Treatiſe. Some few dayes after (for he aſſembled the people ſix days together) he gave them his bleſſing, and pronounced his maledictions againſt thoſe which ſhould not live M according to his Laws, but ſhould tranſgreſs the determinations thereof: He read alſo unto them a Canticle of ſix meaſures (which he had regiſtred in the holy book) containing a prediction of things to come, according to which, all things have and do fall out, without varying any ways from the truth. Theſe Volumes and the Ark he gave to the Prieſts; in which he alſo placed the ten Commandments written in the two Tables. He committed alſo unto them the cuſtody of the Tabernacle. He likewiſe exhorted the people that (when by force they had conquered the promiſed Countrey, and were planted therein) they ſhould not forget the injury which the Amalechites had done them, but that they ſhould lead forth their Army againſt them, and take vengeance of the wrongs they had done them, at ſuch time, as they were in the Deſart. And N he commanded them that as ſoon as they had taken the Countrey of Canaan, they ſhould exterminate and extinguiſh all the people.

Deut. 25. 19. The Amalechites to be puniſhed.

He commanded them alſo to erect an Altar towards the Eaſt not far from the City of Sichem, between the two Mountains, Garizim on the right hand, and the other called Gebal on the left, and that diſtributing the people into two parts (ſix Tribes in every part) they ſhould place them on theſe Mountains. And he commanded that the Levites and Prieſts ſhould be with them, and that they that were upon the Mountain of Garizim, ſhould pray to God, to multiply his bleſſings upon them that are zealous of his ſervice, and careful of the conſervation of his Laws which had been given them by Moſes. The ſix other alſo were appointed to anſwer them: and when theſe ſix O laſt had prayed, the ſix firſt were to anſwer them, and confirm that which they had pronounced. This done, they pronounced maledictions againſt the tranſgreſſors (each one

A anſwering the other) in ratification of that which had been ſpoken. He reduced alſo into writing theſe bleſſings and curſes, to the intent that the memory thereof might never be ſuppreſſed or extinguiſhed by time: which he alſo (being near his death) cauſed to be written on the Altar, on the two ſides thereof, and permitted the people to come near it onely that day, and there to offer burnt offerings; which is forbidden to them by the Law. Theſe ordinances did Moſes eſtabliſh, and theſe the Hebrew Nation obſerve inviolably, even unto this day.

On the next morning he re-aſſembled all the people, with their Wives, and Children; he likewiſe commanded, the ſlaves ſhould be preſent, binding them by an oath to maintain and keep the Laws; and that diligently tying themſelves to the will of God, they B ſhould not ſo much eſteem either their kindred, or means, or perils, or any other cauſe whatſoever, as thereby to be driven to neglect the Laws, or depart from the ordinances thereof: but whether any one of their kindred, or any City whatſoever, ſhould ſeek to alter and diſturb the ſame, or ſtrive to weaken the authority thereof, that both in particular and publick, they ſhould expoſe themſelves, and endeavour to puniſh them: and if they ſhould fortune to take ſuch a City, they ſhould raze and utterly deface the ſame; and if it were poſſible, not leave one ſtone upon another, but deſtroy the foundation. But if they were too feeble to take ſuch a revenge, yet, that they ſhould make it known, that they were not conſenting to their impiety. Hereunto the whole multitude conſented, and promis'd with an oath. He afterwards told them, how the people ſhould C know when the Sacrifices were agreeable unto God; and how they ought to march out to Battel, taking a ſign from the ſtones of the High Prieſt's Rational, of which I have fore-ſpoken.

Deut. 29 1, ad 10.
Moſes bindeth the Hebrews by an oath to keep the Law.

Joſua likewiſe, during the life, and in the preſence of Moſes, Propheſied whatſoever he intended to perform for the profit of the people, either abroad in the adminiſtration of War, or at home in preſcribing Laws: and preparing them to that order of life which was newly preſcribed them, he told them, that by inſtructions ~~from God~~ he Propheſied, that if they violated their Countrey Religion, they ſhould not eſcape deſtruction; their Countrey ſhould be filled with Foreign Arms, their Cities Sackt, their Temple Burnt, and themſelves ſold under the Spear; and that they ſhould ſerve a D Nation, which would not be moved or touched with commiſeration of their afflictions and miſeries; and, at length, they ſhould too late and unprofitably repent of their error: yet, that God, their eſtabliſher, would reſtore the Cities to the ancient Citizens, and the Temple to his people: And that this ſhould come to paſs, not onely once, but alſo many times. Then did Moſes alſo appoint Joſua to lead his Army againſt the Canaanites, promiſing him that God would be aſſiſting to his actions and wiſhing all ſort of happineſs to the people.

Deut. 34. 9.
Moſes exhorteth Joſua.

Seeing that (ſaith he) I go unto mine Anceſtors, and God hath prefixed this day for my departure, it is very juſt, that living as yet, and ſtanding in your preſence, I give him thanks for the care and providence, which he hath hitherto had of your affairs, not onely in delivering E you from ſo many evils, but alſo in largely imparting his bleſſings unto you; and for that he hath alwayes favourably helpt me, whileſt I endeavoured by my labour and care to reduce your fortunes to a better ſtate: for it is he which hath given both the beginning and the accompliſhment, making uſe of me but as his Miniſter and Servant in all that good which hath been done to his people. For all which things I have thought requiſite, in departing from you, to bleſs the goodneſs of God, who in time to come ſhall have the care and charge of you: and to acquit my ſelf of that debt, I leave you this in remembrance, which is, that you ought to ſerve and honour him, and reverence the Ordinances which he hath given you; whereby continuing his favour towards you, he will grant you grace to preſerve and keep this excellent gift. Truly a Law-giver that were no more than a man, would be greatly diſpleaſed with F thoſe, who ſhould violate his Ordinances, and ſet them at nought: do not you therefore tempt God, who is provoked unto anger, when thoſe Laws, which he himſelf hath eſtabliſhed, and given you, ſhall be contemned and neglected.

Deut. 3. 13. 23.

Whilſt Moſes pronounced theſe his laſt words, and fore-told to the Tribes their ſeveral deſtinies, and wiſh'd them a thouſand bleſſings, the whole Multitude brake into tears; and the women beating their Breaſts, ſhewed the ſorrow they reſented for his death. The Children likewiſe lamented, becauſe that in their tender years they had underſtood the virtue and famous acts of Moſes; and betwixt the elder and younger ſort, there was as it were a conflict who ſhould weep moſt bitterly: for the one underſtanding of how worthy a Governor they were deprived, lamented the time to come; and the G other were perplexed, becauſe they ſhould then loſe him, they before had ſufficiently taſted and made tryal how great his virtue was. But how great the compaſſion and complaint of the people was, may be conjectured by this that then befell the Prophet. For although he were aſſuredly perſuaded, that a man is not to lament at the inſtant of his death (becauſe it happens to him both according to the Will of God, and the Law of Nature) yet beholding the affection of the People, he could not reſtrain himſelf from tears. After which, he walkt towards the place where he was to dye, and they all followed him weeping. Then did Moſes (beckning with his hand) warn them from afar off, that they ſhould ſtand ſtill, and keep their places; and he deſir'd them that were neareſt him, by word of mouth, not to afflict him any longer, by following him with ſo many teſtimonies of affection. Accordingly, to obey him, they ſtood ſtill, and all together bewailed their calamity in ſo great and ſo general a loſs; only the Senators Eleazar the High Prieſt, and the chief Captain Joſhua accompanied him. And when he was arrived on the Mountain called Abarim (which is very high, and ſcituate near Jericho, from whence he might diſcover the greater part of the Land of Canaan) he diſmiſſed the Elders, and whil'ſt with mutual embraces he took his laſt leave of Eleazar and Joſhua, and diſcourſed with them, a Cloud ſuddenly environed him, and he was carried away into a certain Valley: but the Holy Books which he left us, ſay that he dyed, fearing leſt for the excellency of his virtue, they might report that he was taken up into Heaven. The whole time of his Life was 120 years, the third part whereof wanting a month, he ſpent in government of this great People. He dyed the laſt month of the year, and the firſt day of that month which the Macedonians call Dyſtros; and our Countreymen, Adar. He was, of all Men that ever liv'd, the wiſeſt; and who, in execution of his good counſels, had no man to equal him. Moreover, in eloquence he was incomparable, and in dexterity and grace to entertain and perſuade the People, he had no ſecond: and ſo were his paſſions always govern'd by his wiſdom, that he ſeemed utterly to want them, and only to know the names of thoſe paſſions of which he ſaw the effects in other men. His skill in War may give him a rank amongſt the greateſt Captains, and no man ever had the gift of Prophecy in ſo high a degree: for his words ſeem'd ſo many Oracles, and that as inſpir'd to him by God himſelf. The People mourned for him 30 days: nor were they ever ſeized with ſo extreme grief, as they were at this time, when the Prophet dyed; neither did he only leave behind him a preſent deſire of him, but a great eſtimation amongſt all men, who have ever chanced to read and examine his Writings, and by them eſtimated his virtues. And theſe are the things which I thought good to ſay of the death of Moſes.

Moſes when he dyed, was 120 years old. Amongſt the Hebrews, Adar is the 12 month, but amongſt us it is called March.

Ver. 10. Moſes was a good Governor, and a great Prophet.

D How Joſhua, General of the Hebrews, having overcome and ſlain the Canaanites, divided their Land amongſt the Tribes by lot, Joſh. 2.

AFter Moſes was taken from amongſt Men (in the manner which I have declared) the laſt duties were paid to him, and the time of mourning was paſs'd, Joſhua commanded the People to prepare themſelves, and to march forward to Battel. He ſent Spies likewiſe to Jericho, who might both ſound their minds, and diſcover their Forces. Soon after he diſlodged, and encamped in the open field, intending, with all expedition, to paſs the River of Jordan, as ſoon as any opportunity offered it ſelf. Then aſſembled he the Princes of the Tribes of Reuben E and Gad, and of the half Tribe of Manaſſes, (for to this half Tribe the Countrey of the Amorites, which was the ſeventh part of Canaan, was given for an habitation) and remembring them of the care which Moſes had taken of them even to his death, he exhorted them to perform with joy what they had promis'd him, as they were oblig'd, both in acknowledgment of the affection which he had teſtifi'd to them, and for the common advantage. They ſhew'd themſelves ready and willing to perform that which he commanded them, and they furniſh'd 50000 Men. After this, departing from the City of Abila, he drew towards Jordan, and marched forward ſome 60 Furlongs. When he was encamped, the Spies returned again, and preſenting themſelves unto him, certifi'd him of the whole eſtate of the Canaanites. For being unknown and unſuſpected, upon the firſt F arrival they obſerved and viewed the walls and ſtrength of the City at their pleaſure, ſearching which of them were more or leſs defended, and which of the gates were eaſieſt or hardeſt to aſſault; neither did any that met them, offer any offence unto them: for whil'ſt they thus pryed into, and viewed every place, the Citizens rather interpreted their diligence to be the curioſity of ſtrangers, than ſuſpected that they intended any hoſtile ſtratagem. About the ſhutting in of the Evening, they retired themſelves into a certain Hoſtry that joined to the walls, whither they had been directed to take their repaſt; and whil'ſt after Supper they conſulted about their return, the King advertis'd, that certain Spies ſent out of the Hebrews Camp, had ſurvey'd the City, and taken up their Lodging in Rahabs houſe, with intent to conceal themſelves, till they might get opportu- G nity to depart, ſent Officers to apprehend them, to the end that being brought before him, he might by Torture extort from them the cauſe and reaſon why they came into his City. But Rahab, having gotten ſome private intelligence of it, hid the Spies under certain

They hearing the woman ſpeak after this manner, and imagining no ſubtlety or deceit in her, returned back without ſearching the Hoſtry, and went in purſuit and ſearch after them every way, tracking every path, where they might be ſuſpected to travel towards Jordan. But having no tidings of them they deſiſted any further to purſue them. No ſooner was the Tumult appeaſed, but Rahab call'd forth the Spies, and told them the dangers to which ſhe had expoſed her ſelf for their ſecurity (for had ſhe been convinced to have concealed them, both ſhe and all her family had miſerably periſhed.) She therefore deſired them, to ſware to her that when they ſhould take Jericho, and kill all the inhabitants with the Sword, (as God had told her they ſhould) they would ſave the life of her and her family as ſhe had ſaved theirs. This ſaid, ſhe diſmiſſed them, to the end they might return home again. After they had with many thanks proteſted, and ſwore to her, to acknowledge her kindneſs not in words, but in deeds; and had adviſ'd her that when ſhe ſhould perceive the City ready to be ſurprized, ſhe ſhould retire all her ſubſtance, and all thoſe that appertained unto her, into her houſe; and that before the door thereof, ſhe ſhould hang a Red Cloath, to the intent that the General perceiving the ſame, might inhibit the Souldiers from pillaging and ſpoyling her houſe: for (ſaid they) we will give him notice K hereof (by reaſon of that willing forwardneſs that hath been in thee to ſave our lives) and if by misfortune any of thy Friends dye in the Combat, do not impute the fault unto us; and we beſeech God (by whom we have ſworn) that he be not diſpleaſed againſt any of us, but only againſt ſuch as falſifie their oaths. Having after this manner made the Covenant, they were let down with a rope from the wall; and when they were arrived in ſafety among their Nation, they recounted unto them all that had hapned ſince their arrival in the City. Joſhua hereupon declared unto Eleazar the High Prieſt and the reſt of the Elders, what oath his Spies had made to Rahab; and all of them ratified the ſame. But the General was penſive and troubled, for that he knew not which way to paſs the River of Jordan, by reaſon that for the preſent it was very deep L and without Bridges. For before that time there was not any Bridge built thereon; and if they would have built one, the Enemy would have interrupted them: beſides that, there were not any places convenient to ſtay in. But God made him a promiſe that he would make the waters fall, and give them paſſage. Joſhua therefore waited with his Army two dayes; and then he paſſed over the River in this manner. The Prieſts marched firſt with the Ark; after them went the Levites bearing the Tabernacle, and thoſe veſſels which were deſtinated for Sacrifice; then followed the whole multitude, diſtinguiſhed in their Tribes, having incloſed within their Battels the Women and Children whereby they might be the more ſecure from the force of the ſtream. But when the Prieſts had entred, and found the River paſſable, and the water decreaſed, and M that the Current thereof was not ſo violent, but that in the bottom there was good footing (ſo that it was fordable;) then all of them without fear paſſed over, finding all things aſſuredly performed unto them which God had promiſed unto them: but the Prieſts kept in the midſt of the Channel until the multitude were paſt over, and were in ſecurity; and when every one had gotten to the other Bank, the Prieſts came out, permitting the River to flow according to its free and ordinary courſe: which preſently flowing, grew to that greatneſs and ſwiftneſs which it had at firſt. Now when the Hebrews had marched fifty Furlongs, they encamped about ten Furlongs from Jericho. But Joſua built an Altar of twelve ſtones (which every one of the Princes of the Tribes had gathered out of the Channel of Jordan, by his order) to the end it might be a N Monument of the prodigious reſtraint of the River; and on the ſame he ſacrificed to God, and the ſolemnity of the paſſover was celebrated in that place; and at this time, the Army was in as great a plenty as ever it had been in neceſſity; for they reap'd the Corn of the Canaanites, (which at that time was ripe) and carried away much other prey. In the ſame ſeaſon likewiſe their nouriſhment of Manna failed them, whereon they had fed for the ſpace of forty years. And whereas the Iſraelites did all theſe things with ſecurity, and freely, and the Canaanites never ſallied out againſt them, but diſmay'd with fear, kept themſelves up within their walls; Joſhua reſolved to beſiege them in their Cities: ſo that on the firſt day of the Feaſt, the Prieſts bearing the Ark, and guarded on every ſide with Troops of Armed Men, drew near Jericho, ſounding ſeven Horns, thereby O to animate the Soldiers to behave themſelves manfully; and they walked about the walls, being attended by the Senate, neither did they any other thing but Blow their

A Horns, and ſo returned back into their Camp. Which when they had done for the ſpace of ſix dayes, on the ſeventh Joſhua aſſembled the Army and all the people, bringing them joyful news of the City, which that day ſhould be taken without labour, (the walls falling down of their own accord, and without mans hand, and yielding them free paſſage and entrance into the City) and he encouraged them to kill all thoſe whom they met, and not to give over the ſlaughter of their enemies, although they were weary, nor to be moved with compaſſion, nor allured from the ſlaughter and execution by deſire of prey, or to permit the enemy, in any ſort, to flye, but that they ſhould extinguiſh and root out all that had life, reſerving nothing for prey or private profit. He commanded likewiſe that all the gold and ſilver that was found ſhould be brought into one place, B to offer to God as the firſt fruits, and in thanksgiving for his aſſiſtance: and that only Rahab with her Kindred ſhould be ſpared, by reaſon of the oath which the Spies had ſworn unto her. This ſaid, he advanced his Army towards the City; then did they once more walk round about the City, the Ark marching before them, and encouraging them to Valour by the ſound of their Cornets. And after they had environed the walls ſeven times, and had a little repoſed themſelves, the walls fell (though the Hebrews had forced no Engine, nor uſed any other violence againſt them.) So that they entering into the City, ſlew all thoſe that were therein, who were already diſcomforted by the ſudden and unexpected overthrow of their walls, and thorow their ſudden fear made unapt to fight; ſo that they were ſlain in their ſtreets, finding neither refuge nor C relief to ſuccour them: and ſo great was the ſlaughter, that they neither ſpared Women nor Children, but filled the City with dead Carcaſſes; which at length being ſet on fire, ſerved for a Funeral flame to conſume them; and with like fury they ravaged and burnt the houſes of the Countrey; only Rahab and her houſhold (who kept themſelves within her houſe) were ſaved by the Spies: and being brought to Joſhuah's preſence, he gave her thanks, for ſaving his Spies, and promiſed her that he would reward her courteſies; and ſoon after he gave her poſſeſſions, and ever held her in great honour. All of the City which the fire ſpared, the ſword conſumed. And Joſhua pronounced Curſes againſt thoſe, who ſhould afterward endeavour to erect that which he had ruined: namely, that he that ſhould lay the firſt foundation, ſhould be deprived of his firſt begotten Son; D and he that ſhould finiſh the work, might loſe his youngeſt Son; and it hath pleaſed God that this imprecation hath not been fruſtrate, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewen. At the ſurprize and ſack of this City, there was gathered an infinite quantity of Gold, Silver, and Braſs; and none but one man brake the Edict, or ſought any prey or lucre for himſelf. Theſe ſpoils Joſhua delivered to the Prieſts to be laid up in the Treaſury; and after this manner was the City of Jericho deſtroyed. But Achar the Son of Zebedias of the Tribe of Judah, having got the Kings Coat embroidered with Gold, and an Ingot of Gold of two hundred Sicles in weight, and thinking in him ſelf that it were not juſt that the profit he had got by the hazard of his life, ſhould be taken from him, and preſented to God, who had no need thereof; he digged a deep Pit in his Tent, and buried E his ſpoils therein, thinking by this means to defraud God, as well as his Companions. At that time their Tents were pitched in a place called Gilgal, which ſignifieth Enfranchized, becauſe being delivered from the affliction of Egypt, and the penury of the Deſart, they thought they had nothing more to fear. But ſome few dayes after the deſtruction of Jericho, Joſhua ſent out three thouſand Armed men againſt Ain (a City ſituate a little above Jericho) who encountering with the Ainites in Battel, and by them put to flight, loſt thirty ſix of their company. The news of which diſaſter being brought to the Camp, the Iſraelites were ſeized with exceeding grief, not onely for the men they had loſt (which were all of them valiant men, and worthy of honour) but alſo by reaſon of the deſpair they conceived of their future ſucceſs. For where-F as they had perſuaded themſelves that they were already Maſters of the field, and that their Army ſhould be alwayes Victorious, according as God had promiſed them, they ſaw, on the contrary, that this ſucceſs had raiſed the hearts of their adverſaries; ſo that cloathing themſelves with ſackcloth, they ſpent three dayes in tears and lamentations without taſting any meat; ſo grievouſly were they afflicted with the defeat that had hapned. Joſhua ſeeing the Army dejected after this manner, falling on his face to the earth, addreſſed himſelf to God, ſaying, We have not been induced by our own temerity to attempt the conqueſt of this Land by force; but we have been hereunto encouraged by thy Servant Moſes, to whom thou haſt promiſed, by divers ſigns, that thou wouldeſt give us this Countrey to inhabit in, and that our Army ſhould have always the victory in battel, and of theſe thy G promiſes we have oftentimes experienced the event. But now, beyond all expectation (having received an overthrow, and loſt ſome of our Soldiers) being terrified by this accident, and ſuſpicious of thy promiſes to Moſes, we both abſtain from War, and (after ſo many enterprizes much rejoyced thereat, and deſired to be received as their confederates. By theſe words, and the oldneſs of their garments, and the pretence of their long journey, they perſwaded the Hebrews to enter and accord an amity with them. And the High Prieſt Eleazar with the Council of the Elders ſware unto them, that they ſhould be reputed for Friends and Allies, and that no hoſtile action ſhould be enterprized againſt them; the people likewiſe approved the alliance. After this, Joſhua encamping with his Army upon their confines, and underſtanding that the Gibeonites dwelt not far from Jeruſalem, and that O they likewiſe were of the race of the Canaanites, he ſent for the principal among them, and upbraided them with their deceit: whereunto they anſwered, that they had no

Elders; and it was reſolv'd not to infringe the Oath made to them, but that they ſhould be obliged to ſerve for the publique works; Whereupon they were adjudged to attend on theſe ſervices: and by this means delivered they themſelves from their imminent peril. But the King of Jeruſalem was much incenſed againſt the Gibeonites, for that they had revolted and ſubmitted to Joſhua; and he aſſembled together the Kings of his neighbour Nations, to make War againſt them. The Gibeonites perceiving the danger they were in, and how the Enemy prepared to aſſault them, and to that end had pitched their Tents near a certain Fountain not far from the City, they deſired Joſhua to aſſiſt and B defend them. For their affairs were in that ſtate that they expected death from the hands of their Friends: and contrariwiſe hoped for help from thoſe Hebrews, with whom they had contracted amity, notwithſtanding that they arrived in that Countrey to deſtroy the whole Nation of the Canaanites. Joſhua therefore (haſting onward with his whole Army to give them aſſiſtance, and marching both day and night) early in the morning charged the Enemy (at ſuch time as he intended his aſſault) and having put them to flight, he purſued them by a ſteep tract, which place is called Bethora, where he ſaw manifeſtly that God fought for him by the Thunder, Lightning and Hail that fell, at that time, far bigger than was accuſtomed. The day alſo (the like whereof was never heard before) was lengthned, leſt by the ſpeedy approach of the night the Enemy C ſhould eſcape from the Victor: and Joſhua took all thoſe five Kings in a certain Cave near Makkedah, where they were hidden, and condemned them all to death. And that this day was longer than ordinary, it is regiſtred in the ſacred Volumes, which are reſerved in the Temple. After this wonderful ſucceſs, Joſhua led his Army to the Mountains of Canaan, where having made a great ſlaughter of Men, and taken rich booty, he brought back his Army to Gilgal. Now when the renown of the Hebrews valiant acts, and their giving no quarter to any one perſon of their Enemies, was bruited abroad amongſt the neighbour Nations, they were poſſeſſed with great fear: ſo that the Kings of the Canaanites, that bordered upon Libanus, and they alſo of the Plain of Canaan, joyned themſelves Confederates with the Philiſtines, and all of them encamped D near Berotha, (a City of the higher Galilee, not far from Cedes, which is alſo ſcituate in the Land of Canaan.) The whole Army conſiſted of three hundred thouſand Footmen, ten thouſand Horſmen, and twenty thouſand Chariots. This great multitude of the Enemy aſtoniſhed Joſhua, and the Iſraelites, ſo that they conceived little hope of obtaining the Victory: but God reproached and upbraided them for their timidity, and for that they ſuſpected themſelves to be unſecure under his protection; he promiſed them likewiſe, that he would overcome their Enemies, and make their Horſes unprofitable, and conſume their Chariots by fire. Joſhua emboldened by theſe promiſes from God, marched out againſt his Enemies, and came upon them the fifth day. The encounter was ſtrong, and the ſlaughter ſo great, that they who heard the ſame, would ſcarcely believe it. Many E were ſlain in the purſuit; ſo that (a few only excepted) the whole Army was put to the Sword. The Kings alſo were all ſlain; Joſhua alſo commanded that their Horſes ſhould be ſlain: and he burnt their Chariots, and Victoriouſly marched thorow the whole Countrey; ſo that no man durſt come out, or make head againſt him. He beſieged likewiſe their ſtrong places, and killed all thoſe that fell into his hands. Now when the fifth year was ended, and none of the Canaanites were left alive, (except ſuch as were fled into their Cities and Fortreſſes) Joſhua once more retired his Camp towards the Mountains, and placed the ſacred Tabernacle in the City of Siloe, which ſeemed to be a very convenient place, by reaſon of the beauty of the ſame; where the Ark might remain, till ſuch time as their affairs permitted them to build a Temple. From thence he de-F parted with all the people, to Sichem; and there built an Altar, according as Moſes had formerly commanded; and having divided his Army, he planted half of them on the Mountain of Garizim, and the other half on the Mountain of Gebal (on which alſo he built an Altar) with the Levites and the Prieſts; and after they had ſacrificed and pronounced the curſes formerly mentioned, and ingraven them on the Altar, they returned to Siloe. Now, inaſmuch as Joſhua was well ſtricken in years, and very well perceived, that the Cities of the Canaanites were hardly to be aſſaulted, both in reſpect of the places wherein they were ſcituate, and of the munitions wherewith (beſides other advantages of nature) their Walls were ſtrengthned and fortified (for the Canaanites having intelligence of the departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt, and how G they haſtned thither, with intent utterly to extinguiſh and overthrow that Nation, favoured them with,becauſe they had obſerved his Laws. That the 31 Kings which had H been ſo hardy as to encounter them, had by them been overcome; that all the Armies that had oppoſed them in battel, were wholly diſcomfited,and moſt of their Cities taken; ſothat there remained not any memory of them. But for that ſome of the Cities which remained were ſo fortifi'd that they required long Sieges to get them, he thought good that the Tribes which had been drawn from out the Countrey beyond Jordan, to be Aſſociates in this common cauſe of Conqueſt, and by reaſon of affinity,had made themſelves companions in their perils, ſhould be ſent back into their own Countrey, with thanks. And that ſome of each Tribe of approved uprightneſs and loyalty ſhould be choſen,who ſurveying the Countrey might faithfully give a report of the extent thereof. This ſentence was approved by the whole multitude, and thereupon divers men I were ſent (accompanied with ſuch as were ſkilfull in Geometry) to meaſure out the Land,and to eſtimate its goodneſs. For the nature of the Land of Canaan is ſuch, that though there are great Plains very fertile,yet the Land being compared with other places of the ſame Countrey,cannot be eſteemed excellent,compared with the other Countries of Jericho, and the Land about Jeruſalem, it may ſeem to be nothing worth: although generally the whole Countrey be ſmall, and for the great part mountainous, yet in reſpect of the abundance, and beauty of the fruits thereof, it is ſecond to no other whatſoever. For this cauſe he thought good that the portions ſhould rather be eſtimated according to their value, than their meaſure; by reaſon that oftentimes one Plow-land was worth one thouſand other. Thoſe which were ſent were ten in number, who (having travelled over the whole Countrey, and ſurveyed the ſame) returned again, at the K end of ſix moneths, to Siloe, where the Ark was kept.

Joſhua divideth the Region of Canaan to the nine Tribes, and the half Tribe of Manaſſes. Joſhua, 14, 15. 19. per totum

Then Joſhua, (taking unto him Eleazar, with the Elders, and Princes of the Tribes) divided the Region amongſt nine Tribes; and the half of the Tribe of Manaſſes, proportionably to the greatneſs of each Tribe, and when the lot was caſt, there fell to the Tribe of Judah all the higher Judæa; which extendeth it ſelf in length to Jeruſalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom; to which likewiſe were annexed the Cities of Aſcalon and Gaza. The Tribe of Simeon (which was the ſecond) obtained a part of Idumæa, confining upon Egypt and Arabia. The Benjamites had that Countrey which extendeth from Jordan to the Sea in length, and in breadth from Jeruſalem to Bethel: this portion L was very ſmall, by reaſon that the Countrey was good, for it contained the Cities of Jericho and Jeruſalem. The tribe of Ephraim was alotted its portion in length, from Jordan to Gadara; and in breadth from Bethel to the great Plain. The half Tribe of Manaſſes had the Territory from Jordan to the City of Dora in length,and in breadth to the City of Bethſan (which is at this day called Scythopolis.) After them, Iſſachar had that which lies between mount Carmel, and the River of Jordan, in length, and the Mountain Itobir, for the bounds of its breadth. The Tribe of Zabulon was allowed that Countrey, which ſtretcheth out as far as Genazereth,and abutteth on mount Carmel, and the Sea. The Countrey which is betwixt Carmel and Sidon, was adjudged to the Aſſerites, in which portion was comprized the City of Arce, which is alſo called Actipus. M The Nephthalites poſſeſſed that quarter that ſtretcheth out from the Eaſt to the City of Damaſcus, and the lower Galilee, as far as the Mountain of Libanus, and the head of Jordan, that iſſueth from the ſame, on that ſide which confines on the City Arce Northwards. To them of Dan were aſſigned the Valleys extending Weſtward, and terminated by the Cities of Azoth and Doris, containing all the Countrey of Jamnia and Gitta, from Abaron, even unto that Mountain where beginneth the portion of Juda. After this manner did Joſhua divide the Countrey of ſix Nations (bearing the name of Canaan) and gave it in poſſeſſion to nine Tribes and an half. For Amorrhæa (ſo called from of the Sons of Canaan) had been already taken by Moſes, and aſſigned by him to two Tribes and an half, as I have already declared. But all the N quarter of Sidon of the Aruceans, Amatheans and Aritheans were not comprized in this diviſion. But Joſhua finding himſelf burthened with years, and unfit to execute his enterpriſes in his own perſon; and obſerving that the Governors of the people to whom he gave employments, acted negligently; he exhorted every Tribe in particular, to beſtir themſelves couragiouſly in the extent of the Territory allotted to them,for exterminating the remainder of the Canaanites; as Moſes had before told them, that their ſafety, and the maintenance of the Laws and Religion conſiſted in that one point, which he had likewiſe learned by his own experience. Further, that they ſhould deliver unto the Levites thirty eight Cities,becauſe they had already ten in their poſſeſſion,within the Land of Amorrhæa: three of which were ordained for Cities of refuge to thoſe that O fled: (for he adviſed them, with all conſideration and care to omit nothing of that which Moſes had commanded them,) of the Tribe of Juda, Hebron; of that of Ephraim,

The diſtribution of the prey.

Joſhua 22.22. ad 6.

Joſhua's oration to thoſe that dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan, and had ſerved with the reſt.

A Sichem; and of Nephthali, Cades: which is in higher Galilee. Moreover, he diſtributed unto them the ſurpluſage of the prey, which was very great: ſo that not only in publick, but in private, they got no ſmall quantity of ſuſtenance; for there was ſo much Gold, and Rayment, and Houſhold-ſtuff, and ſo great ſtore of Cattel and Horſes, that the Common-Wealth and all particular perſons were enriched with it. After which he aſſembled the whole Army, and to thoſe that were planted on the other ſide of Jordan, (who had born Arms with the reſt, and were in number no leſs than 50000) he ſpake after this manner.

Since God (the Father and Maſter of our Nation) hath given this Countrey into our poſ- B ſeſſion, and hath promiſed to continue and conſerve the ſame ſo for ever; and ſince likewiſe you have willingly and forwardly aſſiſted us in all our neceſſities and dangers, (according to Gods command and direction) it is requiſite at this preſent (ſince there remains not any further matter wherein we have need to employ you) that we diſmiſs you home, to enjoy ſome quiet, not doubting, that if hereafter we ſhall have need of you, you will, with no leſs willingneſs, be as induſtrious to do us kindneſs. We therefore yield you hearty thanks, for that you have vouchſafed to be companions in our perils: and we deſire, that you will continue your mutual affection, remembring us as your friends, and how you have gotten your poſſeſſions by our help, as we (by Gods favour and your aſſiſtance) have attained to this our preſent felicity. Neither have you adventured, without ſome reward of your travels; for in this your warfare you are en- C riched, and ſhall bear away with you a great quantity of Gold and Silver; and beſides all theſe, our benevolence and love, tyed unto you with all ſincerity, whenſoever you ſhall have cauſe to uſe us. For you have neither forgot, nor ſet light by Moſes command, before he departed out of this life, and have ſpared no endeavour, whereby you might tye our affections to you. We therefore diſmiſs you to your own poſſeſſions, in fulneſs of contentment; praying you to remember theſe things, and never to put any bounds to the inviolable amity which is between us; and let not the River Jordan, which is betwixt you and us, hinder you from conſidering us as Hebrews. For all of us (both thoſe that dwell on this ſide, and on the other ſide of Jordan) are the poſterity of Abraham, and one and the ſame God gave life both to your and our progenitors; whoſe Laws and Religion (inſtituted by Moſes) are diligently to be obſerved: D for by this means, he will become our helper and favourer; as on the contrary, if we ſhall degenerate from his Statutes, he will be our Enemy.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 4. Joſhua 22. 10, 11, 12.

The Iſraelites after they had paſt over Jordan, builded an Altar on the Bank thereof.

After he had ſpoke to them after this manner, he embraced in particular, the cheif of theſe Tribes, who returned, and their whole people with them. This done, he ſtayed in that place; but the reſt of the people accompianed them onward with tears, and they ſeparated the one from the other, with great grief. But after the Tribe of Reuben and of Gad, and the reſt of the Manaſſites, had paſſed over Jordan, they built an Altar upon the Bank of the River, that might ſerve for a memorial to poſterity, of the alliance which they had with thoſe that dwelt on the other ſide of Jordan. When the tidings E hereof came to their ears that dwelt on the further ſide of the River, that they had built an Altar, but they were ignorant of the cauſe of building it, they ſuppoſed, that ſeeking to innovate their Religion, they would introduce the ſervice of forein and falſe gods. And being raſhly ſtirred up with this ſuſpition of the violation of their Religion, they put themſelves in Arms, with a reſolution, to revenge themſelves of thoſe who had built that Altar, for that they had forſaken the Laws and Ordinances of their fore-fathers. For they ſuppoſed, that they were not ſo far to reſpect their parentage, or dignity, as to forget the will of God, and that ſervice which was agreeable in his ſight. For which cauſe (being in this manner incenſed) they prepared themſelves to the expedition. But Joſhua and the High-Prieſt Eleazar, with the reſt of the Elders, F reſtrained them; counſelling them, firſt of all to inquire what was their intention; and afterward, if it ſhould appear that they did it with a ſiniſter intent, then they might lawfully invade them with the Sword. Hereupon they ſent Phinees, the Son of Eleazar, and ten other of the nobleſt among the Hebrews, as Ambaſſadors to them, to know what the intent and reaſon was, why they had built that Altar on the bank of Jordan.

Now when theſe Ambaſſadors had paſt the River, and were come amongſt them, they ſummoned an Aſſembly, and Phinees ſtanding up in the midſt of them, ſpoke after this manner:

G You have committed too heinous an offence (ſaith he) to be puniſht only with words: yet notwithſtanding, we have not upon the inſtant taken Arms to aſſault you in Battel, nor had regard to the heinouſneſs of your Crime, to the intent to puniſh you; but we are ſent to you as

The year of the World, 2499. Before Chriſt's Nativity, 1465.

Ambaſſadors (in conſideration of our alliance) and for that (as we ſuppoſe) you may be H drawn by good perſuaſions to the acknowledgment and deteſtation of your fault; to the end, that when we are informed of the cauſe that hath induced you to erect this Altar, it may not be thought, that we have headlong thruſt our ſelves into Arms againſt you, if out of a good intent you have built the ſame: and if it appear otherwiſe, that the offence is juſtly charg'd upon you, we may take revenge of the ſame, according as reaſon requires. For ſcarcely could we believe, that you (who are well-grounded in the knowledge of God, and hearers of thoſe Laws which he himſelf hath given you) ſhould (ſince your departure from us, and upon your arrival in your own Patrimony which you have obtained by lot, by his favour, and peaceably enjoy by his providence) forget him ſo ſoon, as to forſake the Tabernacle, Ark and Altar, and introduce ſtrange gods, to the intent to be partakers of the impieties of the Canaanites. But if you repent I of your miſdeed, and perſevere no longer in ſo great madneſs, but reclaim your ſelves, and return to your ancient Religion, a Pardon is granted you: but if you obſtinately perſiſt in your wickedneſs, there is nothing which we will not do for the maintenance of our Religion, and paſſing the River for defence of it, (or to ſpeak more fitly) of our God; and accounting you no leſs hateful and impious than Canaanites, we will treat you after the ſame manner as we have treated them. For do not ſuppoſe, that becauſe you have paſt the River, you are exempt from God's power; becauſe God is in all places, and it is impoſſible for you to avoid either his power, or his vengeance. If the Province which you poſſeſs is an impediment to your ſalvation, it were better for you to make a new diviſion of Lands, and leave this Region, how plentiful ſoever.
It behooveth you therefore to renounce your Error, as we conjure you to do, by that love which you K bare to your Children and Wives, and by the reſpect you hold of that which is moſt dear unto you, that you inforce us not to wage War againſt you. Reſolve your ſelves therefore in this preſent matter, aſſuring your ſelves that therein conſiſteth the iſſue, whether you had rather perpetually enjoy your peace and ſafety by our perſuaſion, or expoſe both you and yours to the peril of a bloody War.

After Phinees had finiſhed this his Oration, the chief of the Aſſembly anſwer'd him in this manner:

Ver. 21. The Reubenites anſwer.

We never thought of altering the Union which joins us ſo near together, or of innovating any thing in that Religion of our Fathers; we will alwayes perſevere therein: we know that there is one God, the common Father of all the Hebrews, and none but the Brazen Altar which is before the Tabernacle, ſhall receive our Sacrifices. As for that which we have now erected, and L which breedeth in you at this preſent a cauſe of ſuſpition, we built it not to the intent to offer Sacrifices upon it, but only to remain as a perpetual monument of our alliance, and of our obligation to continue firm in the ſame belief; but not to the end to make any alteration of Religion.
And that this was the onely cauſe which induced us to build the ſame, we call God to witneſs; wherefore inſtead of continuing to accuſe us, you ought, for the future, to have a better opinion of us, than to ſuſpect us of a Crime, of which none of Abraham*'s Poſterity can be guilty, without* deſerving to loſe his life.

them to obſerve his Commandments moſt Religiouſly, to the end God might continue his merciful hand over them; ſince they knew that his favour could be kept to them N by no other means, but by their obedience. He further told them, that he thought himſelf oblig'd, before he departed out of this life, to admoniſh them of their duty. Laſt of all, he deſired them to accept well of that his good admonition, and to be perpetually mindful of the ſame. As he ended theſe words, he gave up the Ghoſt, and dyed in

How the Iſraelites, after the death of their Emperor, forgetting the Religion of their Forefathers, fell into extreme Calamities: and how through a Civil War raiſed amongſt B them, there were only 600 of the Tribe of Benjamin left alive.

BUt the Canaanites (whoſe eſtate at that time was very potent) expected them with a great Hoſt about the City of Bezec, having their Army conducted by the King of that place, called Adoni-Bezec, which name ſignifieth, Lord of the Bezecenites: (for Adoni in the Hebrew Tongue, is Lord) and theſe Men promiſed themſelves the Victory, by reaſon that Joſhua was deceaſed. Againſt theſe, the two Tribes of Judah and Simeon fought very valiantly, and ſlaying 10000 of them in the purſuit, they took Adoni-Bezec Captive, who having his hands and feet cut off, acknowledged the divine juſtice: for he confeſſed that he had uſed 72 Kings before times after the ſame manner. In this condition C they conducted him near Jeruſalem, where departing out of this life, they buried him. Then they over-run the Countrey, ſacking and taking the Cities; and after they had divers of them in their poſſeſſion, they beſieged Jeruſalem, and entring the lower City, they put all the Inhabitants to the Sword. But the higher Town was very hard to be aſſaulted (by reaſon of the Fortreſſes, and ſtrength of the Walls, and the naturally ſtrong ſituation of the place) which was the cauſe that they rais'd their Camp to go and beſiege Hebron, which they took, and ſlew all that were therein. Amongſt whom there were ſome of the Race of the Gyants, whoſe ſtature was ſo prodigious, their aſpect ſo terrible, and their voice ſo dreadful, that it can ſcarce be believ'd; their Bones are ſtill to be ſeen at this day. This City being very conſiderable, was given to the Levites, with 2000 D Cubits of Land round about: the reſt of the Countrey was freely given to Caleb, according as Moſes had commanded, he having been one of thoſe Spies which Moſes ſent to view the Land of Canaan. They gave lands and poſſeſſions likewiſe to the poſterity of Jethro the Madianite (who was Father-in-law to Moſes) for that they had forſaken their own Territories, and join'd themſelves to the Iſraelites, and been with them in the Deſart. The Tribes of Judah and Simeon took thoſe Cities of the mountainous Countrey of Canaan, and alſo thoſe that were in the Plain near the Sea-coaſt, namely, Aſcalon and Azoth. But they could not take Gaza and Accaron; for thoſe Cities being in the Plain, and defended with a great number of Chariots, repelled thoſe that aſſaulted the ſame to their diſadvantage. So theſe two Tribes having had good ſucceſs in Wars, reE tired to their Cities, to enjoy in peace the ſpoils which they had taken.

As for the Benjamites, to whom Jeruſalem appertained, they received the Inhabitants thereof as their Tributaries; ſo that all being in peace, and the one ceaſing from ſlaughter, and the other aſſured from danger, they employed themſelves in manuring the Countrey. The reſt of the Tribes did the like, conforming themſelves according to the example of the Benjamites, and contenting themſelves to receive their Tributes, they ſuffered the Canaanites to live in peace. The Tribe of Ephraim having long beſieged the City of Bethel, could not ſee ſuch an end of their deſign, as the length of time, and the Travels they had taken in the Siege required: and although they were very much toyled and wearied with the ſame, yet they continued the Siege. At laſt one of the Inhabitants, F (who was carrying Proviſions thither, fell into their hands) whom they promis'd, that if he would let them into the City, they would ſave him, and grant life and liberty likewiſe to all his Family. He was perſuaded, and by his means they became Maſters of the place; he and his were ſpared, but all the reſt of the Inhabitants were put to the Sword. From that time forwards, the Iſraelites ceas'd to make War, and employed themſelves in Tillage of their Lands, and husbanding their Fruits: and being grown rich, they followed the delights and pleaſures of the World in ſuch ſort as they became diſſolute, and had no regard either of their ancient Diſcipline, or the Laws of their Forefathers. Whereupon God was highly incenſed againſt them, and he gave them to underſtand, that contrary to his Command, they had ſpared the Canaanites; and that thoſe Canaanites, in G time to come, ſhould exerciſe great Cruelties againſt them. And although they were aſtoniſhed at what was declared to them, yet they would not reſolve to renew the War, both for that they had received many Tributes from the Canaanites, and becauſe (being effemi-

At this time the Government of the Commonwealth was corrupted, and they reſpected no more the ancient forms of chooſing Senators, or any other Magiſtrates; they were extremely addicted to Gain, and minded onely private Intereſt. Judg. 19. per totum. The Hiſtory of the Levites Wife.

A certain Levite of the common ſort, that dwelt in the Dominion of the Ephraimites, took a Wife that was born in the City of Bethlehem, which pertaineth to the Tribe of Judah, whom (by reaſon of her incomparable beauty) he moſt intirely loved; but was much grieved, that he found not her affection anſwerable to his: At laſt, his reproaches of unkindneſs became ſo tedious to the Woman, that (tyred with diſquiet) ſhe forſook her Husband, and went and dwelt with her Father. The Husband grieved hereat, I (by reaſon of the love he bare her) went to her Fathers houſe, and was reconciled to his Wife. There abode he for the ſpace of four days, being friendly entertained by her Father and Mother. On the fifth day, he thought good to return to his own dwelling, and both of them departed about Evening (by reaſon that the Father and Mother were loth to part with them, and had conſumed the better part of the day in entertainment.)

Thirty Stadia are four Italian Miles. Two Italian Miles and an half.

They had a Servant which follow'd them, and an Aſs likewiſe, on which the Woman was mounted. Now when they had travelled 30 Furlongs, and drew near the City of Jeruſalem, their ſervant counſelled them to take up their lodging in ſome place, leſt by their late Travel they might fall into ſome diſaſter, and the rather, becauſe they were not far from the Enemies Countrey; and that the preſent time was ſuch, as gave K them juſt cauſe to fear. But this advice pleas'd not his Maſter, who would not lodge amongſt thoſe of a Foreign Nation (for the City pertained to the Canaanites) but his intent was to paſs farther, and Travel yet 20 Furlongs more, to take up his lodging in one of his own Cities. This reſolution being taken, they came to Giba, a City of the Tribe of Benjamin, when it was late: and finding no man in the Market-place that would lodge them, at length a certain old man, returning out of the Countrey to his houſe, (who was by birth an Ephraimite, and dwelt in that City) meeting him, asked him what he was? and why he made it ſo late before he took up his lodging? he anſwer'd, That he was a Levite, and that he brought his Wife with him from her Parents, and was returning to his houſe, which was amongſt the Tribe of Ephraim.

A ver. 22. ad 26. The horrible wickedneſs of the Gibeonites.

The old man having regard to L his Parentage, (by reaſon that he was of the ſame Tribe) lodg'd him in his own houſe. But certain young men of the City, who had ſeen the Woman in the Market-place, and were taken with her beauty, underſtanding that ſhe was gone to the old mans houſe, who, by reaſon of his weakneſs and age, was not able to defend her, went and knockt at his door. The old man deſir'd them to depart, and not to offer him ſuch a diſpleaſure. But they importun'd him to deliver them his Gueſt; which done, they promis'd him in no ſort to cauſe his further moleſtation. But though the old man alledg'd that ſhe was his Kinſwoman, and that her Husband was a Levite; and that they ſhould commit an heinous offence, in ſinning, for the ſake of their corrupt pleaſure, againſt the Laws: yet had they no regard of equity, but mock'd him, and menac'd to murther him, becauſe he hin- M der'd them from ſatisfying their luſt. Finally, he was driven to that exigent, that (to avoid the doing violence to his Gueſt, and a ſtranger) he offer'd to abandon to them his own Daughter, chooſing rather to let them ſatisfie their unbridled Concupiſcence on her, than that his Gueſt ſhould ſuffer any Villany. Notwithſtanding all this, they ceaſed not to urge the delivery of the Woman; and they ſeconded their diſordinate deſires with violence, taking her by force, and leading her to their own lodgings. Afterwards (having all night lewdly ſatisfi'd their luſts on her) they thruſt her out of doors from them at break of day. But ſhe being deſolate, and diſcomforted by this diſaſter, returned to her lodging; and both by reaſon of the Villany which ſhe had ſuffer'd, and the ſhame that hinder'd her from appearing before her Husband, who was outrag'd in her perſon, N ſhe fell down, and gave up the ghoſt. Her Husband ſuppoſing that ſhe was only fainted away, endeavor'd to recover her, and to comfort her, becauſe ſhe had not willingly condeſcended to their violences and luſts, but, in ſpight of her reſiſtance, was raviſh'd by them, and taken out of his lodging. But when he ſaw ſhe was dead, the exceſs of his grief caus'd him not to loſe his judgment.

Ver. 29. The Levite divideth the body of his Wife into 12 parts, and ſent them to the twelve Tribes, Judg. 20.

He laid the dead body upon his Aſs, and carried it to his houſe; where he no ſooner arriv'd, but he divided the ſame into 12 pieces, which he ſent to the 12 Tribes of Iſrael; commanding them that bare the ſame, to tell every Tribe, who were the Authors of his Wifes death, and what Villany they had practiſed againſt her. The Tribes were enrag'd at what they ſaw and heard, (having never heard of any the like adventure) and incens'd with extreme, yet juſt, fury, they aſſem- O bled themſelves in Siloe before the Ark, where they reſolved ſuddenly to take Arms, and to attack Giba. But the Elders repreſented to them, that they ought not after that manner

A ner to enterprize a headlong War againſt their brethren, before they had more particularly examined the crime whereof they were accuſed; ſince the Law permitteth not any War (no not againſt ſtrangers) before an Enter-parley and Embaſſage, to demand ſatisfaction. That accordingly it was juſt to ſend certain meſſengers to the Gibeonites, to demand at their hands the Authors of that villany, to the end, that when they were delivered, they might take ſatisfaction by their puniſhment: but if they ſhould not regard that which was demanded, then it was lawful for them to aſſail them with open War. Hereupon they ſent certain Embaſſadors to the Gibeonites, to complain of thoſe young men that in perpetrating this indignity againſt the woman had violated the Law of God, and to demand that they might ſuffer condign puniſhment by death for the ſame. B But the Gibeonites would not yield up the young men, eſteeming it an indignity for them for fear of War to be obedient to other mens commandments, for they thought themſelves no wayes inferior unto others in feats of War, both in reſpect of number and courage. The reſt of the Tribe alſo made great preparation, being all reſolved, mutually to defend themſelves againſt whoſoever ſhould aſſail them. When the Gibeonites anſwer was brought to the Iſraelites, they ſware an oath among themſelves, not to give their daughters in marriage to any Benjamite, and to make War againſt them more bloody than that which their predeceſſors had made againſt the Canaanites. They ſpeedily therefore levied and led into the field an army of 400000. men againſt them. The Benjamites Army conſiſted of 25600. armed men; 500. of which were expert in ſhooting, C and fighting with the left hand. The battle was fought near Giba, wherein the Benjamites put the Iſralites to flight, who were ſlain to the number of 22000. and more had been ſlaughtred that day, had not the night ſuddenly overtaken them, and ended the fight. The Benjamites joyfully returned to their Cities and the Iſralites were diſcomfited by their defeat. The next day they once more renewed the battel, and the Benjamites had the upper hand once again: ſo that the Iſraelites loſt eighteen thouſand men more, and thereupon forſook their camp thorow fear, and retired to Bethel, which was not far off. The day after they faſted, and beſought God (by the mediation of Phinees the High Prieſt) that it would pleaſe him to appeaſe his wrath againſt them, and that contenting himſelf with the two overthrows which he had ſent them, he would now D at laſt both give them his aſſiſtance and valour to encounter their enemies. All which God promiſed them by the prophecy of Phinees. Whereupon they divided their Army into two parts, and laid the one in ambuſh near the City. In the mean time (whilſt the other half that made head againſt the Benjamites, retired themſelves, to the intent their Enemies ſhould aſſault them) the Benjamites ſuddenly iſſued, and ſet upon them that orderly retired, and the more they retired (on purpoſe to draw them the further from the Town) the more eagerly the Enemy inſiſted: ſo that all thoſe who through age and weakneſs were left in the City, ſallied out to be companions and ſharers in the future prey. But when they were drawn far enough from the City, the Hebrews ſtayed, made head, and fought againſt them. Then gave they a ſign to thoſe that were E in ambuſh, as was accorded amongſt them who ſuddenly iſſuing out together, ruſhed upon their Enemies with a great cry. The Benjamites themſelves ſo ſurprized, knew not what to do, but retiring into certain Barricadoes, defended themſelves with Arrows; but all of them were ſlain except ſix hundred: who making head, and cloſely filletted and embattelled together, thruſt themſelves deſperately into the midſt of their Enemies, and by this means eſcaped to the neighboring mountains, where they encamped. All the reſt to the number of 25. thouſand, or thereabouts were ſlain. And the Iſraelites burned Giba utterly, and ſlew both the women and children. They excerciſed no leſs ſeverity on the other Cities of Benjamin (ſo much were they tranſported with fury.) And for that Jabes (a City of Gilead) would not joyn with them in Battel againſt the F Benjamites, they ſent twelve thouſand choſen men out of their companies to deſtroy the ſame, who ſlew all thoſe that bear Arms, with their Wives and Children, except four hundred Virgins. So much rage and fury had they conceived upon the accident that chanced to this woman, againſt the Benjamites for provoking them unto Arms: which fury being ſomewhat appeaſed, they were toucht with compaſſion ſeeing themſelves deprived of one Tribe: wherefore though they thought they had juſtly puniſhed them for having offended againſt the Laws of God; yet they appointed a faſt and ſent to recall thoſe ſix hundred that were fled, and that held a certain Rock in the Deſart which is called Rhos. These meſſengers repreſented to them the concern that the other Tribes had for their misfortune; but ſince there was no remedy, they ought to bear it with patience G and reunite themſelves to thoſe of their Nation, to the end to hinder the utter ruin of their Tribe; that they reſtor'd to them all their Lands and would give them back their Cattel. gave them in Marriage thoſe 400 Virgins of Jabes : and for the reſt (which were

by an oath, that none of them ſhould match his Daughter with any of the Tribe withall, by reaſon it was made in wrath, and with precipitation; alledging further, that it would not be diſpleaſing to God, if they might ſave a Tribe which was in danger to be utterly extinct: That Perjury is a great ſin, not when inforced by neceſſity, but when practiſed with an intent to do evil. But when the Elders declar'd that they abhor'd the mention of Perjury, there roſe up a certain Man amongſt them, that ſaid he knew a way I whereby without breach of oath the Benjamites might have Wives. And being commanded by the Senate to declare the ſame, We have a cuſtom thrice every year (ſaid he) to aſſemble and keep a Feaſt at Siloe, and for Companions we have both our Wives and Daughters : as many of theſe as they can catch, let the Benjamites lay hold of, without reproof, (neither being inhibited nor encouraged by us) and if their Fathers ſhall be diſpleaſed therewith, and ſhall require revenge, we will ſay that they are in the fault who have negligently kept their Daughters, and that we ought not too much to whet our wrath againſt the Benjamites, for that we had too much already uſed the ſame toward them. This advice was approved by all, and it was decreed, That it was lawful for the Benjamites to ſeize, and violently take to themſelves Wives amongſt them. Now when the Feaſt was at hand, the 200 Benjamites (of K whom we have ſpoken) came two by two, and three by three, and lay in ambuſh near the City (amongſt the Vines and other Thickets, and cloſe places, in which they might hide themſelves,) to ſurprize the Damſels; who, ſuſpecting nothing, ſecurely and pleaſantly wantoned on their way: but the young men breaking from the ambuſh, laid hold of them (being ſcattered and divided here and there;) and after they had married them, they departed home to labour their Land, and began to ſtudy anew how to recover their former proſperity. Thus the Tribe of Benjamin (which was well nigh utterly exterminated) was preſerved, by the wiſdom of the Iſraelites : and it flouriſhed and increaſed in a little time, as well in number of men, as in all other things.

The Iſraelites about this time having forgotten the exerciſe of Arms, and being onely not for that they were afraid for their own Eſtates, but to the intent that defeating the Hebrews with ſome memorable overthrow, they might more ſecurely inhabit their Cities for the future. They brought into the Field a great number of Footmen, and Chariots, and they drew Aſchalon and Acharon (two Cities within the lot of Judah) into their Confederacy, and divers other Cities of the Champion Countrey: ſo that the Tribe of Dan was driven into the Mountains, having no place in the Champion where they might peaceably inhabit; and (for that they were neither able to recover their Lands from M the enemy, nor had ſufficient habitation for their number of Men) they ſent five Men of their Tribe into the Champion Countrey, to ſee if they could find any place that were fit and convenient for them to eſtabliſh and fix their Colonies. Theſe Men Travelled a days journey not far from the Mountain of Libanus, and lower than the ſources of Jordan, bordering upon the great Plain of the City of Sidon. In which place (having obſerved that the Land was good and fertile in all ſorts of fruits) they made their report to their People, who Travelling thither with their Army, built a City in that place called Dan (by the name of the ſon of Jacob ſo called, and of their own Tribe.) Many adverſities befell the Iſraelites from that time forwards, both by reaſon they were unexerciſed in Travel, and for that they contemned Piety. For having once forſaken the N to their own appetites: ſo that they polluted themſelves with thoſe Vices which were moſt uſual amongſt the Canaanites.

A Certain man of the Tribe of Juda called Cenez, a man of underſtanding and courage, was advertiſed by a voice from Heaven, that he ſhould not permit the Iſraelites to be reduced into ſo extreme neceſſity, without taking care for them, but adventure himſelf to ſet them at liberty. Upon which calling to him ſome few whom he knew C generous enough to fear no danger when a yoke ſo inſupportable was to be ſhaken of; They began with cutting the throats of the Aſſyrian Gariſon which Schiſart had placed over them. This firſt ſucceſs, caus'd the number of his followers to increaſe a little more and more, ſo that in a little time they ſeemed ſufficient to equal the enemy in open field: whereupon encountring him in one battel, they overcame him and recovered their liberty; and the reſt of the ſcattered and confuſed Army retired toward Euphrates. How the people were made ſubject to the Moabites, and how by Jodes they were exempt from ſervitude.

AFter his death (the government being void) the affairs of the Iſraelites began again to fall to ruine, and the rather, for that they neither yielded due honour to God, or obedience to the Laws: whence it came to paſs, that Eglon King of the Moabites (ſeeing the diſorder of their policy) made war againſt them, and defeated them many times. And for that he was a Prince of greater puiſſance than any of his Predeceſſors, he weakened their Forces, ſo that he conſtrained them to pay tribute.

Eglon King of the Moabites conquereth the Iſraelites.

This man removing his Court to Jericho, and proud of his Victories, omitted no E means whereby he might vex and moleſt the people: ſo that they lived for the ſpace of 18. years in great miſery. But God (being moved with compaſſion of their calamities) delivered them from their intolerable thraldom after this manner: Jodes the Son of Gera of the Tribe of Benjamin (a young man, endow'd with Valour of mind and ſtrength of body to attempt any worthy action) dwelt at Jericho. This man inſinuated himſelf into Eglons familiarity; and by preſents courted him in ſuch ſort, that he was well beloved and eſteemed amongſt all the Courtiers, and had frequent acceſs to the Palace. It chanced one day that bearing certain Preſents unto the King (attended by two of his Houſhold ſervants) he ſecretly hid a Dagger under his cloaths, at ſuch time as he entred in to the King. Now it was Summer and Mid-day likewiſe; and the watch was F grown more careleſs, partly by reaſon of the heat, and partly for that the guard were at their dinner. The young man therefore offering his preſents unto Eglon (who at that time refreſhed himſelf in a certain Summer Chamber) began to diſcourſe with him. Now they were both alone (by reaſon that the King reſolving to talk familiarly with Jodes, had ſent away his Guard) but Jodes fearing, leſt he might miſs his blow as the King ſate upon the Throne, deſired him to riſe, telling him that he had a Dream to relate to him by the commandment of God. Whereat he rejoycing, aroſe from his ſeat; and Jodes ſtab'd him to the heart: and leaving the Poynard ſticking in the wound, locked the door after him, and eſcaped; For the Guard ſuppoſing the King laid down to reſt, let him paſs. But Jodes giving private notice hereof to the Iſraelites, offered G himſelf to be their leader for recovery of their liberty: and they willingly accepting thereof, preſently took Arms, and ſent Trumpets about to ſummon the reſt of their Countreymen. fell again into their former impiety and diſobedience; and before they had ſufficiently ſhaken off the ſervitude of the Moabites, were ſubjected to Jabin King of the Canaanites. K This Man kept his imperial reſidence at Aſar (a City ſituate on the Lake Sachonites) and had in his Pay Thirty thouſand Foot, and Ten thouſand Horſe: and beſides theſe, he had Three thouſand warlike Chariots. This great Army was commanded by Siſara, (an eminent Man amongſt the Kings Favourites) who encountring with the Iſraelites, brought their affairs into ſo deſperate an eſtate, that they willingly for their own ſecurity accepted ſervitude, and paid Tribute, whereunto they were forced, almoſt for the ſpace of Twenty years, not daring to lift up their heads (all which fell upon them by the Will of God, to puniſh the too great contumacy and ingratitude of that Nation.) At the end of which time, repenting themſelves, and acknowledging that the cauſe of their Calamities, (proceeded from the contempt of Gods Laws) they repaired L to a certain Propheteſs, called Debora, (which name in the Hebrew Tongue ſignifieth a Bee) beſeeching her, that by her prayers ſhe would endeavor to move God to mercy, and not ſuffer them ſo to be oppreſſed by the Canaanites. God (being inclined by her prayers) granted them help, and appointed Barac to be their Governor (a Man of the Tribe of Nepthali, whoſe name ſignifieth Lightning.) Debora ſending for Barac, commanded him to chooſe out Ten thouſand Men, and lead them forth againſt the Enemy; ſaying, that their number were ſufficient, ſince God had promis'd him the Victory. But Barac denying to undertake the Government, except ſhe alſo would join in the adminiſtration of it with him; ſhe mov'd with anger, reply'd, Art thou not aſham'd to ſurrender the dignity which God hath given thee, to a Woman? Well, I will not refuſe it. Whereupon M levying Ten thouſand Men, they pitched their Tents near the Mountain of Thebor. Siſara at that time (according as the King had commanded him) preſently marched out to meet them, and encamped not far from them. But Barac, and the reſt of the Iſraelites, (being terrified with the multitude of the Enemies) was encouraged by Debora, who commanded them that very day to undertake the Battel; aſſuring them, that the Victory ſhould be theirs, and that God would aſſiſt them. Whereupon they charged the Enemy, and there ſuddenly fell a ſtorm of Rain, mixed with Hail, which the wind drove againſt the faces of the Canaanites, and took away their ſight, rendring thoſe that carried Darts, and ſerved with the Sling, unprofitable in the ſervice; likewiſe thoſe that were heavily arm'd, having their hands benum'd with cold, could not wield their Swords. N But the Tempeſt beating on the backs of the Iſraelites, not only gave them leſs offence, but made them alſo more courageous (as being a manifeſt ſign of Gods favour and preſence.) Whereupon diſaraying and breaking thorow their Enemies Battel, they made a great ſlaughter of them; ſo that part of them fell by the weapons of the Iſraelites, the reſt were over-run by their own Horſemen and Chariots. Siſara ſeeing his Soldiers turn their backs, leap'd from his Chariot, and fled away, till at laſt he arrived at the Tent of a woman of Cenetis, called Jael, whom he deſired to conceal and hide him. She admitted him; and when he deſired drink, ſhe gave him ſowre milk; which when he had largely drunk, he fell aſleep. The Woman ſeeing him in this condition, took a Mallet,

They continued theſe their incurſions for the ſpace of ſeven years, and compelled the Iſraelites to forſake the Champain, and flie to the Mountains: where digging themſelves Caves and Houſes under the earth, they kept ſecretly hidden all which they had reſerved, from the fury of the Enemy. For the Midianites having taken their Harveſt in the Summer time, permitted them to Till their Lands in the Winter, to the intent they might gather the fruits of their labour afterwards. How Gideon delivered the Iſraelites.

ABout that time as Gideon (the Son of Joas, one of the chiefeſt of the Tribe of Manaſſes) was grinding ſome ſheafs of Corn, which he had ſecretly conveyed into his Preſs, for he durſt not do it openly, for fear of the Enemy. An Angel appeared to him in the form of a young man, and told him, That he was happy, and beloved of God. D 'Tis a fair ſign, anſwer'd Gideon, when I am forc't to uſe a Preſs inſtead of a Grange. The Angel exhorted him to be of good courage, and to endeavor to recover his Countries liberty. Gideon anſwer'd, That it was impoſſible, by reaſon that the Tribe whereof he was deſcended, had very few Men in it; and that he was too young and incapable of affairs of that conſequence. God will ſupply all theſe defects, ſaid the Angel, and under thy conduct will give the Iſraelites victory. Theſe things Gideon communicated to certain young men, who willingly believing the Oracle, anſwer'd, That for the preſent they had Ten thouſand Soldiers in readineſs, to attempt any thing for their liberty. But God appeared to Gideon in a dream, and told him, That Men being ſo vain, that they are willing to owe nothing but to themſelves, and attribute their Victories to their own ſtrength, inſtead of at- E tributing them to his aſſiſtance; he would make them know, that 'twas to him alone that they were indebted for them. To which end he commanded him, That about the mid-time of the day, at ſuch time as the heat was moſt vehement, he ſhould conduct his Army to the River, and there diligently obſerve thoſe that bowed themſelves to drink, which he might eſteem for Men of Valor; but all thoſe that drank haſtily, and with noiſe, ſhould be marked as Men timerous, and afraid of the Enemy. Gideon did as God commanded: and there were found but Three hundred Men that lifted water to their mouths with their hands, without fear and trouble. God commanded him to aſſail the Enemy with thoſe Three hundred, promiſing to give him the Victory. At this time were they encamped upon the Bank of Jordan, ready to paſs the Ford the next Morning. But Gidcon F was troubled, by reaſon that God had bid him aſſail the Enemy by night. But God willing to deliver him of his fear, commanded him to take one of his Soldiers with him, and go to the Camp of the Midianites, to ſee what paſs'd there. He obeyed; and for his better aſſurance, took with him one of his ſervants. Now as he drew nigh a certain Tent, he perceived, that they that were within the ſame, were awake, and heard one of them with a loud voice tell his Companion the dream which that Night he had had, which was thus: He thought he ſaw a Barley Cake (which lookt as if not worth the taking up) it rowled thorow all the Camp, and firſt overthrew the Kings Tent, and afterwards the Tents of all his Soldiers. This dream (anſwer'd his Companion) ſignifi'd the loſs of our whole Army. The reaſon is, that of all ſorts of Corn, Barley is G moſt contemptible: and amongſt all the Nations of Aſia, there are not at this day any People more contemned than the Iſraelites; and in this reſpect, they reſemble Barley. Now you know that they have gather'd Troops, and form'd ſome deſign under the conſpeedily prepared themſelves at his Command, being encourag'd by ſo happy a preſage to attempt any thing. About the latter Watch of the Night, Gideon led forth his Army, and divided it into three Bands, and in every Band he put an Hundred Men: all of theſe bare in their hands empty Pots, in which were hidden burning Torches, in ſuch ſort, that the Enemy could not diſcover them, when they ſallied out. Moreover, they bare Rams Horns in their right hands, which they uſed in ſtead of Trumpets. The Enemies Camp took up much ground, by reaſon they had a great number of Camels; and though diſtri- I buted by Nations, were all of them comprehended in one incloſure.

Ver 16. 17 22. Gideon with 300 attempteth the fight.

The Hebrews having had inſtructions from their Captain what to do, at ſuch time as they approached near their Enemies, and the ſign of the Battel being given, they ſounded their Horns, and broke their Pots, and with their flaming Lights, fell into the Enemies Camp, crying, Victory, Victory, by the aſſiſtance of God, and the ſtrength of Gideon. Trouble and Fear ſurprized the ſleeping Enemy, for this action was in the Night-time, and God diſpoſed all things to this iſſue, that few of them fell by the Hebrews Sword, but they themſelves ſlew one another in great numbers (by reaſon that they were different in language.) For confuſedly encountring one another, they Maſſacred all they met, ſup-poſing them Enemies. When the Rumor of this Slaughter, and Gideon's Victory, came K to the ears of the reſt of the Iſraelites, they armed themſelves, and purſued and overtook the Enemy, (being intangled in certain places, unpaſſable, through many Brooks) ſo that being environed on every ſide, moſt of them were put to the Sword; amongſt which, were two Kings, Oreb and Zeb. Two other Kings, Zebé and Hezerbun eſcap'd, with their Soldiers, to the number of Eighteen thouſand, and encamped not far from the Iſraelites: but Gideon was no ways aſtoniſhed hereat, but charging them valiantly with his whole Army, he defeated all the Troops, and took the Kings captive. There dyed in the two Battels of the Madianites, and Arabians their Allies, almoſt Sixſcore thouſand. The Hebrews alſo took an ineſtimable prey of Gold, Silver, Apparel, Camels, and Horſes. But Gideon returning to Ephraim, put to death the two Kings of the Madi- L anites which he had taken. Nevertheleſs, the Tribe of Ephraim being diſpleaſed with his happy execution, reſolved to make War againſt him; accuſing him, that he had not made them privy to his deſign againſt the Enemy. But Gideon being a prudent Man, and endowed with all kind of virtue, gave them this modeſt anſwer, That he had not proceeded by his own direction, but by the command of God: notwithſtanding, that the Victory was no leſs theirs, than his, or thoſe of his Followers, that atchieved the Enterpriſe. With theſe his words appeaſing their wrath, he did no leſs ſervice to the Hebrews by his prudence, than by his valor; delivering them from a Civil War, whereinto they had fallen, if his diſcretion had not prevented it. This Tribe was puniſhed for this outrage offered to ſo noble a Perſonage, as we will declare hereafter in due place. Gideon deſiring to M diſcharge himſelf of the Government, was conſtrain'd to continue the ſame, and ruled the Iſraelites for the ſpace of Forty years, doing juſtice to every one that deſir'd it at his hands, with ſo great integrity, ability and wiſdom, that the People never fail'd to confirm the judgments which he pronounc'd, becauſe none could be more equitable. He dyed when he was very old, and was buried in the Countrey of Ephraim.

Abimelech killeth 69 of his Brethren.

G*ideon* had ſeventy lawful Sons begotten on divers Wives, and one Baſtard by his Concubine Druma, called Abimelech: who, after the deceaſe of his Father, retired to Shechem, where his Mother was born. There (aſſiſted with money, by his Mothers kindred, and backed by men reſolute, and fit for all bad actions) he returned to his fathers houſe, where he ſlew all his brethren (except Jotham, who by good hap ſaved himſelf by flight.) When he had once uſurp'd the Government, he ruled all things according B to his luſt, and neglected the Ordinances and preſcripts of Law, hating all thoſe that in any ſort were maintainers of equity.

à v. 8. ad 25. Jotham, by an alluſion, upbraideth the Shechemites of their ingratitude towards Gideon.

One day whilſt there was a ſolemn feaſt held at Shechem, (whereunto the whole people were uſually wont to reſort) Jotham his Brother (who as we ſaid, ſaved himſelf by flight) getting up the Mountain of Garizim, which over-hangeth the City of Shechem, with a loud voice (that might eaſily be over-heard by the people) and in a general ſilence of the whole multitude, deſir'd them to hear him a few words; and he told them, that in times paſt the Trees were accuſtomed articulately to ſpeak after the manner of men; and that (in a certain aſſembly, wherein they were to conſult of their government) they deſir'd the Fig-tree to accept the ſoveraignty over them; which when it refuſed and pleaded in its own behalf, that it C was contented with that honour which they gave it for its fruit, and deſired no more.

The counſel of the Trees, in choice of a King.

The Trees ceaſed not to ſeek another Prince, and offer'd that honour to the Vine; which in as many words as the Fig-tree, refuſed the ſame; the like did the Olive-tree. At laſt they addreſs'd to the Bramble, (whoſe wood is good onely to burn) which anſwered, If you unfainedly deſire me for your King, repoſe your ſelves under my ſhadow; but if it be only in mockery, and to deceive me, there ſhall a fire iſſue from me, and conſume you. Theſe things (ſaid Jotham*) I report to you, not to move you to laughter, but for that, you (having received many benefits at the hands of* Gideon*) ſuffer* Abimelech, who in ſpirit differeth nothing from fire, to uſurp the Government, after the ſlaughter of my brethren. When he had ſpoken after this manner, he departed, and for three years lived hid amongſt D the mountains, flying the fury of Abimelech.

v. 23, &c. The Shechemites baniſh Abimelech.

After ſome time the Shechemites (being moved with compaſſion and juſt revenge, of the murther committed upon the Sons of Gideon) drove Abimelech out of their City, and the whole Tribe. Whereupon he reſolved to do ſome miſchief both to the City and the Citizens. And though their Vintage was at hand, yet they durſt not go forth to gather the fruit, for fear of him. It hapned at that time a certain great man called Gaal, arrived their with a Troop of Soldiers, and his kindred: The Shechemites deſired him to grant them a Guard, whileſt they gathered their Harveſt; which requeſt of theirs being granted by Gaal, they iſſued out with their Forces and ſecurely brought in their fruits: and feaſting one with another in companies, they were ſo bold as to ſcoff at Abimelech, and the chief of his E Followers. And ſome of thoſe ſtrangers, that came into their City to their aſſiſtance, ſurpriſed, by Ambuſcado, divers of Abimelechs people, and ſlew them.

v. 34. Abimelechs practice againſt the Shechemites.

But Zebul one of the Shechemites, and Abimelechs Hoſt, ſignified unto him by a meſſenger, how Gaal incited the people againſt him; and he counſelled him to lye in wait for him, near about the City, promiſing to bring Gaal thither, and ſo he might eaſily revenge himſelf of the injury which his enemy had offered him, and reconcile himſelf to the people again. When Abimelech had choſen a place fit to lie in ambuſh, and Gaal with Zebul, careleſly walked in the ſuburbs, Gaal ſuddenly eſpying certain Armed men coming towards him, cried out to Zebul, That he had diſcovered the enemy; Zebul replied, that it was nothing but the ſhadow of Rocks. But Gaal drawing nearer them, and ſeeing apparently who they were, anſwered F Zebul, That they were no ſhadows but ambuſhes of men. Zebul replyed, Doſt thou not object cowardize to Abimelech? Why therefore ſheweſt thou not thy great valour, in fighting with him?

v. 39, 40, 41. Gaal put to flight by Abimelech, is baniſhed out of Shechem.

Gaal confuſedly amazed, bore the firſt charge of the Soldiers of Abimelech: in which conflict, ſome of his Followers were ſlain, and he himſelf fled into the City, giving example to the reſt to follow him. Hereupon Zebul laboured, that Gaal might be expelled out of the City; accuſing him of cowardize in his encounter with the Soldiers of Abimelech. Now, when Abimelech had afterwards gotten certain intelligence, that the Shechemites would go out again to gather their Vintage, he laid an ambuſh near to the City. And no ſooner were they come forth, but a third part of his Troops ſurprized the Gates, to cut off their return; the reſt ran after thoſe that were ſcattered here and G there: ſo that there was a great ſlaughter on every ſide; and the City was ruined to the very foundations, and they ſowed Salt upon the ruines thereof.

v. 45. Shechem taken and ſacked, and razed to the ground.

upon a ſtrong Rock, whereon they incamped. But as ſoon as Abimelech had notice of H their intention, he haſted thither with his forces, and environed the place with faggots of dry wood, (carrying them thither in his own perſon, and encouraging thereby thoſe of his Army to do the like) ſo that the Rock was incontinently compaſſed with wood:

ſo that none of them were ſaved, but all periſhed, with their Wives and Children, to the number of fifteen hundred men, beſides many of the weaker ſort. This calamity hapned to the Shechemites, who were worthy of compaſſion if they had not deſerv'd this puniſhment for their ingratitude towards ſo upright a Judge, and ſo gracious a Benefactor.
Abimelech cool'd the courage of the Iſraelites, by this treatment of the Shechemites, and gave ſufficient teſtimony that he aſpired higher, and would never terminate I his ambition till he had totally ſubdu'd them. He therefore led forth his Army againſt the Thebans and their City, which he took: in the Town there was a great Tower, whither all the people had retired themſelves, and as he prepared to beſiege the ſame, and approached near the Gates, a certain woman caſt a piece of a Milſtone at him, which hit him on the head, and made him fall to the ground. Abimelech feeling that he was wounded to death, commanded his Armor-bearer to diſpatch him, that it might not be reported that he died by the hand of a woman. The man did as he was commanded, and ſo Abimelech ſuffer'd the puniſhment of the cruelty he had committed againſt his Brethren, and the tyranny executed upon the Shechemites; according as Jotham had foretold.

As ſoon as Abimelech was ſlain, all the Army diſperſed, and returned to their K dwellings; and Jair the Galeadite, of the Tribe of Manaſſes, took upon him the Government.
Amongſt other felicities of this man, theſe were of greateſt note, that he was rich, and had thirty Valiant Sons, all prudent men, and of chief rank in the Country of Galaad. After he had governed the people twenty years, he died when he was very old, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a City of Galaad. From this time forward the to be neglected: Whence it came to paſs, that the Ammonites and Philiſtines deſtroyed all their Countrey with a great Army, and made themſelves maſters of the Land on this ſide Jordan; and ſo much were they heartned, that they preſſed further, to poſſeſs the other ſide of the River, and conquer the ſame. Whereupon the Hebrews being brought to L more moderation by theſe their adverſities, had recourſe unto God by prayers and ſacrifices; deſiring that it would pleaſe him to moderate his wrath, if he would not wholly appeaſe it, ſtay his heavy hand over them. This ſubmiſſion of theirs prevailed with God, who promis'd to aſſiſt them. Whilſt therefore the Ammonites led their Army into Galaad, they of the Countrey aroſe to meet and fight with them; being deſtitute of a Governour to conduct them. Now their was a certain man called Jeptha, of great eſtimation, as well for the virtue of his anceſtors, as his own valour; for he had a conſiderable body of men in his own ſervice. To him they ſent a meſſenger, deſiring him objected againſt them, that they had abandoned him, when his Brothers did him open wrong by driving him out of their Family, by reaſon he was not their Brother by he ſame Mother, but begotten on a woman which their Father had entertained for is Paramour; and it was to revenge this injury that he had lived in Galaad, receiving all oſe into wages which came unto him, of what place ſoever. But after they had preſthdhm, and ſworn to him, he joyned his Troops with them, and became their General: and ſpeedily providing whatſoever was neceſſary, he encamped near Maſpha, and ſent Ambaſſadors to the Ammonites, accuſing them for invading a Countrey that belonged not to them. They on the contrary blamed the Iſraelites, for that they coming out it. Jeptha anſwered, that they had no reaſon to accuſe their Anceſtors in reſpect of Amorrhea: but rather they were beholden to them, for that they had permitted them to enjoy the Countrey of Ammon; it being in Moſes power to have conquered the ſame.

In a word, they were reſolved not to forſake the Countrey which God had given them, and they had held in their poſſeſſion for the ſpace of three hundred years; and would defend againſt them by dint of Sword. With theſe words diſmiſſed he the Ambaſſadours of the Ammonites: Then Jeptha prayed to God that it would pleaſe him to grant him ſervitude

A ſervitude which they had endured for the ſpace of eighteen years. But as he returned homeward, he fell into ſuch an inconvenience, as was no ways anſwerable to his noble actions. For the firſt perſon he met as he returned home, was his only Daughter (a Virgin of eighteen years) who came out to meet him: Whereupon melting into tears, he began to check her, for that ſo haſtily ſhe had come forth to meet him, by reaſon he had vow'd the firſt thing he met with to God. But this accident was no ways diſpleaſing to the Virgin; who with a wounderful conſtancy anſwered her Father, that a death which had for its cauſe the victory of her Father, and the liberty of her Countrey, could not but be very acceptable to her: and that the only favour ſhe deſired of him, was, that he would pleaſe to grant her two months, before ſhe were ſacrificed, to the end ſhe might B lament her youth, with her companions: and that after that term, her father might acquit himſelf of the vow which he had made. Jeptha granted her the time ſhe had limited: which being expired, he ſacrificed his Daughter for a burnt-offering. Which oblation of his, was neither conformable to the Law, nor deſired by God. But he was reſolved to accompliſh his vow, without conſidering what judgment men might make of it.

He anſwered, that being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both he and his were aſſailed by War; C and had, beſides that, alſo been deſired to give them their aſſiſtance; whereunto they had anſwered very faintly, and being requeſted would not be preſent. Then he told them, that, that which they undertook, was unlawful, wicked, in that not daring to encounter the Enemy, they made no ſcruple to ſet upon their Brethren and Friends; and he threatned them, that if they reſtrained not themſelves, he would (by the aſſiſtance of God) be revenged on them. But theſe words of his were both neglected and deſpiſed, ſo that he was forced to Arm himſelf againſt them, and with an Hoſt of men ſent from Galaad, he made a great ſlaughter, partly in purſuing thoſe that fled, partly alſo in preventing their paſſage who fled to Jordan: the number of the ſlain, amounted to about forty thouſand. After Jeptha had governed ſix years, he deceaſed, and was buryed D in Sebei, in the place where he was born, and the Countrey of Galaad. After his death Ibzan took upon him the Government. He loved his Wife very paſſionately, and not without ſome jealouſie: on a day as the woman was there by her ſelf, an Angel of God appeared to her in form of a young man of incomprable beauty and ſhape; and told her that he came from God, to inform her that ſhe ſhould be the mother of a child, perfectly beautiful; and whoſe ſtrength ſhould be ſo extraordinary, that as ſoon as he was enter'd into the vigour of youth he ſhould G humble the Philiſtines; but God forbad her to cut his Hair, and commanded likewiſe that he ſhould taſte no other drink but water; and after he had ſaid thus, he departed. Trouble and Fear ſurprized the ſleeping Enemy, for this action was in the Night-time, and God diſpoſed all things to this iſſue, that few of them fell by the Hebrews Sword, but they themſelves ſlew one another in great numbers (by reaſon that they were different in language.) For confuſedly encountring one another, they Maſſacred all they met, ſuppoſing them Enemies. When the Rumor of this Slaughter, and Gideon's Victory, came K to the ears of the reſt of the Iſraelites, they armed themſelves, and purſued and overtook the Enemy, (being intangled in certain places, unpaſſable, through many Brooks) ſo that being environed on every ſide, moſt of them were put to the Sword; amongſt which, were two Kings, Oreb and Zeb. Two other Kings, Zebé and Hezerbun eſcap'd, with their Soldiers, to the number of Eighteen thouſand, and encamped not far from the Iſraelites: but Gideon was no ways aſtoniſhed hereat, but charging them valiantly with his whole Army, he defeated all the Troops, and took the Kings captive. There dyed in the two Battels of the Madianites, and Arabians their Allies, almoſt Sixſcore thouſand. The Hebrews alſo took an ineſtimable prey of Gold, Silver, Apparel, Camels, and Horſes. But Gideon returning to Ephraim, put to death the two Kings of the Madianites which he had taken. Neverthele ſs, the Tribe of Ephraim being diſpleaſed with L his happy execution, reſolved to make War againſt him; accuſing him, that he had not made them privy to his deſign againſt the Enemy. But Gideon being a prudent Man, and endowed with all kind of virtue, gave them this modeſt anſwer, That he had not proceeded by his own direction, but by the command of God: notwithſtanding, that the Victory was no leſs theirs, than his, or thoſe of his Followers, that atchieved the Enterpriſe. With theſe his words appeaſing their wrath, he did no leſs ſervice to the Hebrews by his prudence, than by his valor; delivering them from a Civil War, whereinto they had fallen, if his diſcretion had not prevented it. This Tribe was puniſhed for this outrage offered to ſo noble a Perſonage, as we will declare hereafter in due place. Gideon deſiring to M diſcharge himſelf of the Government, was conſtrain'd to continue the ſame, and ruled the Iſraelites for the ſpace of Forty years, doing juſtice to every one that deſir'd it at his hands, with ſo great integrity, ability and wiſdom, that the People never fail'd to confirm the judgments which he pronounc'd, becauſe none could be more equitable. He dyed when he was very old, and was buried in the Countrey of Ephraim.

CHAP. IX.

How ſome of Gideons Succeſſors made War with the Nations round about them.

GIdeon had ſeventy lawful Sons begotten on divers Wives, and one Baſtard by his Concubine Druma, called Abimelech: who, after the deceaſe of his Father, retired to Shechem, where his Mother was born. There (aſſiſted with money, by his Mothers kindred, and backed by men reſolute, and fit for all bad actions) he returned to his fathers houſe, where he ſlew all his brethren (except Jotham, who by good hap ſaved himſelf by flight.) When he had once uſurp'd the Government, he ruled all things according B to his luſt, and neglected the Ordinances and preſcripts of Law, hating all thoſe that in any ſort were maintainers of equity. One day whilſt there was a ſolemn feaſt held at Shechem, (whereunto the whole people were uſually wont to reſort) Jotham his Brother (who as we ſaid, ſaved himſelf by flight) getting up the Mountain of Garizim, which over-hangeth the City of Shechem, with a loud voice (that might eaſily be overheard by the people) and in a general ſilence of the whole multitude, deſir'd them to hear him a few words; and he told them, that in times paſt the Trees were accuſtomed articulately to ſpeak after the manner of men; and that (in a certain aſſembly, wherein they were to conſult of their government) they deſir'd the Fig-tree to accept the ſoveraignty over them; which when it refuſed and pleaded in its own behalf, that it C was contented with that honour which they gave it for its fruit, and deſired no more.
The Trees ceaſed not to ſeek another Prince, and offer'd that honour to the Vine; which in as many words as the Fig-tree, refuſed the ſame; the like did the Olive-tree. At laſt they addreſs'd to the Bramble, (whoſe wood is good onely to burn) which anſwered, *If you unfainedly deſire me for your King, repoſe your ſelves under my ſhadow; but if it be only in mockery, and to deceive me, there ſhall a fire iſſue from me, and conſume you.
Theſe things (ſaid* Jotham*) I report to you, not to move you to laughter, but for that, you (having received many benefits at the hands of* Gideon*) ſuffer* Abimelech, who in ſpirit differeth nothing from fire, to uſurp the Government, after the ſlaughter of my brethren.
When he had ſpoken after this manner, he departed, and for three years lived hid amongſt D the mountains, flying the fury of Abimelech. After ſome time the Shechemites (being moved with compaſſion and juſt revenge, of the murther committed upon the Sons of Gideon) drove Abimelech out of their City, and the whole Tribe. Whereupon he reſolved to do ſome miſchief both to the City and the Citizens. And though their Vintage was at hand, yet they durſt not go forth to gather the fruit, for fear of him.
It hapned at that time a certain great man called Gaal, arrived their with a Troop of Soldiers, and his kindred: The Shechemites deſired him to grant them a Guard, whileſt they gathered their Harveſt; which requeſt of theirs being granted by Gaal, they iſſued out with their Forces and ſecurely brought in their fruits: and feaſting one with another in companies, they were ſo bold as to ſcoff at Abimelech, and the chief of his E Followers. And ſome of thoſe ſtrangers, that came into their City to their aſſiſtance, ſurpriſed, by Ambuſcado, divers of Abimelechs people, and ſlew them. But Zebul one of the Shechemites, and Abimelechs Hoſt, ſignified unto him by a meſſenger, how Gaal incited the people againſt him; and he counſelled him to lye in wait for him, near about the City, promiſing to bring Gaal thither, and ſo he might eaſily revenge himſelf of the injury which his enemy had offered him, and reconcile himſelf to the people again. When Abimelech had choſen a place fit to lie in ambuſh, and Gaal with Zebul, careleſly walked in the ſuburbs, Gaal ſuddenly eſpying certain Armed men coming towards him, cried out to Zebul, That he had diſcovered the enemy; Zebul replied, that it was nothing but the ſhadow of Rocks. But Gaal drawing nearer them, and ſeeing apparently who they were, anſwered F Zebul, That they were no ſhadows but ambuſhes of men. Zebul replyed, Doſt thou not object cowardize to Abimelech? Why therefore ſheweſt thou not thy great valour, in fighting with him?
Gaal confuſedly amazed, bore the firſt charge of the Soldiers of Abimelech: in which conflict, ſome of his Followers were ſlain, and he himſelf fled into the City, giving example to the reſt to follow him. Hereupon Zebul laboured, that Gaal might be expelled out of the City; accuſing him of cowardize in his encounter with the Soldiers of Abimelech. Now, when Abimelech had afterwards gotten certain intelligence, that the Shechemites would go out again to gather their Vintage, he laid an ambuſh near to the City. And no ſooner were they come forth, but a third part of his Troops ſurprized the Gates, to cut off their return; the reſt ran after thoſe that were ſcattered here and G there: ſo that there was a great ſlaughter on every ſide; and the City was ruined to the very foundations, and they ſowed Salt upon the ruines thereof. But they that eſcaped thorow the Countrey, and had avoided the danger, aſſembled to fortifie themſelves upon a ſtrong Rock, whereon they incamped. But as ſoon as Abimelech had notice of H their intention, he haſted thither with his forces, and environed the place with faggots of dry wood, (carrying them thither in his own perſon, and encouraging thereby thoſe of his Army to do the like) ſo that the Rock was incontinently compaſſed with wood: whereunto he ſet fire round about, and in an inſtant it flamed, and burnt vehemently; ſo that none of them were ſaved, but all periſhed, with their Wives and Children, to the number of fifteen hundred men, beſides many of the weaker ſort. This calamity hapned to the Shechemites, who were worthy of compaſſion if they had not deſerv'd this puniſhment for their ingratitude towards ſo upright a Judge, and ſo gracious a Benefactor. Abimelech cool'd the courage of the Iſraelites, by this treatment of the Shechemites, and gave ſufficient teſtimony that he aſpired higher, and would never terminate I his ambition till he had totally ſubdu'd them. He therefore led forth his Army againſt the Thebans and their City, which he took: in the Town there was a great Tower, whither all the people had retired themſelves, and as he prepared to beſiege the ſame, and approached near the Gates, a certain woman caſt a piece of a Milſtone at him, which hit him on the head, and made him fall to the ground.

Abimelech feeling that he was wounded to death, commanded his Armor-bearer to diſpatch him, that it might not be reported that he died by the hand of a woman. The man did as he was commanded, and ſo Abimelech ſuffer'd the puniſhment of the cruelty he had committed againſt his Brethren, and the tyranny executed upon the Shechemites; according as Jotham had foretold. As ſoon as Abimelech was ſlain, all the Army diſperſed, and returned to their K dwellings; and Jair the Galeadite, of the Tribe of Manaſſes, took upon him the Government. Amongſt other felicities of this man, theſe were of greateſt note, that he was rich, and had thirty Valiant Sons, all prudent men, and of chief rank in the Country of Galaad. After he had governed the people twenty years, he died when he was very old, and was honourably intombed in Chamon a City of Galaad.

Thola reigned 23. years. After him Jair 22. years. Judg. 102, 34.

From this time forward the policy and eſtate of the Hebrews grew more and more diſordered, and the Laws began to be neglected: Whence it came to paſs, that the Ammonites and Philiſtines deſtroyed all their Countrey with a great Army, and made themſelves maſters of the Land on this ſide Jordan; and ſo much were they heartned, that they preſſed further, to poſſeſs the other ſide of the River, and conquer the ſame. Whereupon the Hebrews being brought to L more moderation by theſe their adverſities, had recourſe unto God by prayers and ſacrifices; deſiring that it would pleaſe him to moderate his wrath, if he would not wholly appeaſe it, ſtay his heavy hand over them. This ſubmiſſion of theirs prevailed with God, who promis'd to aſſiſt them. Whilſt therefore the Ammonites led their Army into Galaad, they of the Countrey aroſe to meet and fight with them; being deſtitute of a Governour to conduct them. Now their was a certain man called Jeptha, of great eſtimation, as well for the virtue of his anceſtors, as his own valour; for he had a conſiderable body of men in his own ſervice.

v. 5 6,7,8. The Iſraelites oppreſſed by the Ammonites and Philiſtines

To him they ſent a meſſenger, deſiring him to aſſiſt them; and promiſing him, that he ſhould continue in the Government during the term of his life. But he was nothing moved with this requeſt, but reproachfully M objected againſt them, that they had abandoned him, when his Brothers did him open wrong by driving him out of their Family, by reaſon he was not their Brother by the ſame Mother, but begotten on a woman which their Father had entertained for his Paramour; and it was to revenge this injury that he had lived in Galaad, receiving all oſe into wages which came unto him, of what place ſoever. But after they had preſthdhm, and ſworn to him, he joyned his Troops with them, and became their General: and ſpeedily providing whatſoever was neceſſary, he encamped near Maſpha, and ſent Ambaſſadors to the Ammonites, accuſing them for invading a Countrey that belonged not to them. They on the contrary blamed the Iſraelites, for that they coming out of Egypt had uſurpt that Countrey from his Anceſtors, who were lawful Lords of N it.

Judg. 11, v. 5, 6,9 10,11. Jeptha is created the Judge of Iſrael.

Jeptha anſwered, that they had no reaſon to accuſe their Anceſtors in reſpect of Amorrhaea: but rather they were beholden to them, for that they had permitted them to enjoy the Countrey of Ammon; it being in Moſes power to have conquered the ſame. In a word, they were reſolved not to forſake the Countrey which God had given them, and they had held in their poſſeſſion for the ſpace of three hundred years; and would defend againſt them by dint of Sword. With theſe words diſmiſſed he the Ambaſſadours of the Ammonites: Then Jeptha prayed to God that it would pleaſe him to grant him victory: and he made a vow that if he returned to his houſe in ſafety, he would Sacrifice the firſt living creature that he ſhould meet with at his return.

v. 30, ad 40. Jeptha maketh a vow.

After this, encountring the Enemy, he defeated and purſued him, killing thoſe that fled continually till he came O to the City of Minnith. Then entring the Countrey of the Ammonites, he deſtroyed divers Cities, and carried away a great booty, and ſo delivered his Nation from the

A ſervitude which they had endured for the ſpace of eighteen years. But as he returned homeward, he fell into ſuch an inconvenience, as was no ways anſwerable to his noble actions. For the firſt perſon he met as he returned home, was his only Daughter (a Virgin of eighteen years) who came out to meet him: Whereupon melting into tears, he began to check her, for that ſo haſtily ſhe had come forth to meet him, by reaſon he had vow'd the firſt thing he met with to God. But this accident was no ways diſpleaſing to the Virgin; who with a wounderful conſtancy anſwered her Father, that a death which had for its cauſe the victory of her Father, and the liberty of her Countrey, could not but be very acceptable to her: and that the only favour ſhe deſired of him, was; that he would pleaſe to grant her two months, before ſhe were ſacrificed, to the end ſhe might B lament her youth, with her companions: and that after that term, her father might acquit himſelf of the vow which he had made. Jeptha granted her the time ſhe had limited: which being expired, he ſacrificed his Daughter for a burnt-offering. Which oblation of his, was neither conformable to the Law, nor deſired by God. But he was reſolved to accompliſh his vow, without conſidering what judgment men might make of it.

C. 12. 1,2. &c. The Ephraimites are incenſed againſt Jeptha. Judg. 12.

The Tribe of Ephraim hearing of his victories, declared War againſt him, by reaſon he had not communicated to them his enterpriſe againſt the Ammonites, that he might have the prey, and the honour of the enterpriſe to himſelf. He anſwered, that being of his kindred, they could not be ignorant, that both he and his were aſſailed by War; C and had, beſides that, alſo been deſired to give them their aſſiſtance; whereunto they had anſwered very faintly, and being requeſted would not be preſent. Then he told them, that, that which they undertook, was unlawful, wicked, in that not daring to encounter the Enemy, they made no ſcruple to ſet upon their Brethren and Friends; and he threatned them, that if they reſtrained not themſelves, he would (by the aſſiſtance of God) be revenged on them. But theſe words of his were both neglected and deſpiſed, ſo that he was forced to Arm himſelf againſt them, and with an Hoſt of men ſent from Galaad, he made a great ſlaughter, partly in purſuing thoſe that fled, partly alſo in preventing their paſſage who fled to Jordan: the number of the ſlain, amounted to about forty thouſand. After Jeptha had governed ſix years, he deceaſed, and was buryed D in Sebei, in the place where he was born, and the Countrey of Galaad. After his death Ibzan took upon him the Government. He was of the Tribe of Juda, of the City of Bethleem, and had ſixty Children; thirty males and thirty females, which he left all alive and married: he died when he was very old, without performing any thing worthy of memory, during the ſpace of his ſeven years Government: he was buried in his own Countrey. In like manner Elon a Zabulonite his ſucceſſor did nothing memorable and during the term of ten years wherein he governed. Abdon the Son of Elon, and (of the Tribe of Ephraim of the City of Pharathon) was declared Soveraign Judge after Elon, and is renowned only for his felicity in his Children; the ſtate of the Iſraelites being in peace, ſo that he exploited nothing worthy glory: he had forty Sons, who E had thirty Grand-children; and rode accompanied with theſe ſeventy, who were all of them expert Horſe-men. He left them all alive, and died when he was very old, and was magnificently buried in Pharathon.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 13. al. 10.

v. 3,4, 5. The Angel foretelleth Samſons birth.

After his death, the Philiſtines prevailed over the Iſraelites, and exacted tribute from them for the ſpace of forty years. From which miſery they were deliver'd F after this manner. Manoah an excellent man, and chief of the Tribe of Dan, without exception, had a Wife moſt famous for her beauty, and excelling all others of that time; yet had he no Children by her, whereat he was very much grieved, and made his continual prayers unto God (and eſpecially when they were retired to a Countrey houſe which they had near the City) that it would pleaſe him to give him a lawful heir. He loved his Wife very paſſionately, and not without ſome jealouſie: on a day as the woman was there by her ſelf, an Angel of God appeared to her in form of a young man of incomparable beauty and ſhape; and told her that he came from God, to inform her that ſhe ſhould be the mother of a child, perfectly beautiful; and whoſe ſtrength ſhould be ſo extraordinary, that as ſoon as he was enter'd into the vigour of youth he ſhould G humble the Philiſtines; but God forbad her to cut his Hair, and commanded likewiſe that he ſhould taſte no other drink but water; and after he had ſaid thus, he departed. As ſoon as her Husband returned home again, ſhe told him all that the Angel had ſaid unto her, and ſo extol'd the beauty and good grace of the young meſſenger, who appeared H unto her, that theſe praiſes encreaſed his jealouſie; which ſhe perceiving, and being no leſs chaſt, than fair, prayed to God once more to ſend his Angel, that her Husband might ſee him, and be cur'd of his unjuſt ſuſpition. Her prayer was heard, and the Angel preſented himſelf again to the woman (being apart from her Husband.) But ſhe deſired him to ſtay till ſhe called her Husband: which when ſhe had obtained, ſhe went and fetched Manoah, who notwithſtanding was not delivered from his ſuſpicion; but deſired him to relate to him all that he had ſignified to his Wife. The Angel anſwered, that it ſufficed that ſhe knew it: whereupon he asked him what he was, to the end that when his Son ſhould be born, he might give him preſents, and thanks. The Angel anſwered, that he had no need thereof, by reaſon that he had not brought the good news of the birth of his I Son for any neceſſity that he had. Manoah entreated him to ſtay and receive ſome token of kindneſs; but he would not conſent. Finally, being inſtantly preſſed to abide and receive ſome gift; Manoah kill'd a Kid, and commanded his Wife to roaſt it. And when all things were in readineſs, the Angel commanded them to lay the Bread and Fleſh upon a Rock without diſhes: which being done, he touched the Fleſh with a wand which he had in his hand, and ſuddenly a flaming fire conſumed both the Bread, and Fleſh; and the Angel was ſeen to aſcend up into Heaven in the Smoke as it were in a Chariot. Manoah was in great fear leſt ſome inconvenience ſhould happen unto him, becauſe they had ſeen God: but his Wife comforted him, aſſuring that God had appeared to them for their good. Shortly after ſhe became big with child, and obſerved K all that had been commanded her; and when the Infant was born, ſhe called his name Samſon (which is as much as to ſay, ſtrong.) who ſoon grew to be of excellent beauty both of mind and body, wearing his Hair unſhorn, and uſing ſobriety in his diet, whereby he gave ſome ſigns of what had been foretold concerning him.

v. 19, 20. Samſon killeth certain Aſcalonites, and his Wife marrieth with another.

It hapned on a day that there was a ſolemnity celebrated in Thamna, a City of the Philiſtines, whither Samſon reſorted with his Father and Mother; and being ſurpriſed with love of one of the Damſels of that place, he deſired his Father and Mother that this maid might be given him in marriage: which they refuſed, alledging that ſhe was not of the ſame Lineage, and that God would provide him a match to the good and profit of his Nation: but in the end he prevailed ſo much, that he eſpouſed the Maiden. L Now as he ordinarily walked to her Parents, it happened one day, that being diſarmed, he met with a Lion upon the way, whom he graſped and ſtrangled with his hands; and having ſlain him, he caſt the body of the Beaſt into a Wood not far diſtant from the high way. Another day returning in like ſort to the Damſel, he found a ſwarm of Bees which made their honey in the breaſt of the ſame Beaſt, and he took three hony-combs which he carried with other preſents to his intended Wife. After this, he invited the Thamnites to the celebration of his marriage, who (for that they feared his ſtrength) under colour of doing him honour,) choſe out thirty ſtrong and valiant young men, to be ſeemingly his companions, but in effect his Guardians, to the end he might not attempt any commotion, in the midſt of the feſtivity. Samſon ſaid M to his companions I will propoſe a queſtion to you, which if you can reſolve, I will give each of you a fine Linnen Shirt, and other veſtments. They being very deſirous both to be reputed wiſe, and to gain the reward propoſed, preſſed him to propound his queſtion: which he did in theſe terms; He that devoureth all, hath been himſelf the food of others; and how terrible ſoever he was, this food hath been no leſs ſweet and agreeable. They employ'd three dayes to find out the ſenſe thereof, but they could not: and therefore they deſired Samſon's Spouſe to get the ſecret from her Husband, and diſcloſe the ſame to them; which if ſhe refuſed, they threatned to burn her to death. Samſon at the firſt (notwithſtanding her flatteries and ſollicitations) denied to tell it her: at laſt ſhe urged him ſo inſtantly, and ſhed ſo many tears (telling him that if he N did not expound the queſtion to her, ſhe would take it for a certain ſign that he hated her) that at laſt he told her he had ſlain a Lion, and how in him he had found the three honey-Combs which he brought to her: and (not diſtruſting either fraud or guile) he related the whole ſtory to her, and ſhe afterwards reported the ſame to thoſe that had employed her in the diſcovery. When the ſeventh day was come, and the queſtion was to be decided, the young men aſſembled themſelves together about Sun-ſet; and ſaid, There is nothing more terrible than a Lion, nor any thing more pleaſant to taſte, than honey: Whereunto Samſon replied, you ſhould adde that there is not any thing more dangerous than a woman; for ſhe it is that hath betray'd me, and reported my words to you. Notwithſtanding all this, he delivered that which he had promiſed them, out of the booty, O which he had taken from certain Aſcalonites, whom he encountred upon the way. But he would not pardon his Wife; and the woman (ſeeing her ſelf deſpiſed) married one

A one of his friends, who had, in his behalf firſt ſollicited the marriage. Samſon (being more incenſed by this injury) reſolved to revenge himſelf both on her and the whole Nation: For which cauſe in the Summer time (when the Corn was ready to be reapt) he took three hundred Foxes, to whoſe tayls having faſtned flaming Torches, he drove them into the Philiſtines fields of Corn; conſuming by this means all their hope of Harveſt.
The Philiſtines underſtanding that Samſon had done this, and conceiving the reaſon that induced him to it, ſent a party of Soldiers to Thamna, and burnt this woman alive with all her kindred, as the cauſe of the loſs that had hapned to them. After Samſon had ſlain divers Philiſtines in the Countrey, he went and dwelt at Etam (which is a ſtrong Rock in the Tribe of Juda.) For which cauſe the Philiſtines aſſailed that Tribe, who B repreſented to them that there was no reaſon why they ſhould ſuffer for thoſe offences which were committed by Samſon, and eſpecially ſince they payed them tribute. The Philiſtines replied, that unleſs they would be maintainers of his act of unjuſtice, they muſt deliver Samſon unto them. They (deſirous that the Philiſtines might have no cauſe of quarrel againſt them) came to the Rock to the number of 3000 men, and there blamed Samſon for thoſe actions which he had done againſt the Philiſtines, becauſe they were a people that might endamage the whole Nation of the Hebrews: concluding that they came to take, and deliver him into the Philiſtines hands, and praying him to ſubmit himſelf voluntarily to that their reſolution. Samſon made them ſwear that they would do him no other injury, but deliver him only to their enemies; which done, he deſcended C from the Rock, ſurrendring himſelf to the hands of thoſe of Juda, who bound him with two cords, and led him away to deliver him to the Philiſtines. Now being arrived in a certain place, which at this preſent is called the Jaw (by reaſon of what hapned there at that time) and approaching near the Philiſtines Camp; which ſhouted for joy that they had faithfully executed that which they deſired of them: Samſon brake his bonds, and catching up the jaw of an Aſſe which he found at his feet, and falling upon the Philiſtines, he ſlew and beat down to the number of almoſt two thouſand, and put all the reſt to flight. This extraordinary and unparalleld exploit ſo puffed up Samſons heart, that he forgat to attribute it to the aſſiſtance of God, but aſcribed the ſame to his own ſtrength. But it was not long before he was puniſht for his ingratitude: For being ſeized D with exceeding thirſt, and finding himſelf faint, he acknowledged and confeſſed that mans force was nothing but weakneſs, and that all ought to be aſcribed to God: whom he prayed that he would not be diſpleaſed with what he had ſpoken, nor deliver him to his Enemies, though he had deſerved it, but aſſiſt him in the preſent danger. God heard his prayers, and cauſed a pleaſent Fountain to ſpring from the foot of a Rock: for which cauſe Samſon called the place Maxilla or Jaw, which name continueth even unto this day.
After this battel, Samſon ſet light by the Philiſtines, and went to Gaza, where he ſojourned in an Inne. The Governors of the City underſtanding his arrival, ſet men to keep the Gates, to the end he might not depart without their knowledge. But Samſon not ignorant of what they intended againſt him; aroſe about midnight and took up the E Gates, with the hinges and locks, and all the furniture of the ſame; and laying them on his ſhoulders, carried them to the Mountain above Hebron. Not long after, he tranſgreſſed the Laws of his Fathers, and corrupted his wayes and manner of living, conforming himſelf to the faſhions of the Gentiles, which was the ſource and cauſe of all his ruine. For he was taken with the love of a Philiſtine Cortiſan called Dalila: As ſoon as the Governours of the Philiſtines knew it, they by promiſes wrought ſo with her, that they perſuaded her to get out of him wherein his force conſiſted, and what the cauſe was that he could not be conquered by his Enemies. Dalila to accompliſh their deſire, made uſe of faſting and flattery, praiſing his great actions, and thence taking occaſion to ask him whence his ſo prodigious ſtrength proceeded. But F Samſon well judging on what deſign ſhe askt him this queſtion anſwered her: that if he were tied with ſeven Vine-branches young and pliant, he ſhould become the weakeſt of all men. She believed him, and having given notice thereof to the Governours of the Philiſtines, who ſent to her houſe certain Soldiers, theſe, when he was drunk and aſleep, bound him as ſtrongly as they could; Dalila ſuddenly waking him, told him that certain Soldiers were at hand to take him: but Samſon brake the bonds of Vine-branches, and prepared himſelf to reſiſt the aſſaults of thoſe that lay in wait for him. The woman fruſtrate of her hope, not long after took an opportunity, to complain of him, that diſtruſting her love and conſtancy, he had concealed that from her which ſhe moſt deſired to know, as if ſhe were unable to conceal that which might any wayes concern the G fortune and ſafety of her beloved: But he deceived her the ſecond time, and told her that if he were tyed with ſeven cords, he ſhould loſe all his ſtrength. Which when ſhe had done, and found a contrary iſſue to her expectation, the third time Samſon told

Which when ſhe had done, and found a contrary iſſue to her expectation, the third time Samſon told her, that if ſhe pleeted his hair with a fillet, he ſhould be weakned: and having experimented that alſo, ſhe found that it was falſe. Finally, ſhe preſs'd and conjured him in ſuch earneſtneſs, that being no longer able to avoid the ill that attended him, at laſt he condeſcended to gratifie her, and ſaid to her after this manner: It hath pleaſed God to have care over me, and as I was by his ſpecial providence brought into the World, ſo by his command I nouriſh this hair, for God hath forbiden me to cut the ſame; and my force ſhall endure as long as theſe locks ſhall endure and grow. Which when ſhe underſtood, ſhe ſhaved off his hair whilſt he ſlept, and betrayed him to his Enemies, whoſe forces at that time he was too feeble to reſiſt; and they plucked out his eyes, and led him away bound. Some time after the Philiſtines celebrated a publick feaſt (wherein the Princes and Peers banquetted and entertained one another in a ſpacious place, the cover whereof was upheld by two pillars; and Samſon was ſent for, and brought to the feaſt, to the end they might mock him in the midſt of their mirth; his hair was then grown again; and this generous ſpirit taking it more grievouſly than all other evils which he endured, to be treated with ſuch indignity, and not to be able to revenge himſelf on thoſe that thus injuriouſly uſed him; feign'd himſelf very weak, and deſired the Boy that led him, to let him approach and lean upon the ſaid Pillars. As ſoon therefore as he got hold on them, he ſhook them in ſuch ſort, that they were over-turned, and the houſe fell upon thoſe that were therein, who all periſhed to he number of three thouſand men: with theſe alſo died Samſon, who finiſhed his dayes in this ſort, after he had commanded over Iſrael for the ſpace of twenty years. He was a man of great vertue, ſtrength and magnanimity; even to his latter hour, was fatal to the Philiſtines: And whereas he was allured and beſotted by a woman, 'tis an effect of the infirmity of humane nature, which is prone to ſuch faults: in all other things, we cannot too much admire his vertue. His Kindred took his body and buried it in Saraſa his Countrey, in the Sepulchre of his Anceſtors.

How the ſons of Eli the High Prieſt were ſlain in battel by the Philiſtines.

Ruth 1. v. 1, ad 6. Hedio & Ruffinus, Chap. 14. A famine in the days of Eli.

AFter the deceaſe of Samſon, Eli the High Prieſt took upon him the Government of the Iſraelites. During his time there was a great Famine; and Elimelech unable to endure the miſery thereof, came from Bethlehem a City of the Tribe of Juda, to inhabit in the Countrey of Moab, bringing with him Naomi his Wife, and Chilon and Maalon his Sons, whom he had by her. Now when his affairs had fallen out with as fortunate ſucceſs as could be deſired, he married his Sons to certain Daughters of the Moabites, Chilon to Orpha, and Maalon to Ruth. After ten years, Elimelech and his Sons died. By which affliction Naomi being caſt into great ſorrow, and deſtitute of their company, whoſe dear familiarity ſhe had preferred before the love of her Countrey: chang'd her reſolution (according to thoſe occurrences that had happened to her) and determined to return to her Friends, by reaſon ſhe had received intelligence, that her Countrey at that time was in better eſtate than when ſhe left it. Her Daughters in-law would not endure to be ſeparated from her; but would needs accommpany her: but ſhe wiſhing them a more happy marriage than that which they enjoyed with her Sons, and proſperity in all other things, and proteſting unto them that ſhe had no ability to do them good; ſhe deſired them to ſtay in that place, and not by following their wretched Mother-in-law in an uncertain event, loſe the certain pleaſure and peaceable fruition of their Countrey. Theſe her perſuaſions took effect with Orpha: but Ruth (reſolved in no ſort to forſake her,) attended on her Mother-in-law as future companion of whatſoever fortune ſhould befall her. Now when both of them arrived in Bethlehem, (where, as we ſhall ſee afterwards) Boos Abimelechs Kinſman entertained them in his houſe: the Citizens called her by the name of Naomi, but ſhe ſaid, that they ſhould rather call her Mara (for Naomi in the Hebrew tongue ſignifies felicities, and Mara bitterneſs.) When it was Harveſt time, Ruth by the permiſſion of her Mother, went out into the fields to glean Corn for their ſuſtenance: and it fortuned that ſhe met in the field with Boos, who came thither likewiſe not long after; and who beholding her, inquired of the chief Reaper touching this young woman. He, having a little before underſtood her condition, declared it to his Maſter Boos, commending her for the good affection which ſhe bare her mother-in-law, and for the memory ſhe had of her deceaſed Son, whom Ruth had married; wiſhed her all good fortune: and not ſuffering her to glean, he permitted her to reap and to gather all that which ſhe might; commanded the Maſter-reaper

What Corn Ruth gathered ſhe reſerved for her Mother-in-law, and came home at night and brought her the ſheaves. In like manner Naomi reſerved a portion of certain victuals for her, which in way of kindneſs her neighbours had ſent her. At her return, Ruth reported to her all the words that Boos had ſaid unto her: and Naomi gave her to underſtand that Boos was her kinſman, and ſo good a man that it might be hoped he would take ſome care of her. So Ruth went again with Boos handmaids to gather her gleanings; and certain dayes after (about the time that they threſhed Barley) Boos came to his Farm, and ſlept on the floor: which when Naomi underſtood, ſhe thought it B might be for the advantage of the young woman, to lye and ſleep at his feet; and accordingly ſhe adviſed her to endevour it. Ruth (that made a conſcience to contradict her mother-in-law in whatſoever ſhe commanded her) went very gently and lay at his feet; and upon her firſt arrival Boos perceived nothing (becauſe he was faſt a ſleep:) but when he awaked about midnight, and felt ſome body lying at his feet, he demanded who it was: whereupon ſhe told him her name; requeſting him as her maſter, that he would permit her to repoſe in that place for that time. He enquired no further, but let her ſleep; but early in the morning, before the Servants began their work, he commanded her to ariſe, and to take as much Barley with her as ſhe could bear, to the end ſhe might return to her mother-in-law, before that any man perceived that ſhe had ſlept C in that place (becauſe it is wiſdome to avoid occaſions of talk, eſpecially in a thing of this importance.) Touching the reſt, (ſaid he) the matter ſtandeth thus: Thou haſt a kinſman (ſaid he) that is neerer thee in blood than I am; thou muſt enquire of him if it be his pleaſure to take thee to Wife: if he ſaith that he liketh thee, thou muſt then neceſſarily ſubmit unto him: but if he refuſe thee, I will take thee for my Wiſe according as the Law obligeth me. Now when ſhe had reported theſe news unto her mother-in-law, ſhe took courage and conceived hope that Boos would not abandon them. Boos came to the City about noon, and called a Council of the Elders, and ſent for Ruth and his kinſman, to whom he ſpake thus: Doeſt thou not poſſeſs the heretage of Abimelech? Yes, anſwered he, I am ſeized thereof by the right of proximity, according to D Law. Boos replied, Thou muſt not (ſaith he) only obſerve the Laws in part; but thou muſt preciſely execute them all. Behold here a young woman, Abimelech's Widow, whom it behoveth thee to marry according to the Law, if thou wilt inherit poſſeſſions. But the man ſurrendred to Boos, not only the poſſeſſions, but alſo the woman; by reaſon that Boos was allied alſo to thoſe that were dead, and eſpecially for that the ſaid kinſman had already both Wife and Children. Boos therefore (having firſt taken the Magiſtrates to witneſs) called for the woman, and willed her to draw near her kinſman, and to unlooſe his ſhoe, and ſtrike him on the face (according as the Law had ordained;) which done, Boos eſpouſed Ruth, by whom (about a year after) he had a Son, which Naomi brought up; and called his name Obed, in hope he would aſſiſt in her old age: E (for Obed in the Hebrew tongue ſignifies aſſiſtance.) Obed begat Jeſſe, and Jeſſe begat David, who was King, and who left the Realm to his ſucceſſors for one and twenty Generations. I was obliged to relate theſe things touching Ruth, becauſe I would declare how God, by his Soveragin power, raiſes whom he pleaſes from obſcurity, to the higheſt dignity, as he did David, whoſe original I have ſhewed you.

v. 13. Boos begetteth Obed Davids grand father upon Ruth.

The affairs of the Hebrews were at this time in very poor eſtate, and they entred into a new War againſt the Philiſtines upon this occaſion: The High Prieſt Eli had two Sons Ophni and Phinees. They, againſt all right and law (offering outrages to men, and committing impieties againſt God) ſuffered no ſin to eſcape them; for they were not contented to receive what belonged to them, but they took what did not. And as women F came to the Tabernacle for devotion, they abuſed them, raviſhing ſome againſt their wills, and corrupting others by preſents; and thus they exerciſed a manifeſt and licentious tyranny; their Father was much diſpleaſed with them for theſe crimes as well as the people. And God having declared to Eli, and the Prophet Samuel (who then was very young) what vengeance ſhould fall upon Eli's Children, he mourned over them, as if they had been already dead. But I will firſt ſpeak ſomething concerning this Prophet Samuel, and afterwards of the Children of Eli, and what calamity fell upon all the Hebrew Nation. Elcana was a Levite of mean condition, living in Ramath, a part of Ephraim: he had married two Wives, the one called Anna, the other Phenenna: by Phenenna he had children; yet he loved Anna very intirely, although ſhe was barren. G One day when Elcana with his Wives were at Silo, where the Tabernacle of God was (as we have before declared) to the intent to offer Sacrifice in that place: during the feſtival he diſtributed the portion of his meat to his Wives and Children: Anna (be-lament with her ſelf, becauſe ſhe was without iſſue, and could not be eaſed with all conſolation which her Husband gave her. She went into the Tabernacle to beſeech God that it would pleaſe him to make her a Mother; and made a vow that if he gave her a Son, he ſhould be dedicated to the ſervice of God. And for that ſhe employed much time in making her prayers, the High Prieſt Eli, who ſate before the Tabernacle, commanded her to depart from thence, ſuppoſing that ſhe had drunk too much Wine: but after ſhe told him that ſhe drank nothing but Water, and that (being oppreſſed with grief) ſhe was come to the Tabernacle, to beſeech God that it would pleaſe him to grant her Children; he exhorted her to be of good courage, and aſſured her that God had heard her prayers: whereupon ſhe returned to her Husband full of good hope, and I took her repaſt with joy. They returned to their own houſe, ſhe began to be big with child, and at laſt ſhe brought forth a Son, whom ſhe called Samuel (that is to ſay, requeſted of God.) Afterwards they returned to offer Sacrifice, and give thanks to God for the birth of the child, which God had given them, and to bring their tenths.

Hannah, remembring the vow ſhe had made, delivered the child into the hands of Eli, and conſecrated him to God to be his Prophſie. For which cauſe they ſuffered his Hair to grow, and he drank nothing but Water, and he was brought up in the Temple.

1 Sam.3. v.3. ad 10.

Elkanah had by Hannah other Sons alſo and three Daughters. As ſoon as Samuel had attained to the age of twelve years, he began to prophecy. For on a certain night whileſt he ſlept, God called him by his name: and he ſuppoſing that it was the High Prieſt that K called him, came unto him; but Eli told him, that he had not called him. The ſame thing was done three times: and then Eli, eaſily judging what it was; ſaid to him, Samuel, I neither called thee now, nor before, but it is God that calleth thee, anſwer him therefore, and ſay, Here I am, ready to obey. He heard the voice of God once more; and he anſwered, behold me O Lord, what wouldſt thou have me to do? I am ready to obey. Then God anſwered, ſaying: Go and tell the Iſraelites that ſo great a calamity ſhall fall upon them that no tongue can expreſs it. The Sons of Eli ſhall die in one day, and the Prieſt hood ſhall be removed from his Family to that of Eleazar: For, Eli hath loved his Children more than my ſervice, and hath drawn my curſe upon them.

C.v.11. ad 21. God foreſheweth Samuel of the death of Eli and his Sons.

Samuel fearing to overwhelm the old man with ſorrow, would not diſcloſe L this oracle to him; but Eli conſtrained him to tell it, and it made him the more aſſured of the iminent death of his Sons. And becauſe all the things which Samuel pro-pheſied came to paſs, his reputation increaſed daily more and more.

C.4. v.4. The Hebrews bring the Ark into the battel.

At that time the Philiſtines (leading out their Army againſt the Iſraelites) incamped near the City of Amphec, and for that the Hebrews were negligent to oppoſe them, they advanced further into the Countrey. So at length in a fight with their Enemies, the Philiſtines got the upper hand and ſlew 4000 Hebrews, and purſued thoſe that fled even to their own Tents. The fear of the Hebrews after this overthrow was ſo great, that they ſent to the Council of the Elders and the High Prieſt, praying them to bring the Ark of God with them; to the end that having it preſent with them, they might give M battel and overcome their Enemies. But they conſidered not, that he that had pronounced the ſentence of their calamity againſt them, was greater than the Ark, which deſerved not to be reverenced but for him. The Ark was brought, and the Sons of Eli attended it, whom their Father expreſly commanded, that if it fell out that the Ark was taken, they ſhould never more come into his preſence. Now Phinees executed the office of the High Prieſt by the permiſſion of his Father, by reaſon he was very aged.

v.5. ad 11.

v.11. 12. &c. Ophni and Phinces with thirty thouſand are ſlain, and the Ark is ſurpriſed by the Enemy.

The Hebrews upon the arrival of the Ark conceived great hope that they ſhould have the upper hand of their Enemies. The Philiſtines likewiſe were diſmayed, fearing the preſence of the ſame: but the event was not anſwerable to the one or to the others expectation. For when they joyned battel, the victory which the Hebrews hoped N would be theirs, fell to the Philiſtines; and the loſs which the Philiſtines feared, fell upon the Hebrews, who at laſt perceived that they had repoſed their confidence on the Arke in vain. For as ſoon as their Enemies gave them the firſt charge, they turned their backs, and loſt about thirty thouſand men, amongſt whom were the two Sons of the High Prieſt; and the Ark was taken and carried away by the Enemy.

CHAP. I.

How the Philiſtines, compelled by Peſtilence and Famine, ſent back the Ark of the Covenant unto the Hebrews.

1 Sam. 5. 1, ad 6. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 1. The ſacred Ark is carried into the Temple of Dagon. They of Azot are horribly plagued for taking away the Ark. Mice devour the fruit of the Countrey of Azot.

1 Sam. 5. 2, ad finem.

AFter the Philiſtines had got the Victory over the Hebrews, and taken the ſacred Ark, (as we have before declared) they brought it, with their other ſpoils, to the City of Azot, and plac'd it in manner of a Trophee in the Temple of Dagon their Idol. But the next day after, when early in the Morning they entred into the Temple to adore their god, they found him fallen from that Baſe or Pillar that ſuſtained him, and lying along the ground, his face upward, before the Ark; whereat being much moved, they took him up, and faſtened him in his former place: and when they came often thither, and always found him proſtrate, and, as it were, adoring before the Ark, a great fear and perturbation invaded the whole People. At length, a grievous Plague not only ranged in the City of Azot, but alſo ſeized on all the Inhabitants of the Countrey. For the People being ſuddenly taken with the Flux, dyed in great Torment, and ſome of them vomited up their Bowels being corrupted and corroded with the diſeaſe. Beſides this, the whole Land ſwarmed with Mice, which deſtroying all things, neither ſpared the Corn, nor any other Fruit. The Azotians being afflicted with theſe Calamities, and unable longer to endure the ſame, underſtood that the Ark was the cauſe thereof, and that neither the Victory, or the taking of the ſame, had any ways procured their advantage. They therefore ſent to the Aſcalonites, deſiring them to receive the Ark into their City; who willingly condeſcending to their Embaſſage and Demand, received the Ark, and were preſently plagued with the ſame ſickneſſes which the Azotians had ſuffered. For together with the Ark the calamities alſo were tranſported; for which cauſe it was likewiſe ſent from this place to another, where it remained but a little while; for the Inhabitants of the place being afflicted with the ſame Maladies which the other endured, ſent it to the Neighbor Cities: and after this ſort the Ark was conveyed to five Cities of the Philiſtines, (exacting as it were, by thoſe Plagues, a Tribute of every one in puniſhment of the Sacriledge which they committed, by retaining a thing conſecrated to God. At laſt, wearied with ſo many evils, and made examples unto others not to entertain the Ark, which ſo grievouſly recompenſed thoſe that received the ſame, they conceiv'd there was no other way left, but to find out ſome good means to rid themſelves of it. When therefore the Princes of the five Cities, of Geth, Accaron, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Azot, were aſſembled, they con-

Conſultation about the Ark.

A ſulted amongſt themſelves what was beſt to be done; and firſt of all it was propos'd to ſend back the Ark to thoſe to whom it appertain'd, ſince God ſcourg'd with ſo many Plagues thoſe that receiv'd it into their Cities, to teſtifie his indignation for the taking of it, and to execute his vengeance of the Crime. But ſome ſaid, that this reſolution was unfit to be executed, denying that thoſe evils were to be imputed to the Captivity of the Ark, (whoſe power, if it were ſo great as they imagin'd, or if God had any care of the ſame, he would never have permitted it to have fallen into the hands of Men of a contrary Religion) and perſuading them to bear theſe Misfortunes with an equrl mind; and to account all theſe Calamities as effects of Nature, which at certain periods of times is wont to produce in Mens Bodies, in the Earth, and in Plants, and in other things B ſubject to her power, ſuch kind of alterations and changes. Others, more prudent and intelligent, propos'd a third way, which was, neither to ſend away the Ark, nor yet to retain it, but to offer to God in the name of the five Cities, five golden Statues in teſtimony of their gratitude, becauſe they had been preſerved by his favor from that Plague, from which, by humane remedies, it was impoſſible to eſcape; and to offer alſo as many golden Mice, like thoſe that had ſpoiled their Countrey. All theſe to be locked in a Cheſt, and laid upon the Ark; and the Ark to be plac't upon a new Cart made purpoſely, to which they ſhould yoke and tye two Kine that had new Calved, locking up their Calves from them, leſt they ſhould be an impediment to their Dams, and to the intent, that through the deſire to ſee their young, they might haſten the faſter. That done, that C driving the Chariot to a place that had three wayes, they ſhould ſuffer them to draw that way that they liſted; and if they took the way of the Hebrews, and travel'd towards their Countrey, then they ſhould aſſure themſelves that the Ark was the cauſe of their evils; but if they drew another way, let them (ſaid they) be driven back again, being moſt aſſured, that the Ark hath no ſuch virtue in it. This counſel was approved by every one of the Aſſembly, and preſently executed: having prepared all things, they brought the Chariot into a high way that lookt three ways, and leaving it there, returned back again.

CHAP. II.

The Victory of the Hebrews under the Conduct of Samuel.

1 Sam. 6. 12, ad 18.

NOW when the Kine took the way which led to the Iſraelites, and Travelled therein no otherwiſe than if ſome Men had led them, the Governors of the Philiſtines follow'd them, deſirous to underſtand whither they went, and in what place they would reſt. There is a Borough in the Tribe of Juda called Bethſama, towards which they drew: And although they had a very fair Plain before them, yet would they not Travel any further, but reſted the Chariot in that place. The Inhabitants came to the ſpectacle, and greatly rejoyced thereat: for although it was Summer-time, (wherein every one was buſied in gathering the fruits of the field) yet when they perceived the Ark, E they were ſo tranſported with joy, that they laid aſide the work which they had in hand, and run preſently to the Chariot. Then taking down the Ark and the Coffer, (wherein the Statues of Gold, and golden Rats were) they laid them upon a ſtone in the field; and after they had ſolemnly ſacrificed and feaſted together, they offer'd up both the Chariot and Kine for a Burnt-offering unto God. Which when the Philiſtines ſaw, they returned back into their own Countrey to carry the News. But Gods indignation and diſpleaſure was kindled againſt the Bethſamites: ſo that 70 of them were ſlain, becauſe they had dar'd to touch the Ark, and with prophane hands (not being Prieſts) attempted to ſuſtain it. The Inhabitants lamented their loſs, and mourned, for that their Countreymen were extinguiſhed by no common death, but by a puniſhment and plague ſent F from God. And acknowledging that they were unworthy that the Ark ſhould remain with them, they ſent Meſſengers to the Governors, and the reſt of the Hebrews, to let them underſtand that they had recovered the Ark out of the hands of the Philiſtines. Whereupon order was given to place the ſame in Cariathiarim, a City bordering upon the Bethſamites. In that place there dwelt a Man of the Race of the Levites, called Aminadab, (who had the honour and reputation of a good Man) to his Houſe the Ark was ſent, as to a place agreeable to God, becauſe there dwelt in the ſame a Man of ſo much virtue. His Sons had the charge of the Ark, and continued in that ſervice for the ſpace of 20 years, during which time it remained in Cariathiarim, after it had remained only four months with the Philiſtines. Whilſt the Ark was in the City of Cariathiarim, the G Iſraelites liv'd very Religiouſly, and offer'd to God Prayers and Sacrifices, ſhewing great devotion and forwardneſs in his ſervice. The Prophet Samuel perceiving this their good demeanor, and ſuppoſing it a fit occaſion to exhort them to liberty, and the benefits which attend the ſame; he accommodated his Speech to their Sentiments, and ſpake to them H to this effect: Ye men of Iſrael, ſince at this preſent the Philiſtines ceaſe not to moleſt you, and God beginneth to ſhew himſelf merciful and favourable to you: it behoveth you, not only to be touched with a deſire of recovering your liberty, but alſo to endeavor to recover the ſame in effect. Beware therefore, leſt through the corruption of your own manners, you make your ſelves unworthy thereof; and let each one of you endeavor to follow juſtice, and expelling all ſin out of your minds, convert your ſelves in all purity to God, and perſevere conſtantly in his ſervice. For in doing theſe things, you ſhall ſhortly obtain all felicity, and eſpecially a new liberty, and an aſſured victory againſt your Enemies; which neither by valor, or by the ſtrength of your bodies, or by the multitude of your Armies, you were able to obtain: for God hath not propoſed Rewards for theſe things, but for virtue and juſtice; and (truſt me) he will not deceive your I expectation, nor fail in the execution of his promiſes. When he had ſpoken after this manner, all the People teſtified their conſent, by acclamations, ſhewing the pleaſure they conceived by this diſcourſe, and promiſing to do that which ſhould be well-pleaſing to God. Whereupon Samuel aſſembled them the ſecond time in the City of Maſpha (which word ſignifieth conſpicuous) there they erected an Altar, and ſacrificed unto God; and after they had faſted for a days ſpace, they made publick Prayers to God. The Philiſtines being advertis'd of this Aſſembly, came ſuddenly with a great Army, and many Forces, intending to ſurprize the Hebrews, who neither expected nor were prepared for them. This ſudden approach of theirs much diſmayed the Hebrews: ſo that running to Samuel, they told him that their hearts failed them through fear, and their minds were troubled K with the remembrance of their former loſſes: for which cauſe they ought to hold themſelves in quiet, for fear leſt the Enemy ſhould employ his power againſt them. Thou haſt led us hither to pray, ſacrifice, and offer up our vows to God, and behold the Philiſtines are encamped near us, and ready to ſurprize us, naked and diſarmed: we have no other hope therefore of ſecurity, but what proceedeth from thee, and unleſs God, moved by thy prayers, give us means to eſcape their hands. Samuel, in way of anſwer, wiſhed them to be of good cheer, aſſuring them, that God would give them ſome teſtimony of his aſſiſtance: whereupon ſacrificing a ſucking Lamb in the name of the People, he pray'd God that it would pleaſe him to ſtretch forth his right hand for them in the Battel againſt the Philiſtines, and that he would not permit them to fall this ſecond L time into the Enemies hands. To theſe prayers of his God gave ear, and accepted their humble hearts and dutiful obſervance, being well-pleas'd with their offering, and promiſing them victory. Before the Sacrifice was wholly conſumed with the flame, and the Ceremonies performed, the Enemies ranged their Battels in the Iſraelites ſight, ſuppoſing the day already theirs, in that they had ſurprized the Jews unprepared for fight (as being aſſembled in that place to no ſuch end.) But the matter fell out contrary to what they expected; and had they been foretold the ſame, they would have ſcarcely believed it. For firſt by an effect of Gods Omnipotence, the Earth trembled under their feet, ſo that they could ſcarce ſtand, and ſome were ſuddenly ſwallowed up by the Earthquake, and a great Thunder was accompanied with ſuch ſcorching Lightnings, that their eyes being M dazled, and their hands blaſted therewith, they could not wield or manage their Weapons, and ſo were conſtrained to repoſe all their hope and confidence in flight. But Samuel ſeeing them thus diſmayed, ſuddenly ſet upon them, and killing many of them, ceaſed not to purſue the reſt as far as a place called Corre, where he erected a ſtone for a Trophee, or mark both of his own Victory, and the Enemies flight, and called the ſame the ſtrong Rock, to teſtifie that the People had received from God all the ſtrength which they had us'd in this famous Battel. The Philiſtines, after they had received this overthrow, ſallied not out any more againſt the Iſraelites; but remembring their fear, and the ſtrange accidents that befel them, they remained in peace, offering no further invaſion: for the confidence which the Philiſtines had before that time conceived againſt the Hebrews, was N removed into the hearts of the Hebrews ever after this Victory. Samuel continu'd the War againſt them, and ſlew a great number of them, and for ever abaſed their pride, taking from them that Countrey which formerly by Conqueſt they had cut off from the inheritance of the Jews; which Countrey extendeth from the Frontier of Geth, to the City of Accaron: and the reſt of the Canaanites at that time had peace with the Iſraelites.

CHAP. III.

Samuel unable, by reaſon of his old age, any longer to Govern the State, committeth it to the adminiſtration of his Sons.

The year of the World, 2871. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1093.

NOw when the Prophet Samuel had reduced the people to a good form of Government, he aſſigned them a City whither they might appeal, and decide thoſe differences that fell out amongſt them: and he travelled twice every year from City to City, to adminiſter juſtice unto them, and continued this policy for a long time. But when he found himſelf overburdened with years, and unapt to execute his ordinary B offices, ſurrendred the Government and Superintendency of the people to his Sons, the elder of whom was called Joel, and the younger Abiha; and he commanded that one of them ſhould make his ſeat of juſtice in Bethel, and the other reſide at Berſheba, dividing the people, and attributing each part to its particular Judge. Now it became manifeſt, by experience, that Children are not alwayes like their Fathers; but ſometimes of evil Parents there are good Children bred; as contrariwiſe at this time, of a good Father there were evil Sons. For forſaking the inſtructions of their Father, they followed a quite contrary courſe, and perverted juſtice with corruptions and rewards and ſurfeited in delights and pleaſures; in contempt of the will of God, and the inſtructions of their Father, who had no greater care, than that they ſhould acquit themſelves well of C their duty.

How the people, being diſpleaſed with the manners and government of the Sons of Samuel, demanded a King.

Toto vexata Toro jam membra quiescunt. Juv: Sat. xiii.

WHen therefore the people ſaw, that the Sons of the Prophet committed ſo many outrages againſt their Lawes, and Policy, they were greatly diſpleaſed, and had recourſe to their Father who dwelt in the City of Ramatha; where relating to him the miſdemeanours of his Sons, they deſired him that ſeeing his age rendred him unfit D to adminiſter the affairs of the Common Weal, he would nominate and elect a King over them, who might both command their Nation, and take vengeance on the Philiſtines for their many injuries. This demanded of the people, ſenſibly afflicted Samuels mind: for he extremely loved juſtice, and liked not Kingly government, being of opinion that Ariſtocracy was the happieſt of all governments. This matter ſo troubled him that, by reaſon of his care, he could neither eat nor ſleep; but all night long he toſſed and tumbled in his bed, through the great agitation of his mind. Whilſt this his indiſpoſition continued, God appeared to him, and comforted him, bidding him not to be grieved at what the people had required: that this injury, not only concerned him, but God himſelf whom they diſclaimed for their King and Governor. That this was not E the firſt time of their taking up this reſolution; that they had inclined to it from the day that they departed out of Egypt; but ere it be long (ſaid he) they ſhall repent themſelves, but too late, when the evil is paſt remedy; and they ſhall condemn themſelves for their ingratitude towards me, their God, and towards thee their Prophet. I will therefore that thou chuſe them a King, him that I ſhall nominate to thee, after thou haſt advertiſed them what evils they ſhall endure by their having a King, and what inconveniences follow the change which ſo vehemently and unhappily they purſue. The next day Samuel aſſembled the people about break of day, and promiſed them that he would eſtabliſh them a King. But ſaith he, before I effect that which you requeſt, I muſt declare to you what condition you ſhall live in, under ſubjection to royalty; and F how many and grievous evils you ſhall be preſſed with, by thoſe Kings that ſhall Govern you. Know therefore firſt of all, that your Kings will take your Children from you, and make ſome of them Coachmen, and others Horſemen and Archers of their Guard, others their Poſts and Tribunes and Centurions; ſome likewiſe their Handicrafts men, and Armorers, and Chariot-makers, and Smiths, and Forgers of Weapons, and Husbandmen of his fields, and Ploughers and diggers of his Vineyards: neither is there any thing which they ſhall not be compelled to do after the manner of bond-ſlaves, that are bought with money. They ſhall take your Daughters alſo, and make them their Perfumers, Cooks and Bakers; and they ſhall employ them in all ſervile offices, wherein bond-maids are employed, either by fear or puniſhment. They ſhall take from you your ſubſtance, and give it to their Eunuchs and other Servants. They

Although theſe future inconveniences were foretold them, yet did the people neglect them: and not ſuffering the perverſe opinion they had conceived in their minds, to be altered or diverted, they inſiſted with all obſtinacy, and without care of future miſchiefs, that they might have a King created over them, becauſe (as they ſaid) it was neceſſary to have a King that might manage War for them, to revenge them on their Enemies, and repreſs their Forces; and that there was nothing more reaſonable, than that they ſhould be governed in the ſame ſort as their Neighbours were. Samuel finding his perſwaſions could prevail nothing at all with them, and that they could not be diverted from their reſolution, He ſpake thus: Go your ways for this time every one of you to your houſes, and I will cauſe you to be aſſembled in a ſhort time, when God ſhall have informed me what King he will give you.

v. 6, ad 10. Saul asketh where the Prophet dwelleth.

v. 15, 16, 17. God certifieth Samuel whom he ſhould create King.

There was a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, of Noble Birth, and commendable manners, called Cis, who had a young Son named Saul, who was tall of ſtature, and had ſo much ſpirit and courage that he might well paſs for an extraordinary man. This Cis having fair Aſſes, wherein for their handſomneſs he took more pleaſure than in any other kind of Cattel, loſt ſome of them which were ſtrayed from the reſt of his flock: whereupon he ſent his Son, accompanied with a Servant, to ſeek them out; Saul having travelled in queſt of them thorow all his Fathers Tribe, journeyed thorow the reſt of the Tribes, without any tidings of them: for which cauſe he determined to return home again; for fear leſt his Father ſhould conceive ſome care and grief for him in his abſence. As he arrived near the City of Ramath, the Servant that followed him, told him, that there dwelt a Prophet in that place, who always foretold the truth, and he counſelled him to addreſs to him, with aſſurance, that by him he ſhould underſtand what was become of his Aſſes. Saul anſwered, that he had no money left to recompence the Prophet, having conſumed all they brought forth with them in their journey. His Servant replyed, that he had ſtill the fourth part of a Sicle, which they might give him; for he was ignorant that the Prophet was not wont to receive mony of any. When they drew near the Gates of the City, they met certain Maidens that went out to fetch water, of whom Saul demanded where the Prophet dwelt? they told him, and adviſed him to make haſte before he was ſet down to ſupper, for at that time he entertained divers perſons at his houſe. Samuel had invited this company, by reaſon that all the day long he had inſtantly beſought God, to declare to him, who it was that ſhould be eſtabliſhed King: and God had given him to underſtand, that the next day, and at the ſame hour, he would ſend a young man to him of the Tribe of Benjamin, who was the perſon he had choſen. Thus Samuel ſate in the upper part of his houſe, expecting the time appointed: which being come, he came down to go to ſupper, and in the way he met Saul. At that very inſtant God ſignified to Samuel, that it was he whom he had elected Prince and Governour over the people.

v. 23, 24. Samuel conducteth Saul unto the banquet.

1 Sam. 10. 1 Samuel anointeth Saul King.

Saul addreſſing himſelf to Samuel, deſired him to ſhew him the Prophets lodging, being he was a ſtranger, and knew it not. Samuel told him, that he himſelf was the man, and invited him to the banquet; aſſuring him that not only his Aſſes (in ſearch of which he had travelled ſo long) were ſafe, but that he ſhould reign, and abound with all ſort of goods. Saul anſwered: My Lord I am too mean to hope or expect ſo much; and my Tribe is the leaſt of all the Tribes: and you mock me, in ſpeaking ſuch things as ſurpaſs my condition. The Prophet took him by the hand, and brought both him and his Servant to the table, and placed him above all thoſe that were invited, who were to the number of ſeventy, and he placed his Servant next him. Samuel commanded that a royal portion ſhould be ſet before Saul; and when the hour of bed-time came, all the reſt aroſe and departed to their houſes, but Saul and his Servant lodged that night with the Prophet: and as ſoon as it was day, Samuel awaked Saul, and leading him out of Town, commanded him to ſend his Servant before, and to remain himſelf with him behind, becauſe he had certain things to impart to him in private. Hereupon Saul ſent away his Servant, and Samuel taking a Cruſe of Oyl, powred the ſame upon the young mans head, and embracing him, ſaid, God eſtabliſheth thee King over his people, to avenge them of the Philiſtines. Thou ſhalt have this ſign of the truth of what I tell thee: when thou art departed from hence, thou ſhalt overtake three men in the way travelling to Bethel, to adore and ſacrifice to God: the firſt of

A which, thou ſhalt ſee bearing three Loaves, the ſecond a Goat, and the third a bottle of Wine. Theſe ſhall embrace thee and careſs thee, and they ſhall give thee two Loaves, and thou ſhalt receive them. And from thence ſhalt thou depart to Rachel, where thou ſhalt meet a Meſſenger, that ſhall certifie thee that the Aſſes are found. From thence coming unto Gabatha, thou ſhalt find the Prophets aſſembled in their Congregation, and being filled with the Spirit of God, thou ſhalt propheſie amongſt them: ſo that whoſoever ſhall behold thee, ſhall ſay with admiration: Whence cometh it to paſs that the Son of Cis hath attained ſo good fortune? and when thou haſt had theſe ſigns, thou canſt no longer doubt that God is with thee! go and ſalute thy Father, and thy kinſmen, and then come back to me at Galgal to the end we may offer ſacrifices of B thankſgiving to God. Samuel having in this manner ſpoken to Saul, gave him licence to depart: and all theſe things hapned to Saul, according as the Prophet Samuel had foretold him. When Saul arrived at the houſe of his Father, Abner, who was his Uncle, and whom he loved above all the reſt of his Friends, queſtioned with him about his voyage, and thoſe things that had hapned to him: and Saul hid nothing from him, but particularly informed him of all that hapned to him, during his abode with the Prophet Samuel, and how he had told him of the recovery of his Aſſes: but touching the Royalty, and thoſe things that concerned the ſame, he ſaid nothing, fearing that either it would not be believed, or elſe it would draw envy upon him. For although he were both his friend and couſin; yet he thought it more ſecure and convenient to C keep it ſilent; conſidering the infirmity of mans nature, and that few men are conſtant in friendſhip, and capable of beholding without envy, the proſperity of others, even their neer relations and friends, though they know that the ſame befalls them by the particular favour of God.

v. 2. ad 1. Samuel, in way of confirmation telleth Saul what ſhall befortune him in his journey.

Saul concealed his Royal dignity.

The inconſtancy of mans love.

After this, Samuel aſſembled the people in the City of Maſpha, where he ſpoke to them in this manner: Behold what God hath commanded me to tell you in his name. When you groan'd under the yoke of the Egyptians, I freed you from ſervitude, and delivered you from the tyranny of the Neighbouring Kings who conquered you ſo often; Now in acknowledgment of ſo many benefits, you will have me no longer for your King; and as if you were ignorant, that the greateſt good that can happen to men, is to be governed by him that is the ſoveraign good; D You abandon your God to ſet a man upon the throne; who, according to his pleaſure and the unbridled bent of his paſſion, will uſe you like beaſts, and will uſurp upon your goods, without forbearing any thing whatſoever. For how can men have as great love for men, as I, whoſe handy work they are. Notwithſtanding ſince you have thus determined, and fear not to commit ſo great an outrage againſt God, rank your ſelves in order according to your Tribes and Families, and caſt your lots. To this the people condeſcended, and the lot fell on the Tribe of Benjamin; being caſt the ſecond time, it fell on the Family of Metri; and afterwards being caſt upon the men of that family, it fell upon Saul, who was the Son of Cis. The young man, who before knew what would happen, had ſtept aſide, to the end that it might not ſeem that he was ambitious of his dignity. The E moderation he ſhewed in this matter, was remarkable; for whereas moſt men cannot conceal their joy when any degree of felicity falls upon them, but manifeſt the ſame to all men; Saul not only was void of vain appearance (although he were to be King and Lord of ſo many worthy people) but which is more, he ſtole away from the preſence of thoſe men over whom he was to command, and obliged them to ſeek after him, and labour to find him out. Whileſt therefore they carefully ſought and knew not what was become of Saul, the Prophet prayed God that he would ſhew them where he was, and bring him into their preſence: which having obtained, he ſent out certain meſſengers to conduct him thither, and as ſoon as he came amongſt them, Samuel placed him in the midſt of the people. Now he was taller than any of the company by the ſhoulders, F and had a Kingly and goodly ſhape and appearance. Then ſpake the Prophet after this manner, God hath given you this man to be your King, behold how he ſurpaſſeth you all, and ſhews himſelf worthy to be your Prince. But aſſoon as the people had cried, God ſave the King; the Prophet, who had reduced into writing all thoſe miſchiefs that ſhould befall them, read the ſame to them in the hearing of the King, and put the book into the Tabernacle of God, for a perpetual teſtimony to poſterity of thoſe things which in future ages ſhould ſucceed, according as he had propheſied: which done, Samuel diſmiſſed the people, and returned to the City of Ramath, which was his Countrey. But Saul departing to Gabatha, divers worthy men gave their attendance on him, and paid him the honour that appertained to a King. But divers ſeditious and looſe companions, who ſet him at naught, G both mocked them, and thoſe things which he did, neither brought they any preſents unto Saul, nor ſeemed either in affection, or in word, to reſpect their King. which brought him great reputation. This Nahas had offered divers outrages to thoſe H Jews that dwell on the other ſide of Jordan. For he had paſſed the River with a great Army levied againſt them; and had taken divers of their Cities. And to the intent they might not revolt to deliver themſelves from his ſubjection, he uſed this ſubtilty and prevention. To all that ſurrendred themſelves to his mercy, or that were taken Captives in the wars, he plucked, out their right eyes; and this he did, to the end that when they would defend themſelves, they might have their left eyes covered with their Bucklers, and by that means unable to uſe their Armor. The King of the Ammonites having after this manner dealt with thoſe on the other ſide of Jordan, he led his Army againſt the Galaadites, and encamped near their chief City called Jabehs, to which he ſent Heralds to ſummon the inhabitants to ſurrender on theſe conditions: either to ſuffer their right eyes I to be pulled out, or elſe by enduring the ſiege, to ſee the final overthrow both of themſelves, and of their City: requiring them to chuſe which they lik'd, either to loſe a little part of their body, or hazard both their Fortunes and lives together. The Galaadites, terrified with this dreadful election, knew not what to reſolve upon, but asked truce for ſeven dayes, to the end that ſending their meſſengers to thoſe of their Nation, they might crave their aid, which if they could obtain, they would War; otherwiſe they promiſed to ſubmit themſelves unto the enemy, on what conditions were beſt pleaſing unto him. Nahas made no difficulty to grant them what they demanded ſo much he contemned the Iſraelites: and he permitted them likewiſe to crave aſſiſtance at all their hands, who were their aſſociates. Whereupon they preſently ſent meſſengers K from City to City, and certified the Iſraelites of all that Nahas had done unto them, and the extremity whereunto they were reduced. The Iſraelites underſtanding in what eſtate they of Jabeſh were, greatly lamented their condition; but their fear ſuffered them to aſſiſt their friends in no other manner than by commiſeration. Yet as ſoon as their meſſengers arrived in the City where Saul was, and that they had recounted to him the dangers wherewith the Jabeſites were oppreſſed; the people were alſo moved with unprofitable compaſſion. But Saul at his returning from the field into the City, perceiving the inhabitants drowned in tears, and enquiring for what cauſe they were ſo dejected, he no ſooner underſtood it, but he was ſtirred up by the Spirit of God, and ſent the Ambaſſadors back again to thoſe that ſent them, promiſing that within three L days he would ſuccour them, and that he would have the upper hand of the enemy before Sun-riſe, to the end that the riſing Sun might behold them victorious, and delivered from all fear. In the mean time he commanded ſome of them to ſtay with him, to the intent they might guide him in the way.

The Combat and Victory of Saul over the Ammonites.

Sauls ſerious exhortations and command for War.

SAul deſirous, by the fear of puniſhment, to incite the people to take arms immediatly, and make War upon the Ammonites, cut the hams of his own oxen, and threatned M all thoſe whom he met with, to do the like to theirs, except the next day they preſented themſelves with their Arms upon the bank of Jordan, to follow the King and the Prophet Samuel, whither they would conduct them.

Ten Shcœni or Cables length of Nilus ſo called by the cords that draw the Ships by Nilus, make 37 Italian miles.

Saul kills the Ammonite, and Nahas their King.

Saul made his name famous amongſt the Hebrews.

Saul is praiſed by the people.

The fear of this penalty publiſhed among the Tribes, made them gather to a body about the ſame time, ſo that all the parties of the people were muſtred in the City of Bala. In this ſurvey, beſides thoſe of the Tribe of Juda, were numbred ſeven hundred thouſand men, and of the Tribe of Juda in particular, there were ſeventy thouſand. Saul having paſſed Jordan, and marched all night, came before Sun-riſe to the place where he intended to conduct them, and dividing his Army into three parts, he attaqued the enemy on every ſide, who ſuſpected no ſuch encounter: and fighting valiantly againſt them, he N ſlew divers, and amongſt the reſt Nahas King of the Ammonites. This victory made Sauls name famous amongſt the Hebrews, ſo that he was wonderfully praiſed and honoured for his valour: and if before any contemned him, now they changed their opinions, and honoured him, and accounted him the worthieſt of them all. For he was not ſatisfied to redeem and deliver thoſe of Jabehs, but he entred the Countrey of the Ammonites alſo, and ravaged the ſame with his Army; and after he had obtained a great booty, both he and his Army Victoriouſly returned to their dwelling places. The people highly pleaſed with this noble action atchieved by Saul, rejoyced that they had demanded a King, and exclaimed againſt thoſe that ſaid it would be diſcommodious and unprofitable O for the Common-wealth, ſaying, where are now theſe murmurers? let them be put to death: with other ſuch like words, that a people beſotted with good ſucceſs, is wont to ſpeak againſt them that oppoſe the ſame. Saul commended the affection of the

A the people: but ſwore that none ſhould be put to death that day, becauſe it would not ſeem agreeable, that the victory given them by God, ſhould be ſullied with the blood of their Brethren; but rather that it was more proper the time ſhould be ſpent in feaſting and jolity. After this Samuel told them, that they ought to confirm the Kingdom of Saul by a ſecond Election, and to that end, they aſſembled together in the City of Galgal, according as he commanded them: and there, in the ſight of all the people, Samuel anointed Saul the ſecond time with the conſecrated Oyl, and proclaimed him King. Thus was the Ariſtocracy and Government of the better ſort amongſt the Hebrews, turned into a Monarchy. For under Moſes and his ſucceſſor Joſhua, who was General of the Army, the form of the Commonwealths was Ariſtocratical. After their death, for the ſpace of eighteen B years, the people was without Government. The Common-wealth not long after reſumed its firſt form of Government; and the ſupreme authority was given to him that was eſteemed the moſt valiant in War, and the moſt upright in doing Juſtice. During which time ſuch Magiſtrates were called Judges.

After this the Prophet Samuel aſſembled the people, and ſpake to them after this manner: I conjure you by that great God that ſent thoſe two admirable Brothers Moſes and Aaron to deliver our forefathers from the Egyptians, and their tyranny, that without any conſideration either of fear or favour, or of any other paſſion, you truly teſtifie whether I have committed any injuſtice either for intereſt, avarice, or affection. Declare it, If I have taken away any mans Calf, or ſheep, or any other thing whatſoever, but that which I might lawfully take for C my releif and ſuſtenance, and at ſuch hands as willingly offer me the ſame; or if I have employed any Beaſts to my ſervice, or uſe his cattel to my profit and his hinderance: in theſe and ſuch like, if I have offended any man let him now accuſe me in the preſence of the King. All of them cryed out with one voyce that no ſuch fault had been committed by him, but that he had Governed their Nation in Holineſs and Juſtice. After the people had thus publicky teſtified in behalf of Samuel; he ſaid unto them: Since you have freely proteſted, that you have no cauſe of wrong to charge againſt me, hear I pray you, wherewith I can juſtly accuſe you. You have griveouſly offended againſt the Majeſty of God, in that you have required a King at his hands: you ſhould have rather remembred, that your old Father Jacob accompanied onely with his 70 Sons came into Egypt, conſtrained thereunto by famine, and D that in that Countrey divers thouſands of perſons iſſued from his loynes, whom the Egyptians kept in captivity, doing them extream outrages. And when your fathers called upon God, he wonderfully delivered them from the diſtreſſes wherein they were, without giving them any King, but ſending them two Brothers, Moſes and Aaron; who brought and conducted them into this Countrey which you poſſeſs at this preſent. And although you participated theſe benefits from the hands of God, yet you forget his religion, and neglected piety. This notwithſtanding, at ſuch time as you have been conquered by your enemies, he hath ſet you free; aſſiſting you, firſt of all, with the overthrow of the Aſſyrians and their forces; then giving you victory over the Ammonites, and Moabites; and finally over the Philiſtines. Now theſe great exploits were performed by you, not under the conduct of a King, but by the direction of Jephta E and Gedeon. What folly therefore hath bewitched you to flie from God, and to ſeek to live under the ſubjection of a King? But I have named ſuch an one unto you, Whom God hath choſen to be your Governour. Notwithſtanding, to the intent that I may give you a manifeſt teſtimony, that Gods wrath is provoked againſt you, becauſe you have deſired a King; I will deſire of God, that he will make you ſee in this place, and in the heart of Summer ſuch a ſtorm, that there is not any one of you, that hath ever ſeen the like. Scarce had he ſpoken the words, but ſuddenly there appeared great Lightning, Thunder and Hail, in confirmation of what the Prophet had ſaid: ſo that amazed and confounded with fear, all of them confeſſed that they had offended, and deſired the Prophet, that with a good and fatherly affection, he would beſeech God to appeaſe his wrath towards them, and forgive them F this offence which they had committed through ignorance, as he had pardoned their other negligences, whereby they had tranſgreſſed his holy will. All which Samuel promis'd them do to, and beſought God that it would pleaſe him to pardon them the error which they had committed in this matter, and to be appeaſed by his prayers. After this he exhorted them to live uprightly, and to keep in continual remembrance what evils had hapned unto them, for that they had forſaken the way of virtue; and what wonders God had done, and what Laws he had given by Moſes, all which they ought to meditate on, if they deſired to be in ſafety, and live happily with their King. But if they failed herein, he foretold them, that both themſelves and their Kings ſhould be grievouſly puniſhed. Samuel having propheſied theſe things to the Hebrews, diſmiſſed them to G their own dwellings, after he had confirmed the Kingdom to Saul the ſecond time.

For the Philiſtines of Gaba having gotten a Victory over them, had taken their Arms from them, and ſeized and fortified both with Men and Munition the ſtrongeſt Cities of their Countrey; prohibiting them to bear Arms, and I in general the uſe of any Iron: by reaſon of which Inhibition, if their Husbandmen had at any time need of any Iron work, as of Plough-ſhares, Mattocks, or any ſuch other Inſtrument fit for manuring or tillage of their Lands, they were inforced to ſeek it, and get it forged amongſt the Philiſtines.

The Philiſtines ſpoil the Countrey of the Hebrews. 1 Sam. 14. 1, ad 4.

Jonathan with his Harneſs-bearer, do privily enter the Enemies Camps.

Now when the Philiſtines underſtood that their Gariſon was defeated, they were extremely mov'd, and conceiving that the injury and outrage was not to be ſuffered, they armed themſelves againſt the Jews, and marcht out embattelled with 300000 Footmen, 30000 Chariots, and 6000 Horſe, encamping with their whole Hoſt near the City of Machmas. Which when Saul the King of the Hebrews underſtood, he marched toward the City of Gilgal: and as he Travelled thorow the Countrey, he animated and encou- K raged the People to preſerve their liberty, proclaiming War againſt the Philiſtines; whoſe Forces he ſo little feared, that he mocked thereat, ſaying, That they deſerved not to be feared for their multitudes, nor any danger which might accrue by an Encounter with them. But when Sauls Soldiers were certified of the true number of their Enemies, they were diſmayed, ſo that ſome of them hid themſelves in Dens and places under the earth, others fled on the other ſide of Jordan, into the Countrey of the Gadites and Reubenites. But Saul ſent for the Prophet, to conſult with him about the War; who gave him anſwer, that he ſhould attend in the ſame place where he was, and prepare Beaſts for Sacrifice, becauſe that within ſeven days he would come to him, and ſacrifice on the ſeventh day: which done, he might encounter the Enemy. According to this direction of the L Prophet he expected, yet obſerved not intirely all that Samuel had enjoined him. For when he perceived that he was ſomewhat ſlack in coming, and that his Soldiers left him, he took the Beaſts that were prepared for the Sacrifice, and offer'd a Burnt-offering: but afterwards underſtanding that Samuel was arrived, he went out to meet him, and do him honour. Samuel told him that he had done amiſs, by reaſon that neglecting that which was commanded him, he had preſum'd before his arrival, to offer the Sacrifices which were to be made to God for the People. Saul excuſed himſelf, alledging, That he had ſtayed during the term of 7 days which were appointed him: but that neceſſity, and the departure of his Soldiers, upon intelligence that the enemies Army had left Machmas, and was coming to Gilgal, had induced him to offer Sacrifice. Samuel replyed, ſaying, Thou M hadſt done more adviſedly, if thou hadſt obeyed, and not by thy haſtineſs contemned God, whoſe Miniſter and Prophet I am: for by thine obedience thou mighteſt have gotten an aſſurance and continuance of thy Kingdom to thy ſelf, and the ſucceſſion to thy Poſterity. This ſaid, being diſpleaſed with what had hapned, he returned back to his own houſe, and Saul with 600 Soldiers (only accompanied with his Son Jonathan) came to the City of Gabeon. The greater part of theſe Men were diſarmed, by reaſon that the Countrey was deſtitute of Iron, and Workmen expert in forging Armor: for the Philiſtines permitted them not to have any, as we have declared a little before. The Philiſtines dividing their Army into three Battels, invaded the Countrey of the Hebrews ſo N many wayes, deſtroying and ravaging all things in the ſight of King Saul, and his Son, who neither could inhibit their incurſions, nor by reaſon of their multitudes, make head againſt them. Both he therefore and his Son, and Achias the High Prieſt, ſate down upon a Hillock, and ſeeing the Countrey ſpoiled round about them, they were much diſmayed. But Sauls Son propoſed to his Armor-bearer, to enter ſecretly into the Enemies Camp, and raiſe an Uproar and Alarum in the ſame; who willingly promiſing and offering him his ſervice to adventure with him in all occaſions and places, with the hazard of his life: they both of them deſcended from the Mountain, and marched directly towards the Enemies Camp, who had pitched their Tents on a high pointed Rock, which extended it ſelf in length with three angles, and was each way begirt with a Bank, as it were a Wall and Fortification againſt the incurſion of their Enemies. For O which cauſe, they kept their watch ſomewhat too careleſly, becauſe the place was ſo fortified by nature, that no man could aſcend, or aſſail them, but with diſadvantage. When they

The year of the World, 2882, before Chriſt's Nativity, 1084.

A they got near the Camp, Jonathan encouraged his Companion, to aſſail the Enemy after this manner. If (ſaith he) they eſpie us, and will us to aſcend, let us take this Summons of theirs for an aſſured token that our deſign ſhall ſucceed: but if they hold their peace, and call us not, let us return back again.

As they approached the Enemies Hoſt, about break of day, the Philiſtines ſaid one to another, the Hebrews creep out of their Caves and Dens; then cryed they out to Jonathan and his Armor-bearer, ſaying, Come hither, come hither to us, to receive the puniſhment of your audacious enterprize. Jonathan heard theſe words with joy, as a certain preſage that God favor'd his enterprize, and parted with his Armor-bearer from the place where they were firſt diſcovered, anſwering them that he would ſhortly viſit them. So with-B drawing himſelf on the other ſide of the Rock, which, by reaſon of the ſcituation thereof, was left unguarded; and overcoming the difficulty of the place with great labor, at laſt they came where the Enemy was, whom they found aſleep, and aſſailing them, ſlew 20 of them, and filled the whole Army with terror and amazement: ſo that caſting away their Weapons, they fled with all ſpeed: and ſome being ignorant which were their Friends or Foes, invaded one another as Enemies. For imagining with themſelves, that only two Hebrews durſt never enter their Camp, they conceiv'd there was Treachery among themſelves, and ſo fell to ſlaughter one another: ſo that ſome of them were ſlain, others fled to eſcape the Sword, and fell headlong down the Rocks. But when the Kings Spies told him what confuſion and diſorder was hapned in the Camp of the Phili- C ſtines, Saul demanded whether any of his Company were abſent? and hearing that his Son and his Armor-bearer were miſſing, he deſired the High Prieſt to attire himſelf with the Ephod, that ſo he might learn of God what was to happen. He did ſo, and aſſur'd him that he ſhould obtain the Victory over his Enemies. Whereupon Saul ſallied out, and aſſaulted the Philiſtines, whil'ſt they were thus confuſed and diſordered, and fighting one againſt another. To him there flocked in great multitudes, ſuch as before were fled into dens, and places under ground, as ſoon as they heard that the Victory inclined on Sauls ſide: ſo that gathering together to the number of 10000 Hebrews, he purſued his ſcattered Enemies thorow all the Countrey. But afterward, a great inconvenience hapned unto Saul, proceeding from the joy he had conceived by this Victory, (for com-D monly ſuch as are bleſſed by ſuch good fortune, are not Maſters of their own affections and reaſons) or rather proceeding from his ignorance. For intending to ſatiate himſelf with revenge for all thoſe injuries which he had received from the Philiſtines, he publiſhed an Imprecation or Curſe, againſt any one whomſoever, that intermitting the purſuit, ſhould take ſuſtenance before Night, purpoſing to continue the ſame till dark Night. This Execration thus publiſhed by Saul, it chanced that his Son, who had not heard of it, nor the general allowance of the ſame by the People, entring into a certain Grove belonging to the Tribe of Ephraim, wherein were many ſwarms of Bees, by chance light upon a Honey-comb, and preſſing the Honey, did eat the ſame. Afterwards having intelligence that his Father had under a grievous penalty of Execration, forbid-E den any man to taſte any ſort of Meat before Sun-ſet, he gave over eating: yet ſaid, that his Father had done amiſs in publiſhing that Prohibition, by reaſon that if they had received ſuſtenance, they might with greater force and vigor have purſued the Enemy that fled, and ſlain more of them. After the ſlaughter of many thouſands of the Philiſtines, about Evening they began to ranſack and ſpoil the Camp of the Philiſtines, and they carried away great ſpoils, and a number of Cattel, part of which were ſlain and eaten with the blood, contrary to the Law. Which when the Scribes had ſignified to the King, how the People had offended againſt God, by ſlaughtering the Beaſts, and eating the fleſh of them, before it was either waſht or purified from the blood; Saul commanded that a great ſtone ſhould be rowled into the midſt of the Camp, and that the People F ſhould kill the Beaſts upon the ſame; and forbear to eat fleſh with the blood, becauſe it was not agreeable unto God. All which was performed as the King had commanded; and Saul erected an Altar in that place, on which he offered a Burnt-ſacrifice to God.
This was the firſt Altar that he erected. But Saul being deſirous incontinently to aſſail the Enemies Camp, and ſack all that was therein before day, whileſt his Men of War diligently follow'd him, and ſhew'd great forwardneſs in the execution of his command; the King ask'd counſel of the High Prieſt Achilob, whether God would give him the victory, and permit thoſe that ſhould enter the Enemies Camp, to return from thence Conquerors. The High Prieſt told him, that God returned him no anſwer: which when he underſtood, It is not without ſome great cauſe, ſaid he, that God is thus ſilent, who hereto- G fore was wont to give a [illegible] *anſwer what we ought to do: but there muſt needs be ſome hidden ſin amongſt us, that giving offence to him, cauſeth him to be ſilent. But I ſwear by the ſame

H God, with no leſs ſeverity puniſh him, than any the leaſt ſtranger that is neither by alliance nor affinity tyed unto me. Now when the People cryed out, and encourag'd him to the performance of what he had ſpoken, he preſently aſſembled them in one place, and ſtanding with his Son apart, began by caſting lots to find out him that was faulty. When the lot fell upon Jonathan, he ask'd him what Crime he had committed? Jonathan anſwer'd, I know no other thing, but that yeſterday, being in purſuit of the Enemy, and ignorant of thine Edict, I taſted of an Honey-comb; whereupon Saul ſwore that he would put him to death, rather than violate his Oath, the obſervation of which he prefer'd before his own blood, and all the ſentiments of nature. He nothing aſtoniſh'd at his preſent danger, with a generous and dreadleſs mind, preſented himſelf with this Reply: O Father, (ſaid he) I entreat no favour at thy hands: for I willingly ſubmit to that death, which may I diſcharge thee of thy vow, the more contentedly, becauſe I have ſeen ſo famous a victory: for I ſhall dye contented, to ſee the inſolence of the Philiſtines overmaſtered by the power of the Hebrews. This valor and courage of the young man, moved the whole multitude to remorſe and commiſeration; ſo that they all ſwore that they would not ſuffer Jonathan, who was the Author of ſo famous a victory, to be put to death: ſo they reſcued the young man out of the hands of his diſpleaſed Father, and pray'd to God to pardon him the fault which he had committed. Saul, after he had ſlain about 6000 of his Enemies, returned with victory to his own houſe, and Reigned afterwards very happily, and overcame the Ammonites, Philiſtines, Moabites, Idumeans, Amalekites, and King Zoba: He had three ſons, Jonathan, Joſhua, and Melchi, and two Daughters, Merob and Michol. K The General of his Army was Abner the ſon of his Uncle called Neer; for Neer and Cis Sauls Father, were Brothers, and Sons of Abiel. He was very ſtrong both in Horſe and Chariots; and againſt whatſoever Enemy he marched forth, he always returned with victory: ſo that he reduced the affairs of the Hebrews to a happy ſtate, and ſo much increaſed their power, that they were feared by all thoſe Nations that neighboured upon them. Sauls victory over the Amalekites.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8. 1 Sam. 15. 1, 2, 3.

Samuel by Gods commandment, addreſſeth Saul to make War upon the Amalekites.

BUT Samuel coming to Saul, told him that he was ſent to him by God, to admoniſh him how he had choſen him above the reſt, and preferred him to the Kingdom: and for that cauſe that it behooved him to be obedient unto him in all things, becauſe as he Ruled the People, ſo God Rules both Kings, Kingdoms, and all things. Thus therefore (ſaid he) doth God command thee. Since the Amalekites offer'd many injuries unto the Hebrews in the Deſart, whil'ſt in their departure out of Egypt, they Travelled into that Region which they now inhabit; juſtice requireth that they be puniſh'd for that inhumanity. M Wherefore I give thee order to declare War againſt them, and after thou haſt overcome them, to extinguiſh them utterly, without regard either of ſex or years; and this revenge ſhalt thou execute upon them, in requital of thoſe injuries they in times paſt offered to our Forefathers. Neither ſhalt thou ſpare either Beaſt or Horſe, or Flock, to apply them to thy profit or particular uſe: but thou ſhalt offer all to God for a Burnt-offering, and according as Moſes commanded, root out the name of the Amalekites from off the earth. All theſe things did Saul promiſe to perform, and conceiving that obedience conſiſted in the ſpeedy execution of that which was enjoined him, he preſently aſſembled all his Forces together, and muſtering his Soldiers at Gilgal, he found about 40000, beſides the Tribe of Juda, which of it ſelf afforded 30000 Men: N with theſe did Saul enter the Countrey of the Amalekites, and laid divers Ambuſhes near a River, not only to moleſt them with open War, but alſo ſurprize them unawares, and kill them amidſt the High-ways: he afterwards gave them Battel, and put them to flight, and diſcomfited their whole Army, purſuing them that fled. Which beginning, having ſucceſs anſwerable to what God had promiſed him, he marched onwards, and beſieged the Cities of the Amalekites, and beſieged and took ſome of them by Engines, others by Mines and Countermures raiſed on the outſide, others by famine, and want of water, and divers other ways. And in thoſe Cities which he overcame, he neither ſpared Women nor Children, not ſuppoſing their ſlaughter to be cruel, or inhumane: both for that they were his Enemies, and for that he did nothing but according to Gods commandment, towards whom diſobedience would be a Crime. O He took Aga[illegible] Priſoner alſo, who was King of the Amalekites, whoſe beauty and perſonage ſeemed unto him ſo goodly, that he thought him worthy to be kept alive, and ſo being led rather by his own inclination, than

Ver. 4. Saul muſtering his people, findeth in the Tribe of Juda only 30000 men.

Ver. 5, 6. Saul razeth the Cities of the Amalekites.

A than Gods commandment, he us'd ſuch clemency as was not lawful for him at that time: For God ſo hated the Amalekites, that he would not have their Infants ſpared, though they ought in natural compaſſion to have been more pitied than the reſt. But Saul kept alive the King of his Enemies, and the Author of all the Hebrews evils, regarding more his beauty, than Gods commandment. This ſin of his the People preſently imitated: for they ſpared Horſes, and other kind of Cattel, and made prey of them, notwithſtanding God had charged them to reſerve nothing. They carried away with them all other Moveables and Riches, and only conſumed thoſe things which were of ſmalleſt value, by fire. This victory had Saul over thoſe People that dwell betwixt Peluſium, (a City on the borders of Egypt) and the Red Sea. But he medled not with the Sichemites, which B inhabit in the Province of Midian, whom, before the Battel, he commanded to retire themſelves, leſt they ſhould partake the Calamities of the Amalekites: for being they were allied to them by Raguel, Moſes Father-in-law, the Hebrews had care of their ſafety. Saul having obtained this victory, and rejoycing at his good ſucceſs, returned home, as full of content, as if he had pretermitted nothing of that which God had commanded him by the Prophet Samuel, before his War with the Amalekites; but had preciſely obſerv'd all that was enjoin'd him. But God was greatly diſpleaſed, both that the King of the Amalekites was preſerved, and that the People had made prey of their Cattel: for both theſe actions of theirs were expreſly againſt Gods command. For it was not to be tolerated, even by a mortal King, that they ſhould neglect and contemn his Laws and C Decrees, by whoſe only means they were further'd and favor'd in their victory. For which cauſe, God told the Prophet Samuel, that he repented that he had made Saul their King, conſidering that he infring'd his Commandments, and govern'd himſelf according to his own will. When Samuel heard theſe words, he was much troubled, and pray'd to God all Night, that he would appeaſe his wrath and diſpleaſure conceived againſt Saul: but notwithſtanding all the importunities and prayers which the Prophet made for him, God would in no ſort be reconciled, becauſe he judg'd it not juſt, that the ſins which were committed by Saul, ſhould be remitted by Samuels interceſſion. For ſin never more augmenteth, than when ſuch as are offended, are too remiſs in their puniſhments: for whil'ſt they would be reputed both for good and merciful, they themſelves D become the Authors of ſin. When therefore God had denied the Prophet his Requeſt, and it manifeſtly appear'd that no prayers or ſupplication could appeaſe him, as ſoon as it was day, Samuel repair'd to Saul, who at that time remained in Gilgal. As ſoon as the King ſaw him, he run unto him, and embraced him, ſaying, I give God thanks for the victory; and all thoſe things which he commanded me, I have performed. But Samuel anſwer'd, How cometh it then to paſs, that I hear this bleeting of Sheep, and bellowing of Beaſts throughout the Army? Saul replyed, That the People had reſerved that Cattel for Sacrifice; but all the Nation of the Amalekites was exterminated, as God had commanded, and none remaining but onely the King, whom he would cauſe to be preſented before him, to the end they might conſult together what ſhould be done with him. Hereunto the Prophet anſwer'd, That God took no E pleaſure in Sacrifices, but in thoſe men that are good and juſt, and ſuch (ſaid he) are they, that obey his Will and Commandment; ſince no action may be reputed good, but in reſpect of the reference it hath to Gods Will: for God refuſeth not him that ſacrificeth not, but him that diſobeyeth him. For he accepteth not thoſe Sacrifices that are offered to him, by thoſe that ſubmit not themſelves unto him, and offer not unto him the true and acceptable offerings; yea, though they preſent divers and many great Sacrifices, and bring him jewels of gold and ſilver; but he rejecteth ſuch things, and reſpecteth them not as pledges of piety but effects of hypocriſie: But he taketh pleaſure in thoſe onely that obſerve that which he hath commanded, and had rather dye, than infringe the ſame, not ſeeking that Sacrifices ſhould be offered unto him; but if they be offered, although of ſmall and no value, yet are they more acceptable unto him in F poverty and obedience, than all thoſe which the richeſt hand, or ſtrongeſt fortune can afford. Know thou therefore, (ſaid he) that thou haſt incurr'd Gods diſpleaſure, in that thou haſt contemned and neglected his Commandments: for how canſt thou think that he will regard thoſe Sacrifices with a gracious eye, which he himſelf hath adjudged to utter perdition and ruine? Is it poſſible for thee to think that there is no difference between deſtroying and ſacrificing? Be aſſured therefore of the loſs of thy kingdom and power, which hath in ſuch ſort tranſported thee, that thou haſt contemned God, who beſtowed the ſame upon thee. Saul confeſſed that he had ſinned, and done amiſs, in that he had not obeyed the words of the Prophet; yet alledg'd, That he was compelled to do the ſame, in that he durſt not reſtrain the Soldier, who was ſet upon the prey: but (ſaid he) be favourable, and merciful unto me, for hereafter I will take heed, G leſt I fall into the like ſin: and he entreated him that he would ſtay with him a little, and offer a Peace-offering in his behalf. But the Prophet knowing that God would be moved by no Sacrifice, would not be perſuaded by him.

CHAP. X.

A ſecond Expedition of the Philiſtines againſt the Hebrews.

NOt long after, the Philiſtines gathered together great companies of men of War, with which they aſſailed the Iſraelites, and encamped between Succoth and Azeca. Saul on the other ſide led forth his Army againſt them, and encamping upon a certain Mountain, C he conſtrained the Philiſtines to diſlodge from their firſt Camp, and intrench themſelves upon another Mountain right over againſt that where he had pitched his Tents. The Camps being thus ſeparated the one from the other, there was a Valley between both the Armies: into this there deſcended a certain Gyant called Goliath, who was of Gath, of huge ſtature, being four Cubits and a ſpan in height, having his Limbs cover'd with huge and mighty Armor; for his Cuiraſs which he bare on his back, weighed five thouſand Sicles; his Helmet and Pouldrons were of Braſs, made fit to cover his maſſie Members; the Spear which he bare in his hand, was no light Launce, but he bare it on his ſhoulder, and the Head thereof weighed ſix hundred Sicles. This Gyant, follow'd by a great Troop, preſented himſelf in this Equipage in the Valley that ſeparated the two Armies, D and cryed with a loud voice, addreſſing his Speech to Saul and the Hebrews in theſe terms, Hebrews, what need you hazard the doubtful fortune of a Battel? Single me out an Adverſary, and let us determine by our two fates, on whoſe ſide the victory and conqueſt ſhall fall; which ſoever of us ſhall be overcome, let his Party be obliged to receive Law from that of the Victor. For it is better that a ſingle perſon, than the whole Army be expos'd to danger.
When he had ſpoken thus, he returned back to his own Camp. The next day he came forth again, and uſed the ſame words; and thus for forty days he ceaſed not to defie the Hebrews in ſuch words: ſo that both Saul and all his Army were diſpleaſed, and kept themſelves alwayes ready and ranged in Battel, yet came not to blows. David was not then in the Camp, becauſe Saul had ſent him back again to Jeſſe his Father, (contenting E himſelf with his other three Brothers, who at that time ſerved under his Royal Standard) where he reſum'd his intermitted care of keeping his Flocks. But whil'ſt the War was rather protracted than proſecuted, his Father ſent him to carry Proviſions to his Brothers, and to know how their affairs went in the Army: And whil'ſt David diſcours'd with his Brothers touching thoſe things which his Father had committed to his charge, Goliath came after his uſual manner, but more inſolent than ever, and reproacht the Iſraelites, that none amongſt them had the courage to fight with him. David was herewith ſo greatly moved, that turning himſelf to his Brothers, he told them that he was ready to fight hand to hand againſt that Enemy. But Eliab the elder Brother reproved him for ſo ſpeaking, telling him that he was more hardy than became his age, and F that he knew not what concerned thoſe matters, willing him to return to his Father, and mind his Flocks. David out of reſpect to his Brother, departed from thence, and meeting with certain Soldiers, ſaid unto them, That he fear'd not to encounter that proud Challenger: which they preſently ſignified unto Saul, who incontinently ſent to ſeek him out.
When he came into his preſence, Saul asked him, Whether he had ſpoken after that manner?
David anſwer'd, That he had, and that he fear'd not that Philiſtine, though he appear'd ſo terrible; and that if the King would permit him, he would abate the pride of this Gyant: and how terrible and fierce ſoever he appear'd, he would ſubdue him, and turn his terror to contempt; and ſo much the more ſhould the glory of his Army be enhaunced, that ſo great and expert a Man at Arms, ſhould be ſubdued by a young unexperienced Soldier. Saul admir'd G his hardineſs, and great courage; yet by reaſon of his years, told him, *That he was too

So much prevailed this extraordinary hardineſs of the young Man, that the King im- I ploring Gods aſſiſtance to ſecond his courage, furniſh'd him with his own Armor, a Sword and a Helmet, and ſent him forth to the Combat. But David feeling the weight of his Armor, and finding himſelf rather loaden, than advantag'd by it, ſaid to the King, Theſe Arms, Sir, are proper for your Majeſty, who are able to make ſo good uſe of them, but not for me; wherefore I beſeech you to leave me at liberty, to fight as I pleaſe. Saul granted his deſire; and he putting off his Armor, took a ſtaff in his hand, and five ſtones, which he gather'd on the bank of the Torrent, and put into his Scrip, his ſling he bore in his right hand: and being thus armed, he marched forward to encounter his Enemy. When the Barbarian ſaw him thus furniſhed, he ſo much contemned him, that in way of ſcorn, he ask'd him, Whether he thought him a Dog, that he thus came forth to fight with him onely with ſtones? Nay (ſaid David) I eſteem thee worſer than a Dog. K Theſe words ſo incenſed Goliath, that he ſwore by his God, That he would tear his Carkaſs in a thouſand pieces, and give them to the Beaſts of the Field, and the Birds of the Air. But David anſwer'd, Thou comeſt againſt me with thy Sword, thy Javelin, and Cuireſs; but I march out againſt thee, truſting in the power of God, who will deſtroy thee by my hand, and with thee thy whole Army; for this day will I take thy head from thy ſhoulders, and caſt the reſt of thy body to the Dogs, whom, by thy rage, thou reſembleſt; and all Men ſhall know that God protects the Hebrews, that his Providence conducts them, that his help renders them invincible, and that no ſtrength nor arms can keep them from periſhing, whom he abandons. The weight of the Philiſtines arms hindred him from marching readily: ſo that he walkt ſtep by ſtep towards L David, contemning him, and truſting to kill him eaſily, both for that he was diſarmed, and becauſe he was young, and of ſmall ſtature.

Saul from one of his chief Nobles, maketh David a tribune, to the end that being often drawn out by the enemy, he might be ſlain.

DAvid advanc'd boldly againſt Goliath, being aſſiſted in an inviſible manner by God; and drawing one of the ſtones out of his Scrip, and fitting it to his Sling, he M threw it againſt Goliath, which gave him ſuch a ſtroke on the Forehead, that it pierced him to the very Brain, ſo that he fell down ſuddenly dead; and David running upon him, as he lay ſprawling on the earth, cut off his Head with his own Sword: for he himſelf had none. As ſoon as he was ſtrucken down, terror and confuſion fell upon all the Army of the Philiſtines: for ſeeing the moſt eſteemed Warrior amongſt them overthrown and ſlain, they began to fear the iſſue of their Battel, and reſolved to flie; which they did in great diſorder and confuſion, hoping by that means to deliver themſelves out of danger. But Saul, and the whole Army of the Hebrews, purſu'd them, with great ſhouts and cries; and in the purſuit, made a great ſlaughter of them, and drove them to the borders of Gath, and even to the gates of Aſcalon. In this Battel, N there dyed on the Philiſtines ſide, above Thirty thouſand, and the hurt and wounded were twice as many. Saul returning back to the Camp, pillaged and burnt their Tents; but David bore Goliaths head to his Pavilion, and hung his Sword in the Tabernacle, and conſecrated the ſame to God. But Saul afterward conceived a ſecret hatred againſt David, upon this occaſion: As he returned triumphant like a Conqueror with his Army, the Women and Maidens ſinging and dancing to their Cymbals and Tymbrels, in way of honour, came out to meet him: the Women ſung, that Saul had ſlain thouſands of the Philiſtines; and the Virgins anſwer'd, that David had ſlain Ten thouſands: which when Saul underſtood, and ſaw that barely thouſands were aſcrib'd to him, and Ten thouſands to David, he thought that after ſo glorious Acclamations, there wanted nothing to David, but the name of King. For which cauſe he began to fear and ſuſpect him: and by O reaſon of this fear, he thought he was too near his own perſon, and therefore from being one of the chiefeſt in authority about him, which was to be one of his chief Com-

A manders and guard, he made him Captain over a 1000, rather reſpecting his own ſecurity than Davids honor; to the intent that being often engag'd in encounters with the Enemye he might periſh by ſome diſaſter or other. But David, having in all places the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, returned alwayes with good ſucceſs: ſo that his extraordinary Valor acquir'd him an univerſal eſteem, and Michol, Sauls Daughter, that was about that time marriageable, began to be enamor'd with him, that ſhe could not hide her paſſion even from the King her Father. Saul, inſtead of being diſpleas'd, rejoyc'd at it, hoping by that means the ſooner to entrap David. He gave ear thereto with ſome ſhew of allowance, and told them who ſpoke of it to him, that he would willingly give him his Daughter to Wife; for he reaſon'd thus with himſelf: I will propoſe that I will give him my B Daughter in marriage, on condition that he bring me ſix hundred Philiſtines heads; and I am certain that being valiant and generous as he is, he will with joy accept this condition, becauſe the more dangerous it is, the more glory it will acquire to him; and ſo expoſing himſelf to all manner of dangers, he will be ſlain by the hands of the Philiſtines; and that intention which I have conceived againſt him, ſhall ſucceed according to mine own hearts deſire: for I ſhall be delivered of him, in ſending him out of the world, not by my means, but by other mens hands. Having taken this reſolution, he charged his Courtiers to ſound Davids ſentiments, and how he ſtood affected to the marriage: and they told him, That the King bare him great kindneſs, and ſo rejoyc'd that the People admir'd him, that he would give him in marriage the Princeſs his Daughter. David C anſwer'd, Think you it a ſmall matter to be Son-in-law to the King? for my ſelf, I eſteem otherwiſe, conſidering mine own baſe condition, who have neither reputation, nor any honourable quality. When Sauls ſervants had reported to him what anſwer David made them, Tell him (ſaid he) that I value not Goods or Preſents, (for that were to expoſe my Daughter to ſale, and not to match her with an Husband.) I ſeek a Son-in-law that hath Valor, and that is adorned with all Virtue, ſuch as is manifeſt and apparent in thee: and my deſire is, that for the dowry of my Daughter, thou give me neither gold nor ſilver, nor any other wealth out of thy Fathers houſe; but that thou make War upon the Philiſtines, *and ſix hundred of their heads, ſhall be the moſt acceptable dower thou canſt preſent me with. Saul admiring David's fortitude, giveth him his Daughter to Wiſe.

Nevertheleſs he chang'd not his purpoſe. For perceiving that David was gracious in Gods ſight, and in good reputation among the People, he was afraid of him: and being unable to conceal his fear of being I deprived of two things of ſuch conſequence, as his Kingdom and Life, he reſolved to kill David; giving Commiſſion to his Son Jonathan, and divers other of his Servants, to execute the ſame. But Jonathan amazed to ſee this change in his Father, who, in ſtead of the good liking he had of David in times paſt, ſought to injure him, not in any ſlight ſort, but by taking away his life: and on the other ſide, being ſingularly affected towards him, and reſpecting his virtue, he communicated the ſecret intention of his Father to him, counſelling him to have a care of himſelf, and to flie the next morning; in the mean while he would go and ſalute his Father, and as ſoon as occaſion preſented it ſelf, he would confer with him, to know the cauſe of his diſpleaſure againſt him, to the intent he might pacifie the ſame; conceiving it a matter unreaſonable, that he ſhould be K

I will tell thee afterwards (ſaid he) what my Fathers reſolution is. David gave credit to his wholeſom counſel, and retired from the preſence of the King.

1 Sam. 19. 3, ad 6. Jonathan reckoneth up unto his father the good deſerts of David, praying him to pacifie his diſpleaſure conceived againſt him.

THE next morning Jonathan came to Saul, and finding him well diſpoſed, began to ſpeak to him to this effect, concerning David: Of what fault, (O Father) either great or ſmall, have you found David guilty, that you have commanded him to be put to death? A Man that hath done you ſuch ſignal ſervice; that hath reveng'd you upon the Philiſtines, abated their Pride, and advanc'd the Honour of the People of the Hebrews, and hath delivered them from that diſgrace and contempt under which they have layen for the ſpace of Forty years, being the onely perſon that dared to oppoſe himſelf againſt the proud defiances of that Gyant, whom he ſo gloriouſly overcame; and who ſince that time hath brought as many of the Philiſtines heads as were demanded of him, in recompence whereof he hath taken my ſiſter to Wiſe. Be pleas'd to conſider that his death would be a great grief to us, not only upon account M of his virtue, but alſo of his alliance with us; and that by his death, your Daughter will have the affliction to ſee her ſelf a Widow, as ſoon as ſhe is a Wife. Weigh theſe things, and pacifie your diſpleaſure, and do no wrong to ſuch a Man, who hath been the Author of ſo good and great ſervice, as is the conſervation of your perſon at ſuch time as you were poſſeſſed and tormented with evil ſpirits, and the revenging you of your Enemies. For it is a thing unworthy either your Majeſty, or the name of a Man, to forget good deſerts. With theſe words was Saul pacified, ſo that he ſwore to his Son he would do no hurt to David: for his juſt perſuaſions and arguments were ſtronger, than the choler and fear of the King. Jonathan ſent to ſeek out David, and told him theſe good tydings from his Father, and brought him to him; and David continu'd to ſerve him as formerly. CHAP. XIV.

How hardly David eſcaped the ambuſhes that were often laid for him by the King; yet having him twice at advantage and in his power, would not murther him

ABout the ſame time, the Philiſtines again led forth their Army againſt the Hebrews, and Saul ſent David againſt them accompanied with his forces; who encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and returned to the King with a great Victory.
But Saul entertained him not, as he hoped, and as the happy exploit atchieved by him merited; but he envied his good actions and honourable deſerts, as if Davids happy B ſucceſs had been Sauls diſadvantage and prejudice. But when the evil ſpirit returned to vex him, he lodged him in his own chamber, and having at that time a javelin in his hand, he commanded him to play on his Harp, and to Sing Hymns. Now whileſt David obeyed his command Saul ſtretching out his arm, threw his Dart at him: but David foreſeeing it, avoided the ſtroke, and fled to his own houſe, where he ſtayed all the reſt of the day. When night was come, the King ſent certain of his Servants to watch his houſe leſt he ſhould eſcape, to the end that the next day, being brought forth to judgement, he might be condemned and put to death. But Michol, Davids Wife, and Sauls Daughter, having intelligence of her Fathers intention, went to her Husband, told him in how great peril he was, being deſirous to ſave his life, with the hazard of her C own. Beware (ſaid ſhe) leſt the Sun at his riſing find thee in this place; for if it do, I ſhall never more ſee thee. Flie therefore whileſt night offereth thee opportunity, which I pray to God to lengthen for thy ſake: for be aſſured, that if thou be ſurprized in this place, my Father will make thee die a miſerable death. This ſaid, ſhe let him down by a window, and ſo ſaved him; and ſoon after, ſhe prepared his bed as if he lay ſick therein, and under the covering ſhe laid the Liver of a new ſlaughtred Kid; and when her Father ſent the next morning to apprehend David, ſhe anſwered that he had been ſick all the night long: and opening the Curtains, ſhe gave them to underſtand that David was laid therein, the Coverlet being moved by the Liver which was hot and yet ſtirred, made them believe that the Liver that lay there was David, who panted and breathed very D hardly. Which being ſignified unto Saul, he commanded that he ſhould be brought to him in that eſtate wherein he was, becauſe he reſolved to put him to death. But when Sauls meſſengers returned thither, and opened the bed, they perceived Michols ſubtilty, and went and certified the King thereof: who reproved her very ſharply, for that ſhe had ſaved his Enemy, and deceived her Father. But ſhe excuſed her ſelf with words full of good appearance, ſaying that David had threatned to kill her; and through fear of death, ſhe was induced to ſave him. For which cauſe ſhe ought to be pardoned, ſince by conſtraint, and not of ſet purpoſe, ſhe had furthered his eſcape. For (ſaid ſhe) I think that you ſeek not ſo greedily after the death of your Enemy, as to prefer the ſame before the ſafety and ſecurity of your Daughter. Upon theſe reaſons Saul pardoned his Daughter.

E David delivered from this peril, went to the Prophet Samuel at Ramath, and told him what ambuſhes the King had laid for him, and how hardly he had eſcaped death by the ſtroke of his javelin; whereas in all things that concerned Saul, he had alwayes ſhewed himſelf obedient: having ſerved him advantageouſly in war upon his Enemies, and by Gods aſſiſtance been fortunate in all things; which was the cauſe that Saul was ſo diſpleaſed with him. The Prophet informed of Sauls injuſtice, departed from Ramath, and led David to a certain place called Galbaath, where he remained with him. But as ſoon as Saul was informed that David was retired, and accompanied with the Prophet, he ſent out certain Soldiers to lay hands on him, and bring him to him. They repairing to Samuel, and finding the congregation of the Prophets were ſeized with the F Spirit of God, and began to propheſie. Which when Saul underſtood, he ſent out others, with the like order, and they had the like extaſie. For which cauſe he ſent out others and ſeeing the third company propheſie likewiſe, he was in the end ſo enraged, that he went thither in his own perſon. And when he drew neer the place, Samuel before he ſaw him, made him propheſie alſo; ſo that he was tranſported out of himſelf, and having diſpoiled himſelf of his rayment, he remained naked all day and night in the preſence of Samuel and David. David departed from thence, and went to Jonathan, to whom he complained of thoſe ambuſhes which his Father had laid to intrap him, telling him, that notwithſtanding he had never committed any fault againſt his Father, he earneſtly purſued him to put him to death. Jonathan perſuaded him not to ſuſpect theſe things raſhly, nor to be over-G credulous to thoſe reports which parhaps might be brought to him, but truſt him only, who was aſſured that his Father intended no evil againſt him: For if he had, he would have told him, being never wont to act any thing without his counſel. But David ſware unto him that it was ſo, and conjured him not to doubt of it, but rather to conſider how H to procure his ſecurity, than by contemning his words, expect till his death aſcertained him of the truth thereof. He added that his Father did not communicate his counſels with him, becauſe he was aſſured of the love and friendſhip that was between them.

Jonathan, perſuaded by Davids reaſons, asked him what he deſired at his hands, or wherein he might ſhew him friendſhip? David ſaid unto him I know that thou wilt further me,

v. 5. ad 11. David deſired Jonathan to ſound his Father how he was affected towards him.

in what thou mayſt, and refuſe me in nothing. Now to morrow is the firſt day of the month, in which I was accuſtomed to dine at the Kings Table; if thou thinkeſt good, I will depart out of the City into the field where I will lie hid. And if he ask for me, thou ſhalt ſay, I am gone into the Countrey of Bethlehem, where my Tribe ſolemnizeth a feaſt; and thou ſhalt certifie him alſo that thou haſt given me leave. And if he I ſay God ſpeed him, which is an ordinary wiſh that friends uſe to ſuch as go a journey, know that he hath no hidden rancour, nor ſecret malice conceived againſt me; but if he and this ſhalt thou aſcertain me of, as both becometh my preſent calamity, and our mutual Servant: And if thou think me unworthy of this favour, and injurious towards thy Father, without expecting the ſentence of his juſtice, kill me now at this preſent with thine own Sword. Theſe laſt words ſo pierced Jonathans heart, that he promiſed him to accompliſh his requeſt and certifie him if he any wayes could perceive that his Father was ill affected towards him; and to the intent he might the better be believed, K he cauſed him to walk forth with him into the open air, and there ſware to him that he would not omit any thing that might tend to his preſervation. For (ſaid he) that God my mind; he, I ſay, ſhall bear witneſs of that accord which ſhall be between thee and me, that I will not ceaſe to ſound my Father, till I know his intention concerning thee; and as ſoon as I underſtand the ſame, I will not conceal it from thee, but give thee notice thereof, be it good or evil. The ſame God knoweth how inceſſantly I beſeech him to be aſſiſtant to thee, as alſo he is at this preſent: and that he never abandon thee, but make thee Lord over thine Enemies, yea, though it were my Father, or my ſelf.

Only remember me in this point, that after my death (If I chance to die before thee) L thou take care of my children, and be as favorable towards them, as I am affectionate to thee at this preſent. After he had ſworn this oath, he diſmiſſed David; willing him to conceal himſelf in a certain place of the Plain, where people ordinarily exerciſed themſelves: For that as ſoon as he underſtood his Fathers mind, he would return thither with his Page; and if (ſaith he) having ſhot three ſhafts at the mark, I command my Page to fetch them back again to me, know that thou art to expect no evil from my Father: but if I do not, think thou that my Father is incenſed and ill affected towards thee; yet howſoever it be, I will do my beſt, that nothing ſhall befall thee otherwiſe than we expect and wiſh. Be thou therefore mindful of theſe things when thou ſhalt obtain thy happy dayes, and be favorable to my children. David being confirmed M by Jonathans promiſes, retired to the apointed place. The next day after, which was the ſolemnity of the new-Moon after the King had purified himſelf according to the cuſtom, he ſate down to take his repaſt: and as his Son Jonathan was ſet on his right ſide, and Abner the General of his Army on the left, Saul perceived Davids place void, and ſpake not a word, ſuppoſing that he was abſent from that company, by reaſon he was not purified ſince he had the company of his Wife: but ſeeing that on the ſecond day of the new-Moon he was abſent likewiſe, he asked his Son Jonathan, why David was not preſent at the feaſt thoſe two days? He anſwered him, that he was gone into his countrey, (according as it had been concluded between them) where his own tribe celebrated a feaſt, and that he had given him leave to aſſiſt at the ſame. Further (ſaid he) he invited N me to the feaſt, and if it ſtand with your pleaſure, I will go thither, for you know how entirely I love the man. At this time Jonathan knew the diſpleaſure his Father had conceived againſt David, and perceived moſt apparently how heinouſly he was affected: for Saul could not conceal his choler, but began to rail upon his Son, calling him Rebel and Enemy, and companion and confederate with David; and telling him, that he ſhewed reverence neither to him, nor to his Mother, ſince he was ſo minded: and that he could not believe, that as long as David lived, their Royall eſtate could be ſafe:

v. 28, 29. Jonathan excuſing David to his Father, is almoſt ſlain with a javelin by him.

he commanded him therefore to bring him before him, to the end that he might do juſtice upon him. Jonathan replied, What evil hath David committed, for which he ſhould be puniſhed? Hereupon Saul not only expreſſed his choler in words and reproaches, O but took a javelin, to kill his Son; and had certainly ſlain him, had he not been reſtrained by his friends. Thus Jonathan clearly diſcovered the hatred of Saul
to

A to David, and how ardently he ſought his ruine, ſince his friendſhip to him had like to to have coſt him his own life. Then did Jonathan withdraw himſelf from the banquet without eating, ſeeing with how little profit he had pleaded: and ſeeing that David was adjudged to die, he paſſed all the night without ſleep; and about day-break he departed out of the City, to the appointed field, making ſhew that he walked out to take his exerciſe; but indeed it was to diſcover to his friend the intent which his Father had, according as it was covenanted between them. After Jonathan had done that which he promiſed, and ſent back his Page into the City, he came to David, both to ſee and ſpeak with him in private. David, as ſoon as he ſaw him, caſt himſelf at his feet, calling him the preſerver of his life. But Jonathan lifted him up from the earth, B and both of them embracing one another, and intermixing their mutual kiſſes for a long time, lamented their misfortune with tears, and this their ſeparation, which was no leſs grievous unto them, than death it ſelf. Finally, ſince there was no remedy, exhorting one another to have in perpetual remembrance their faith and friendſhip, they departed the one from the other.

v. 41, 42, 43.

David flying from the perſecution of Saul, retired to the City of Nob, to Abimelech the Prieſt: who wondred to ſee him come alone to him, without either friend or Servant, and deſired to know the cauſe why he thus wandred without any attendance. David told him, that the King had ſent him about ſome ſecret order, which might not be communicated to him, although he were deſirous to know it: and as touching my Servants, C (ſaid he) I have commanded them to attend me at a place appointed. He further deſired him, that he would give him ſuch things as were neceſſary for his journey; and ſome Arms, either Sword or Javelin. Now in this place was preſent one of Sauls Servants, called Doeg, a Syrian by Nation, and the Maſter of the Kings Mules. The Prieſt anſwered him, that he had no Arms by him, except Goliaths Sword which he himelf had hanged in the Tabernacle, and dedicated to God at ſuch time as he ſlew the Philiſtine. David having gotten it, fled out of the Countrey of the Hebrews, and went to Gath, a Countrey of the Philiſtines, where Achis was King. There being known by the Kings Servants, he was diſcovered to be that David, that had ſlain ſo many thouſand Philiſtines. David fearing to be put to death by him, and to fall into the ſame danger which he had eſcaped D by flying from Saul, counterfeited himſelf mad, ſo that he let the ſpittle iſſue out of his mouth; and he counterfeited in all things ſo cunningly, that he made the King of Gath believe that he was frantick. Whereupon the King was angry with his Servants, that they had brought him a mad-man, and commanded them forthwith, to drive him out of his countrey. Having in this ſort eſcaped out of the Countrey of Gath, he went to the Tribe of Juda, where hiding himſelf in the Cave of Adullam, he ſent to his Brothers to let them underſtand that he was there. They came to him with all their relations, and divers others, that either were in need, or ſtood in fear of Saul, reſorted unto him, offering to perform whatſoever he ſhould command them; they amounted in all to the number of four hundred. David therefore being thus aſſured, by the ſuccours E and forces that came to him, diſlodged from thence, and went to the King of the Moabites, beſeeching him, that he, and thoſe that accompanied him, might remain in that Countrey, till ſuch time as he underſtood what would be the iſſue of his affairs. The King vouchſafed him this favour, and treated them very well all the time they were in his Countrey. David went not out of it till he received inſtructions from the Prophet Samuel to abandon the Deſart, and return to the Tribe of Juda; which he obeyed, and coming to the City of Saron, made his abode there. But when Saul underſtood that David had been ſeen with a number of men, he fell into an extraordinary fear and trouble of mind; for knowing both the conduct and courage of the man, he thought that he would attempt no action that was not great, and ſuch as might endanger his Kingdom.
F For which cauſe, aſſembling his Friends and Captains, and thoſe of his own Tribe in Gaba (where he kept his Royal Court, and which ſtands upon a little Hill called Arvon) and accompanied with his Guards, and the Officers of his houſe, he ſpake to them from his throne, after this manner; I cannot believe that you have forgotten the benefits wherewith I have enriched you, and the honours to which I have advanced you: But I would know of you, whether you hope or expect greater from the Son of Jeſſe? for I am not ignorant of the affection which you bear him, and that my own Son hath inſpired the ſame into you. I know that Jonathan and he are united without my conſent in a very ſtrict alliance; that they have confirmed the ſame by oath, and that Jonathan aſſiſts David againſt me with all his power. Yet are none of you concerned at theſe things; but in great quiet you expect what will be the event of them.

him (ſaid he) not as your Enemy, but as your faithful Servant, and one of the princi- I pal Officers of your Army; and which is more, as your Son-in-law. For who would have thought, that one dignified with ſo much honour by you, ſhould be your Enemy? nay rather, who would not eſteem him for your favourite and neereſt friend? And whereas he asked counſel of me touching Gods will, this is not the firſt time I have anſwered him, but I have formerly done it often. And when he ſaid he was ſent by you about ſome ſpeedy and ſecret buſineſs, if I ſhould have refuſed him thoſe ſupplies which he required at my hands, I might have been judged to have done an injury to your Majeſty. Wherefore you ought not to think evil of me; or that if David at this time hath ſome ill deſign againſt you, that by reaſon of the courteſie I have ſhewed him, I either favour him or maintain him to your prejudice. Notwithſtanding all theſe juſt allegations, Saul could not be induced to believe him: but imagined that it K was fear that made Abimelech ſpeak in this manner, ſo that he commanded certain armed men that were about him, to put both him and all his family to the ſword. But when they excuſed themſelves becauſe it was no leſs than Sacriledge to violate, by violent death, ſuch perſons as were conſecrated unto God: Saul commanded Doeg the Syrian to commit the ſlaughter, who accordingly, with certain other ſacrilegious and impious men, murthered Abimelech and all his Race, who were in number three hundred thirty and five. He further ſent to Nob the City of the Prieſts, and put all of them to the ſword, ſparing neither woman nor child, and conſumed the whole City with fire; only one Son of Abimelech eſcaped, who was called Abiathar. All which came to paſs, according as God had foretold to the High Prieſt Eli, that, by reaſon of the tranſgreſſion L of his two Sons, his poſterity ſhould be extinguiſhed.

v. 18, 19. A manifeſt exemplification of that proverb, Honours change manners.

Note diligently.

This cruel and deteſtable act perpetrated by King Saul (in ſhedding the blood of all the Sacer-dotal Race, without either compaſſion of Infants, or reverence of old age, and his deſtroying of that City, which God had choſen to be the reſidence of the Prieſts and Prophets) manifeſtly ſhews how far the pravity of the mind of man may proceed. For ſo long as men are low, and limited by a private eſtate, becauſe they neither dare nor can give ſcope to their wicked inclinations, they ſeem good and juſt, and make ſhew of great love of juſtice, and of a ſence of pity, and are perſuaded that God is preſent in all our actions, and diſcerneth all our cogitations. But no ſooner do they attain to Power and Empire, but they lay aſide their former fair ſemblances, they take upon them as it were a new part, and another perſonage, becoming M *audacious and inſolent, and contemners of both Divine and Humane Laws. And though the height of their ſtation expoſing even their leaſt actions to the view of all the World, ought to make them comport themſelves irreprehenſibly,; yet as if they thought that God ſhut his eyes, or feared them, they will needs have him approve, and men account juſt all that their Fear, Hatred or Imprudence ſuggeſts to them, without troubling themſelves what will be the iſſue.
So that after having rewarded great ſervices with great honours, they are not contented to deprive thoſe that had ſo juſtly merited them, upon falſe reports and calumnies, but they alſo take away their lives not conſidering how deſervedly they oppreſs, but only giving credit without proof to raſh and ſcandalous detractions, executing and ſatiating their rage, not on thoſe they ought to puniſh, but on thoſe that may moſt eaſily be deſtroyed.* A manifeſt example whereof ap- N pears, in Saul the Son of Cis: who after the Government of the Nobility and that of the Judges, having been eſtabliſhed the firſt King of the Hebrews, ſlew three hundred Prieſts and Prophets, only for that he ſuſpected Abimelech; and after he had ſlain them, deſtroyed their City with fire; and as much as in him lay deprived the High Temple of God, of Prieſts, ſacred Miniſters; and after ſo hideous a ſlaughter, neither ſpared their Countrey nor any of their off-ſpring. But Abiathar, Abimelechs Son, who only eſcaped of all his family, flying to David, declared to him both the overthrow of his family, and the death of his Father. David anſwered him, that he expected no leſs than that which hapned at ſuch time as he eſpied Doeg there, who, as his mind gave him, would not fail to calum-niate Abimelech to Saul: yet he was extreamly ſorrowful for the miſfortune that hapned O to his friend by his means, and therefore prayed him to remain with him, becauſe he could not be concealed or ſecured in any place better than with himſelf.

v. 20. 21. Abiathar eſcaping from Sauls hands, telleth David of the ſlaughter of Abimelech his Father and of the Prieſts.

About

A About the ſame time, David underſtanding that the Philiſtines made an inroad into the Countrey of Ceila, and waſted the ſame, he determined to aſſault them, if after the Prophet had asked counſel of God, he ſhould be by the Oracle animated to it: which accordingly falling out, he ſallied out, accompained by his friends, and ſet upon the Philiſtines, and made a great ſlaughter of them, and recovered a very rich prey, and gave ſafeguard to the Ceilans, till they had ſafely gathered in and houſed all their Corn and fruit. The rumor of this his exploit was preſently brought to Saul: for this great action was not ſhut up within the limits of the place where it was performed, but the renown thereof was diſperſed every where, and both the Action and the Author thereof were highly commended. Saul was very joyful to hear that David was in Ceila, B imagining that God had delivered him into his hands, by leading him to ſhut up himſelf in a City incloſed with Walls, Gates, and Barrs; whereupon he ſuddenly gave commandement to his Soldiers to march againſt Ceila, and beſiege the ſame, and not to raiſe the Siege till David were either taken or ſlain.

v. 7, 8. Saul ſeeketh to beſiege David in Cilla.

But David having intelligence hereof, and advertiſed by God, that if he ſtayed among the Ceilans, they would deliver him into the hands of Saul, took with him his four hundred men, and withdrew himſelf from the City into the Deſart, and encamped on a hill called Engaddi. Whereof the King being advertized, forbore to ſend out an Army againſt him. From thence David departed into the territories of Ziph, where Jonathan, Sauls Son, met him, and after embraces, exhorted him to be of good courage C and to conceive aſſured hope of future good fortune, and not to give place to his preſent miſeries, becauſe he ſhould one day obtain the Kingdom, and have the whole State of the Hebrews ſubject to him; but that ſuch things were not wont to happen, till after ſuffering great Travels: and after they had once more renewed the oath of mutual Amity and Faith between them, for all the time of their lives, calling God to witneſs with imprecations againſt him, that ſhould fail therein; Jonathan left David ſomewhat eaſed in heart, and diſburthened of his fear; and returned to his own home. But the Ziphians to gratifie Saul told him, that David was amongſt them, and promiſed to deliver him priſoner into his hands, if ſo be he would oome out againſt him: for if he would ſeize all the ſtraights of the Countrey, it ſhould be impoſſible for him to flie into D any other place. The King praiſed their fidelity, and promiſed them to requite it, and to remunerate them ſhortly for this their good affection; and withall ſent out certain men to ſeek out David, and to break over the Foreſt, promiſing them that ſhortly he would follow after them. Thus did the Governours and Princes of the Ziphians offer themſelves to the King to ſearch out and apprehend him, expreſſing their affection therein, not only in outward ſhew, but alſo with their whole power, labouring what they might, that ſurprizing him, they might deliver him into the Kings hands. But their unjuſt deſire had as unfortunate ſucceſs; (wicked people as they were) who being to incur no peril by concealing him from purſuit, promiſed to betray him into the Kings hands, through adulation and avarice, a man that was both vertous, and wrongfully E perſecuted to death by his Enemies. For David being informed of their malice, and of the Kings approach, quitted thoſe narrow ſtraights wherein he then encamped and eſcaped to a certain Rock ſituate in the Deſart of Simon. Saul continued to purſue him; and knowing by the way that he had overcome the ſtraights, he came to the other ſide of the Rock, where David had ſurely been taken, had not the King been revoked by tidings, which aſſured him that the Philiſtines had forcibly entred and ſpoyled his Kingdom. For he thought it more conveninet to revenge himſelf on thoſe his publick and open Enemies, and to give ſuccor to his Countrey and people, being ready to be ſpoiled and waſted; than out of deſire to lay hands on a private Enemy, to betray both his Countrey and Subjects to their Swords: and thus was David ſaved beyond all expectation, and F he retired himſelf to the ſtraights of Engaddi. But after Saul had repelled the Philiſtines, certain news was brought him that David was in the ſtraights of Engaddi: whereupon, preſently taking with him three thouſand of the choiceſt men in all his Army, he led them ſpeedily to the forenamed placeand being not far from thence, he perceived near the high way a deep and large Cave, where David with his four hundred men were hid, and he deſcended alone into the Cave to diſburthen the neceſſities of nature. This was preſently diſcovered by one of Davids followers, who told him, that God had preſented him a fit opportunity to revenge him on his Enemy, and counſelled him to cut off Sauls head, and to diſcharge himſelf thereby of further trouble. But David ariſing and finding him out, only cut off the lap of the veſture wherewith Saul was attired, and preſently G thereupon repented himſelf, ſaying, that it were a wicked deed in him to kill his Lord, whom God by Election had raiſed to the eſtate of Majeſty and Empire. For (ſaid he) although he be unjuſt toward me, yet ought I not to be injurious towards him who is my Lord.

But when Saul was gon out of the Cave, David followed him, and cryed with a loud voice, beſeeching Saul to give him audience. Saul turning back to him, David caſt himſelf proſtrate at his feet according to the cuſtome, and ſpake after this manner; How unworthy is it for thee, O King, that opening thy ears to ſcandalous backbiters, and giving truſt and credit to vain and looſe men, thou ſuſpecteſt thy moſt faithfull friends, whom thou rather oughteſt to judge by their ſincere and upright actions? for words may be either falſe or true, but the mind can be deſcovered by no more apparent arguments than by mens actions: as at this preſent thou mayeſt judge, whether thou haſt raiſhly believed them, that make me guilty before thy Majeſty, of that crime that was never yet ſo much as in my thought, and who have ſo much exaſperated thee againſt me, that day and night thou thinkeſt on nothing more than my deſtruction? Seeſt thou not now how vain thy opinion is, whereby they perſuade thee, that I am an Enemy of thy houſe, and earneſtly deſirous of thy death? Or with what eyes thinkeſt thou doth God behold thy cruelty, who ſeekeſt the death of him, who having an opportunity offered him to be revenged on thee, ſpareth thy life; whoſe life were it in thy hands, were aſſuredly loſt? For as eaſily might I have cut off thy head as this lap of thy garment (and therewithall, in confirmation of his words, he ſhewed it him) yet did I forbear this juſt revenge. But God ſhall bear witneſs hereof, and ſhall condemn him of us two that ſhall be found the moſt culpable. Saul amazed to ſee how ſtrangely his life had been preſerved, and to conſider the vertue and generoſity of David, began to weep, and David wept alſo: but Saul ſaid that he had greater cauſe to lament than he. For, ſaid he, by thy means have I received many benefits, and thou at my hands haſt been repayed with infinite injuries. This day haſt thou teſtified that thou retaineſt the ancient juſtice of our anceſtors, who inſtead of taking away the lives of their Enemies when they found them at advantage, accounted it glorious to ſpare them. Now I no longer doubt that God hath reſerved the Kingdom for thee, and that the Empire of all the Hebrews attendeth thee. Aſſure thou me therefore by an oath, that thou wilt not exterminate my Race, or remember thoſe injuries that I have done unto thee, but that ſparing my poſterity, thou wilt keep them under thy protection. David ſware to him according as he had required, and ſuffered him to return into his Realm, and both he and his companies retired themſelves to the ſtraights of Maſpha. About the ſame time died Samuel the Prophet, a man who for his merit was in great eſtimation amongſt the Hebrews; the teſtimony of whoſe vertue, and the peoples obſervance towards him, was expreſſed in this, that they celebrated his funeral, with great pomp: and when they had performed his rites, they buried him in Ramath his Countrey, and lamented his death many dayes, not only as a common loſs, but as if each one of them had in particular been allied to him. For he was a man naturally framed to all juſtice and Goodneſs, and for theſe his vertues moſt acceptable to God. He governed the people after the death of Eli the High Prieſt, firſt in his own perſon, for the ſpace of twelve years, and afterwards during the Reign of Saul eighteen years. But in thoſe places where David at that time remained, there was a certain Ziphian in a Town called Emma, a man very rich, and owner of much cattel: named Nabal, for he had a Troop of three thouſand Sheep, and a Herd of a thouſand Goats. David forbid his people to meddle with any of his goods for any neceſſity, or pretext whatſoever, becauſe that to violate and take another mans goods, was a wicked thing, and contrary to Gods commandment. He inſtructed them in this ſort, imagining with himſelf, that he gratified a good man, and ſuch an one as deſerved to be in like ſort favoured: but Nabal was a rude and churliſh perſon and very miſchievous; yet had he a Wife that was good, wiſe and fair.

v. 7, ad 12. Davids Embaſſage to Nabal to require relief; and his curr: h anſwer.

To this Nabal did David ſend ten of his Servants about the time of his Sheep-ſhearing, both to ſalute him, and to wiſh him all ſort of proſperity for many years, and alſo to deſire him, that he would impart to him ſomething for the ſuſtenance of his company, ſince his Shepherds could inform him, that having long remained in the deſart, they had been ſo far from doing his flocks any harm, that they had rather ſeemed their Shepherds and keepers. He added, that whatſoever courteſie he ſhould ſhew to David, he ſhould beſtow it on a mindful and thankful perſonage. Thus ſpake the Meſſengers to Nabal: but he anſwered them very diſcourteouſly, and rudely, demanding of them what that David was? and being informed that he was the Son of Jeſſe: what (ſaid he) a fugitive, who hids himſelf, for fear of falling into his Maſters hands, is become audacious and imperious?

v. 13, ad 17. David ſallieth out againſt Nabal with 400 Armed men.

David, was grievouſly diſpleaſed at theſe words, and commanded four hundred of his men to take their Weapons and follow him, and two hundred to keep the Baggage (for at that time he had ſix hundred) and in this equipage he marched forward againſt Nabal, ſwearing that, that very night he would utterly exterminate and root out all his Race, and deſtroy his riches. Neither was he only diſpleaſed that Nabal was ingrateful

A towards them, without reſpect of that humanity which they had ſhewed towards him and his: but alſo, that without any cauſe of injury offered, he had injured and outraged him in words.

The year of the World, 1889. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1075.

In the mean while, certain Shepherds that tended Nabal's Cattel, told their Miſtreſs, that David having ſent to her Husband to deſire ſome ſmall courteſie, had not only obtained nothing, but alſo received inſupportable injuries, whereas till that day, he had ſuffered his flocks to be untouched: telling her, that that inſolency of their Lord, might breed them all much miſchief. Which when Abigail heard, (for ſo was the Woman called) ſhe loaded divers Aſſes with all ſorts of Preſents, (without giving any notice to her Husband, who was ſo drunk, that he was inſenſible) and went towards David; B who, as he deſcended the ſtraights of the Mountain, marching towards Nabal, accompanied with 400 Men, met her. As ſoon as Abigail perceived him, ſhe leaped from her Horſe, and falling on her face, proſtrated herſelf before him, beſeeching him to paſs by Nabals words, knowing that Nabals nature was anſwerable to his name; for in the Hebrew tongue, Nabal ſignifieth Folly: ſhe excuſed her ſelf likewiſe, ſaying, That ſhe ſaw none of them that were ſent to her Husband. For which cauſe, (ſaid ſhe) I beſeech thee to pardon us, and to conſider what cauſe thou haſt to give God thanks, that by my means he hath hindered thee from polluting thy hands in innocent blood: for if thou remain pure and innocent from bloodſhed, thou wilt engage him to puniſh thy enemies, and to bring upon their heads that deſtruction which was ready to fall upon that of Nabal. I confeſs that thy anger againſt him is C juſt, but be pleas'd to moderate it for my ſake, who have no ſhare in his fault; ſince Goodneſs and Clemency are virtues worthy of a Man whom God deſigns one day for a Kingdom, accept of theſe ſmall Preſents which I offer thee. David accepting her Preſents, gave her an anſwer after this manner: Woman, ſaid he, God of his goodneſs hath this day brought thee hither, otherwiſe thou hadſt not liv'd, or ſeen the next morning. For I have ſworn, that this night I would overthrow thy houſe, and leave none alive of that ungrateful Mans family, who hath ſo contumeliouſly abuſed both me and mine: but now God hath put thee in mind wiſely to prevent and pacifie my wrath.

Ver. 35. Nabal ſignifieth a Fool.

As for Nabal, although at this preſent he be exempted by thy means from puniſhment, yet ſhall he not eſcape, but he ſhall periſh ſome other way. This ſaid, he diſmiſſed Abigail: who D returning to her houſe, and finding her Husband amidſt his Companions, laden with Wine, told him nothing at that time of that which had hapned: but the next day, recounting to him what was paſs'd, he was ſo much terrified by the greatneſs of the danger, that he dyed within ten dayes. Which when David underſtood, he ſaid that he was deſervedly puniſhed by God, becauſe his own wickedneſs was the cauſe of his puniſhment, giving thanks unto God, that he had not dipped his hands in blood: and by this example he learnt, that no wicked Man can eſcape Gods judgment; and that humane affairs depend not on Chance, as if neglected by God, but that the good are rewarded, and the wicked puniſhed, according to their wickedneſs. He afterwards ſent Meſſengers to Nabals Wife, and cauſed her to come unto him, to the intent he might E marry her. She anſwered the Meſſengers, That ſhe thought herſelf unworthy to lie at his feet; notwithſtanding, ſhe repaired to him with a good equipage, and was married to David, having obtained that degree of honour by her modeſty and beauty. Now David had a Wife before named Abindam, whom he had married out of the City of Abeſar.

As touching Michol the Daughter of Saul, and other-whiles his Wife, Saul gave her to Wife at Liſſa, to the Son of Phalti of the City of Gethla. After this, certain Ziphians coming to Saul, told him, that David was returned again into their Countrey, and that if it pleaſed him to aſſiſt them, they might eaſily apprehend him. Whereupon Saul took the Field with 3000 Men, and being ſurprized by Night, he encamped in a certain place called Siceleg.

But this he ſaid, that although the King were wicked, yet ſince he was appointed by God himſelf, he could not attempt any thing G againſt his life, and be innocent: for that it was Gods right to take vengeance on him, to whom he had given the Kingdom: and thus reſtrained he the others fury. Yet to the intent he might certifie the King, that having the opportunity to ſlay him, he ſpared

H his life; he bare away with him his Javelin, and the Pitcher of water that ſtood by Saul whil'ſt he ſlept, without the knowledge of any of the Camp: ſo much were they devoured and overwhelmed with ſleep. He therefore departed thence in all aſſurance, having executed all that which either the time or his courage would permit him to do. But after he had paſſed the River, and had attained the top of a Mountain, from whence he might be eaſily heard, he cryed out to Sauls Soldiers, and their General Abner ſo loud, that he awaked them from their ſleep; and calling unto Abner, as well as the common ſort of Soldiers, the General asked, Who it was that called him? to whom David anſwered, It is I, the Son of Jeſſe your Fugitive: but, ſaid he, How cometh it to paſs, that thou who art ſo great, and in chiefeſt authority about the King, haſt ſo ſmall reſpect and guard of his perſon? Aſſuredly this I *act of thine deſerveth a capital puniſhment, becauſe thou neither haſt diſcovered me, nor any others before we entred the Camp, or approached the King. A ver. 21, ad finem. Saul praiſeth David, and willeth him to be of good courage, and exhorteth him to return to his own houſe.

Saul perceiving that it was Davids voice, and ſeeing that through the negligence of his Guards, it had been eaſie for him to have ſlain him, which (after ſo many provocations) would not have ſeem'd ſtrange to any man, he acknowledged himſelf indebted to him for his life, exhorting him to be aſſured, and without ſuſpecting any evil, to return home unto his houſe, becauſe he was perſuaded, that he loved not himſelf ſo much, as he was beloved by David; notwithſtanding that he had purſued him, and for a long time K had chaſed him like a Fugitive, conſtraining him by divers perſecutions, to forſake his deareſt Friends: and inſtead of rewarding his ſervices, had reduc'd him to the utmoſt extremities. Hereupon David willed him to ſend ſome one of his Servants to bring back his Javelin and Pitcher of water: proteſting that God ſhould be Judge of both their natures, manners, and actions, who knew that that day alſo he had ſpared his Enemy, whom if he had thought good, he might have deſtroyed.

1 Sam. 27. 1. David declareth his innocency to Saul. Saul deſiſteth to perſecute David.

Ver. 8, ad fin. David with ſix hundred men, and his two wives, went into Paleſtine to Achis King of Gitia.

David requireth a certain place at the Kings hands to make his habitation in.

The King giveth him Siceleg.

David ſpoiled the Sarrites and Amalekites, and giveth part of the prey to the King, perſuading him, that he took it from the Jews that inhabited the South Plain.

David having thus the ſecond time ſpared Saul's life, and not willing to continue any longer in a Countrey, where he might be in danger of falling at length into the hands of his Enemies, he thought good to retire into the Countrey of the Philiſtines, and ſojourn there. So that accompanied with 600 Men which he had with him, he went to Achis L King of Gath, one of their five Cities; who received him kindly, and gave him a place to dwell in: ſo that he abode in Gath, having with him his two Wives, Atchimaas and Abigail. Which when Saul underſtood, he troubled him no more, becauſe he had twice been in danger of his life, whil'ſt he purſued him. David held it not convenient to remain in the City of Gath, and therefore requeſted the King of the Philiſtines, that he would aſſign him ſome part of his Countrey, where he might make his habitation, becauſe he feared to be chargeable to him, if he remained in the City. Achis aſſigned to him a Village called Siceleg, which David, after he obtained the Kingdom, loved ſo well, that he purchaſed the perpetual inheritance of it, after he came to the Crown. But hereof will we ſpeak in another place. The time that David lived amongſt the Philiſtines, M and in the Town of Siceleg, were four months and twenty days; during which time, by ſeveral excurſions againſt the bordering Sarrites and Amalekites, he ſpoiled their Countrey, and returned back again with a great booty of Oxen and Camels: yet brought he thence no Bondmen, leſt Achis by their means ſhould thereby have intelligence into what Countrey he had made his inroad. He ſent likewiſe a part of the prey unto the King, and when he demanded from whom he had taken it? he anſwer'd, That he had taken it from the Jews that dwelt Southward and in the Plain: ſo that Achis conceived an opinion, that ſince David warred againſt his own Nation all the time of his abode with him, he would be a faithful Servant to him. About the ſame time, the Philiſtines having determined to lead forth their Army againſt the Iſraelites, ſent to their Allies, requiring N them to aſſiſt them in that War, and to make their Rendezvous at Renga, to the intent that being there aſſembled, they might diſlodge and aſſail the Iſraelites. Amongſt the other their Auxiliary Companies, Achis had requeſted David to aſſiſt him with his 600 Soldiers: which he promiſed readily, telling him, That the time was now come wherein he might requite his kindneſs, and the hoſpitality he had ſhewen him. Achis promiſed him, that after the Victory, when all things ſhould have ſucceeded according as he deſired, he would prefer David to be Captain of his Guard; thinking by the promiſe of this honour and truſt, he might augment Davids forwardneſs and affection toward him.

CHAP. XV.

The Philiſtines renew their War againſt the Hebrews, and obtain the Victory: Saul with his Sons, are ſlain in the Battel.

The year of the World, 2809. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1074.

Saul having advice, that the Philiſtines were advanced as far as Sunam, drew out his Forces, and encamped over againſt them; but when he perceived their Army to be much more numerous than his, his heart failed him, and deſiring the Prophets to enquire of God, what ſhould be the event of this War? and receiving no anſwer, his fear was B doubled, ſince he had reaſon to believe that God had forſaken him. Hereupon his courage abated, and in this perplexity he reſolved to have recourſe to Magick; but having lately baniſhed the Inchanters, Magicians, and ſuch as pretended to tell Fortunes, it could hardly be expected that one of them ſhould be found: but yet he commanded that they ſhould enquire for one of thoſe that could raiſe the ſpirits of the dead, and by their information learn what ſhould come to paſs hereafter. And being advertiſed that there was ſuch an one at Endor, without the knowledge of his Army, laying aſide his Royal Habits, and attended onely by two of his moſt faithful ſervants, he repaired to Endor to this Woman, requiring her to divine and raiſe up the ſpirit of him whom he ſhould name. The Woman denied, and ſaid, That ſhe ought not to offend againſt the Kings C Edict, who had driven out of his Realm all ſuch ſort of Soothſayers, telling him, that he did not well, who having received no wrong at her hands, ſhould endeavor to lay a ſnare to bring her into a Crime which might coſt her her life. But Saul ſwore unto her, That no man ſhould know thereof, and that he would not diſcover her divination to others: and that ſhe ſhould incur no danger thereby.

1 *Sam.*28.3,7, 8,9. Saul baniſheth all diviners and enchanters out of his Kingdom. Ver. 6. Saul hearing the Philiſtines make head againſt him, asked counſel of God. Saul repaireth to Endor, to ask counſel of a Sorcereſs. Ver. 8,9.

After that by his Oaths and Proteſtations he had perſuaded her, that ſhe ſhould have no cauſe to fear, he commanded her to raiſe the ſpirit of Samuel. She not knowing what Samuel was, called him, and he ſuddenly appeared. But when ſhe perceived ſomewhat divine, or more than ordinary, in his countenance, ſhe was troubled; and turning to the King, ſhe asked him, If he were Saul? for Samuel had certified her no leſs. Saul confeſ- D ſed that it was he, and asked her, For what cauſe ſhe ſeemed to be ſo much troubled? She anſwered, That ſhe ſaw a Man aſcend, that reſembled God. Saul commanded her to declare unto him his ſhape, habit, and age: ſhe told him, That he was a reverend old Man, attired in the veſtment of an High Prieſt. By theſe marks Saul knew that it was Samuel: whereupon, proſtrating himſelf on the earth, he adored him. The ſpirit of Samuel asked him, For what cauſe he had troubled him? To whom he complained, That he was inforced thereunto by neceſſity: for that a mighty Hoſt of his Enemies were at hand, and that he was forſaken by God, having from him no anſwer, either by Propheſie or Dream: wherefore, ſaid he, I apply my ſelf unto thee, who haſt alwayes expreſſed great kindneſs towards me. But Samuel foreſeeing that the Kings end drew nigh, anſwer'd him, It was in vain for thee to enquire E concerning thoſe things that ſhall happen, ſince thou knoweſt that thou art forſaken of God. Know therefore, ſaid he, that David ſhall poſſeſs the Kingdom, and that it is he that ſhall eſtabliſh the State by Arms: but thou ſhalt loſe both thy Kingdom and thy life, becauſe thou haſt diſobeyed God in thy War againſt the Amalekites, and haſt not obſerved his Commandments, according as I foretold thee when I was alive. Know therefore that thy People and Hoſt ſhall be diſcomfited by the Enemy, and that both thou and thy ſons ſhall be to morrow ſlain in the Battel, and be with me. When Saul underſtood theſe things, he became ſpeechleſs, through ſorrow, and fell down on the ground, either becauſe his ſtrength failed him through ſudden grief, or for want of food; becauſe he had eaten nothing that night, nor the day before.

Saul commandeth the Witch to raiſe Samuels ghoſt, v. 10, 11. Ver. 15. Saul complaineth of his miſeries to Samuel, and asketh his advice. A ver. 16, ad 20. Samuels ghoſt certifieth Saul of the event of his battel againſt the Philiſtines. Ver. 20,21. Saul through ſudden ſorrow fell in a ſwoon.

F At length, hardly recovering himſelf out of his Swoon, the Woman importuned him to receive ſome ſuſtenance, telling him, that ſhe deſired no other reward for the hazard which ſhe had run of forfeiting her life, before ſhe knew that he was the King himſelf, by whoſe Commands thoſe Divinations had been lately prohibited: wherefore ſhe prayed him that he would ſit down at the Table, and refreſh himſelf, that he might be the more able to return unto his Army. And although he refuſed to eat, becauſe he had no appetite, and was utterly deſperate; yet ſhe ſo effectually importuned him, that at length ſhe perſuaded him to receive ſome little nouriſhment. And whereas ſhe had but one Calf, (for ſhe was but a poor Woman, and had no other riches) yet ſpared ſhe not to kill it, and dreſs it for Saul and his Retinue. After which, Saul returned to his Camp. G The courteſie of this Woman deſerveth to be praiſed: for, although ſhe knew that the King had prohibited the exerciſe of her Art, whereby both ſhe and her Family were well maintained, and although before that time ſhe had never ſeen Saul; yet without remem-remembring that it was he by whom her Art had been condemned, ſhe entertained him H not as a ſtranger, or like the man ſhe had never ſeen before; but had compaſſion on him, and comforted him, exhorting him to eat, although he refuſed it, and preſented him willingly with that little which ſhe had in her poverty. Which ſhe did not upon any hope of recompence, or preferment (knowing well that Saul ſhould ſhortly loſe his life) nor according to the ordinary courſe of men, that naturally honour thoſe that have beſtowed ſome dignity upon them, and become ſerviceable to thoſe from whom they expect to receive ſome profit hereafter. She therefore ought to be imitated, and in her appeareth an excellent example of bounty, approving that there is nothing more worthy of praiſe, than to relieve thoſe that are in neceſſity, without expecting any recompence; I ſince it is a piece of Generoſity ſo agreeable to the nature of the Deity, that in all probability nothing will more induce him than this, to treat us alſo with the like favour. I may add hereunto another Reflection, which may be uſeful unto all Men, but more eſpecially to Kings, Princes, and Magiſtrates, which may kindle in them a deſire and affection to addict themſelves to Noble actions, and to encourage them to embrace dangers, yea, death it ſelf; and teach them to endure all difficulties whatſoever, for their Countries cauſe; which we may ſee in this Hiſtory of Saul. For, although he knew that which ſhould befall him, and that his death was at hand, (according as it had been foretold him) yet reſolved he not to avoid the ſame; neither ſo loved he his life, that for the conſervation thereof, he would deliver up his People into the hands of their Enemies, K nor diſhonour his Royal dignity: but himſelf, with his children, and all his houſhold, expoſed themſelves to danger; thinking it more honourable to die in fighting for his Subjects, and far more expedient, that his children ſhould die like valiant Men, than live in diſhonor; ſuppoſing that he ſhould have ſufficient Succeſſors of his Race, if he left behind him a perpetual memory and praiſe both of him and his. For which cauſe (in my opinion) he was both juſt, valiant, and prudent, and if any one either is or hath been like unto him, I ſuppoſe that it becometh all Men to give teſtimony of ſuch a Mans virtue. For I think that the Hiſtorians and ancient Writers, have not worthily intituled them with the ſtile of valiant Men, who attaining ſome worthy actions, attempted War under aſſured hope of victory and ſafety; but they only, that imitate Saul, may deſervedly be called juſt, praiſe-worthy, couragious, hardy, and contemners of all dangers. L For what great thing is there in undertaking of the common hazard of War, and toſſed, 'twixt hope and fear, to uſe Fortunes favor if ſhe fawn upon us? But on the other ſide, it is an aſſured ſign of a valiant Man, when without hope of any ſucceſs, and knowing his death at hand, he is not afraid nor diſmayed with ſuch apprehenſions, but ſeeketh out with an invincible courage his moſt aſſured hazard.

This is the praiſe of Saul, who is an example to all that deſire to eternize their memory, that ſhould upon the like opportunity propoſe the ſame reſolution to themſelves: but eſpecially to Kings, who, by reaſon of the excellency of their Function, ought not only to forbear to be evil, but alſo ſtrive to be eminently virtuous. I could ſay more of this generous argument of Sauls Valor, but leſt I ſhould ſeem too affectionate, I will re- M turn to our former purpoſe.

1 Sam. 28. 1, ad 5.
1 Sam. 29. 3, ad finem.
Achis leadeth out David with him againſt the Hebrews, and is reproved by the Chieftains of the Philiſtines for ſo doing.

After that the Philiſtines were thus encamped, and had numbred their Forces according to their Nations, Kingdoms, and Governors, King Achis came at laſt with his company, whom David followed, accompanied with 600 Soldiers: whom when the Chieftains of the Philiſtines beheld, they asked the King, Whence thoſe Hebrews came, and what their Leaders name was? Who anſwered, That it was David, who fled from Saul his Maſter, and how he had entertained him again; how David, in recompence of the kindneſs he had received, and to avenge himſelf on Saul, was ready to fight for them againſt him. But the Chieftains blamed him, becauſe he had choſen an Enemy for his Aſſociate, adviſing him to diſmiſs him, leſt he ſhould (as he might find occaſion) turn his Arms againſt them, becauſe N (ſaid they) he hath now a fit opportunity to reconcile himſelf to his Maſter. They therefore adviſ'd him to ſend David back with his 600 Soldiers unto the place which he had given him to inhabit, becauſe it was the ſame David of whom the Damſels made Songs, ſinging in praiſe of him, that he had ſlain many thouſand Philiſtines. When the King of Geth underſtood theſe things, he approved their counſel: for which cauſe, calling David unto him, he ſaid unto him, The knowledge which I have had of your Valor and

Ver. 10. 11. Achis diſmiſſeth David.

Fidelity, hath made me deſirous to employ you in this War; but our Captains will not allow of it: wherefore retire thy ſelf to the place which I have given thee, without conceiving any evil ſuſpition of me. There ſhalt thou be in Gariſon, to prevent the Enemy from foraging our Countrey: and in ſo doing, thou ſhalt partly aſſiſt me in the War. Hereupon, David departed O unto Siceleg, according as the King had commanded him.

But

A But during the time that David was in the Camp, and attended on the Philiſtines War, the Amalekites made an Incurſion, and took Siceleg by force, and burnt the City: and after they had gathered a great booty both in that place, and in other villages of the Philiſtines Countrey, they retired back again. Now when David arrived at Siceleg, and found it wholly ſpoiled, and ſeeing likewiſe that his two Wives, and the Wives of his Companions were Priſoners, together with their Children; he preſently rent his Garments, and and abandoned himſelf to grief: beſide this, his Companions were ſo much enraged with the Captivity of their Wives and Children, that they were ready to ſtone him to death; accuſing him, that he was the cauſe of all which had hapned. But when his grief was abated, and he returned to himſelf, he lifted up his heart unto God; and B commanded the High-Prieſt Abiathar to put on the Ephod, and ask counſel of God; and that done, to declare unto him how he might overtake the Amalekites, if he ſhould purſue them; and whether he ſhould recover his Wives and Children, that they had led away, and revenge himſelf of his Enemies. As ſoon as the High-Prieſt had certified him that he might purſue them, he ſallied out with 600 Soldiers, and purſued the Enemy: and drawing near unto the River, he found a certain ſtragler, an Egyptian by Nation, very faint and feeble, through want and famine, having for three dayes ſpace wandered in the Deſart without any ſuſtenance; whom, after he had refreſhed with meat and drink, he asked, to whom he belonged, and what he was? The Egyptian told him his Countrey, and how he had been left in that place by his Maſter, becauſe that through his weakneſs it was C impoſſible for him to follow them. He confeſſed likewiſe, that his Maſter was one of the number of thoſe that had burned and ſacked, not only other quarters of Judea, but Siceleg alſo. David taking this Man for his Guide, overtook them, finding ſome of them lying on the ground, others banquetting and debauching, and almoſt ſenſleſs by overmuch drink: wherefore being not in a condition to defend themſelves, he fell upon them, and ſlew ſo great a number, that ſcarce 400 Men eſcaped; for the ſlaughter continued from Noon until the Evening: So recovered he all that which the Enemy had ranſackt, and releaſed both his own Wives, and thoſe of his Companions. Whereupon they returned to the place where they had left the other 200, which could not follow them, becauſe they were appointed to guard the Baggage: To theſe, the 400 would not grant a part D of the Booty, becauſe they had not (as they ſaid) followed the Enemy with them, but ſhewed themſelves ſlack in the purſuit; alledging, that they ought to content themſelves with the recovery of their Wives. But David thought the ſentence pronounced againſt them to be unjuſt, for ſince they had defeated their Enemies, all of them deſerved to partake of profit, which ought equally to be divided, both amongſt thoſe that fought, and amongſt thoſe that ſtayed behind to guard the Baggage. And from that day forward, this Law hath been firmly obſerved amongſt them, that they that guard the Baggage ſhould have an equal part of the prey with thoſe that go out to Battel. But when David was returned to Siceleg, he ſent unto his Friends of the Tribe of Juda, a part of the ſpoil. In this manner was Siceleg ſacked and burned, and thus were the Amalekites diſcomfited.

E But the Philiſtines fought a bloody Battel with Saul, wherein they got the Victory, and ſlew a great number of their Enemies. Saul, King of Iſrael, with his Sons, fought valiantly, and ſeeing that there was no hopes of conquering, they endeavoured to die as honourably as they could. For ſince the Philiſtines bent all their Forces againſt them, they could not make good their Retreat, ſo that, incompaſſed by them, they died in the midſt of them, and yet before their death, ſlew a great number of their Enemies. There were there preſent Sauls three ſons, Jonathan, Aminadab, and Melchi: who being defeated, the Hebrew Army turned their backs: ſo that being cloſely purſued by the Enemy, there was a great ſlaughter made: Saul, with thoſe about him, retreated in good order. And although the Philiſtines drew out againſt him a multitude of Archers that ſhot maF ny Darts and Arrows at him, yet were they all but a very few repulſed: and although he had fought very bravely, having received divers wounds, yet being unable any longer to ſupport himſelf, he commanded his Eſquire to draw his Sword, and to thruſt it through his Body, before he ſhould be taken alive by his Enemies: which he refuſed, not daring to lay hands upon his Maſter. Whereupon Saul drew his own Sword, and ſetting it to his Breaſt, caſt himſelf thereon; but unable to force it home enough, he looked back, and ſaw a young man behind him, whom he asked, What he was? and hearing that he was an Amalekite, he requeſted him, That he would kill him, that he might not fall alive into the hands of his Enemies: which he did; and having taken from him the Gold which he had about his arms, and the Royal Crown, he fled. The Eſquire ſeeing Saul G dead, preſently ſlew himſelf: Not one of all the Kings Guard eſcaped, but they were all ſlain near unto the Mountain Gilboa. When they that inhabited the Valley on the other ſide of Jordan, and in the Plain, had intelligence that Saul and his ſons were dead, and

and with them a great number of their Nation was ſlain, they abandoned their Cities, H and fled to others that were better fortified. The Philiſtines finding theſe Cities deſtitute of Inhabitants, ſeized on them. The next day whil'ſt the Philiſtines ſpoiled the dead, they found the bodies of Saul and his ſons, which they ſpoiled and beheaded, ſending their Heads round about the Countrey, to make it known that their Enemies were defeated. They offered up their Arms alſo in the Temple of Aſtaroth, and their Bodies they hung on the Walls of the City of Bethſan, at this day called Scythopolis. When they of Jabes, a City of Galaad, underſtood how the Philiſtines had cut off the Heads of Saul and his ſons, they were enraged, and thought it became them not to be unconcerned: whereupon the moſt valiant amongſt them, went out and marched all night, till they came to Bethſan, and approaching near the Walls, they took down the Bodies of I Saul and his ſons, and carried them unto Jabes, without any oppoſition of the Enemy. Theſe men of Jabes lamented over the dead Bodies, and buried them in the beſt part of their Countrey, called Arar. Thus they mourned, both Men, Women, and Children, beating their Breaſts, and lamenting for the King and his ſons, and taſting neither meat nor drink. This was the end of Saul, according as Samuel had foretold him, becauſe he diſobeyed God in his War againſt the Amalekites, and becauſe he had ſlain Abimelech, and all the Sacerdotal Race, and deſtroyed the City of the Prieſts. He Reigned, during the life of Samuel, the ſpace of 18 years, and 22 years after his death.

CHAP. I.

David is created King of one Tribe in Hebron: over the reſt, Saul's Son obtaineth the Sovereignty.

D THis Battel was fought on the ſame day that David returned Conqueror to Siceleg, after he had ſubdued the Amalekites. But about three days after his return, he that ſlew Saul, and had eſcaped from the Battel, having his garment rent, and aſhes upon his head, came and caſt himſelf proſtrate before David: and being asked from whence he came? he anſwered, from the Battel of the Iſraelites; and certified David of the unhappy event: telling him, that many thouſands of the Hebrews were ſlain, and that Saul himſelf and his Sons were fallen in the conflict. He likewiſe related, how he himſelf retreated amongſt the Hebrews, when the King fled: confeſſing that he had ſlain him, that he might not fall alive into the hands of his enemy: For (ſaid he) Saul E having caſt himſelf upon the point of his ſword, was ſo weak, by reaſon of the agony of his wounds, that he could not diſpatch himſelf. Thereupon he produced the bracelets, and the Royal Crown which he took from him. David perceiving no cauſe whereby he ſhould doubt of his death, whereof he had moſt evident and infallible teſtimonies, rent his garments, and ſpent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions: but he was the more grieved for the loſs of his dear friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the preſerver of his life: And ſo affectionate ſhewed he himſelf towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes been in danger to have been ſlain by him, yet was he much troubled at his death; and not only ſo, but he likewiſe put to death him that ſlew him; telling him, that he himſelf had accuſed himſelf for ſlaying the King, and ſhown him-F ſelf by that parricide to be a true Amalekite. He compoſed likewiſe Lamentations and Epitaphs in the praiſe of Saul and Jonathan, which are yet extant. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his Lamentations and Obſequies, he asked counſel of God by the Prophet: What City of the Tribe of Juda he would give him to inhabit in? who anſwered him, That he would give him Hebron. For which cauſe he forſook Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his Wives and his Army.
All the people of the Tribe reſorted thither unto him, and proclaimed him King: where underſtanding how the Jabeſins had buried Saul and his Sons, he ſent Ambaſſadors unto them, both to praiſe and approve their actions, aſſuring them, that he allowed their act, and would recompenſe that kindneſs which they had ſhewed to the dead: giving them likewiſe G to underſtand, that the Tribe of Juda had choſen him for their King. But Abner the Son of Ner, General of Sauls Army, a man of great courage, and a noble diſpoſition, underſtanding that Saul and Jonathan, and his two other Brothers were dead, came into the Camp, and bringing with him the only Son of Saul that was left, whoſe name was H Isboſeth, he paſſed to the other ſide of Jordan and proclaimed him King. He appointed likewiſe for his Royal ſeat and place of reſidence, a certain Countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to ſay, the Camp. From thence he went with a ſelect band of ſoldiers, with a reſolution to encounter thoſe of the Tribe of Juda, becauſe they had choſen David for their Kings. Againſt him marched out Joab the Son of Suri and of Sarvia, Davids Siſter, General of his Army, to encounter him, accompanied with his Brothers Abiſai and Azael, and all Davids ſoldiers: and arriving near a Fountain in Gabaa he drew up his Army in that place. Abner propoſing that before they joyned Battel they ſhould try ſome of the ſoldiers of each party, it was agreed between them, that twelve of either ſide ſhould be choſen out to decide the quarell; Theſe men marched out into a I certain place betwixt both Armyes, and having darted their Javelins the one againſt the other, came at laſt to their Swords; and one taking his enemy by the hair, they all of them ſlew on'eanother.upon the place Hereupon the Armyes met, and after a cruel Battel, Abner with his followers were diſcomfited: and flyng in great haſte were purſued by Joab, who incouraged his ſoldiers to follow them cloſe without ſuffering any of them to eſcape. But amongſt the reſt, Joabs Brothers were hot upon the Chaſe, and the youngeſt of them called Azael, gave ſpecial teſtimony of his forwardneſs, for he ran not only more ſwift than other men, but outſtripped horſes alſo in their race. Whilſt thus he purſued Abner with great vehemence, without turning either to the one ſide or the other; Abner ſeeing himſelf cloſely preſſed after, adviſed him to forbare his purſuit, and promiſed him a compleat K ſute of Armor for a preſent: but ſeeing him ſtill advance he deſired him that he would not conſtrain him to kill him, and thereby render his brother Joab implacable.

But Azal not regarding him, Abner ſtruck him through with a Javelin ſo that he preſently died. But they that purſued Abner, likewiſe arriving in the place where Azaels body lay dead, ſtood round about him, and forbare to purſue the Enemy any further.
But Joab and his Brother Abiſai paſſing by and conceiving a more mortal hatred againſt Abner, becauſe he had ſlain their Brother, they purſued him til Sun-ſet unto a place called Amon that is the aqueduct. There mounting upon a hillock, he ſaw Abner with the Tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who began to cry out to him that men of the ſame Tribe ought not to be ſo incenſed the one againſt the other: that their Brother Azael was in L the fault, becauſe that although he had exhorted him to ceaſe from purſuing him, yet could he not perſuade him, and that therefore he had ſlain him. Joab conſidering theſe his ſayings, he commanded the Trumpet to ſound a Retreat, and forbare to purſue them any more, and incamped for that night in the ſame place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceaſing, and having paſt over Jordan, returned to his camp to Isboſeth Sauls Son. The next day Joab ſurveyed the dead, and cauſed them to be buried. Thoſe that were found dead on Abners ſide, were about three hundred and ſixty men; and on Davids nineteen, beſides Azael, whoſe body Joab and Abiſai took with them, and carried it to Bethlehem, and after they had interred it in the Tomb of their Anceſtors, they repaired to Hebron unto David. From that time forward there aroſe a civil War amongſt the Hebrews, M and endured a long time, in which Davids followers had alwayes the upper-hand, and never adventured the hazard of the field without ſome gaining advantage; whereas the Son of Saul and his partakers were daily weakened. David at that time had ſix Sons and as many Wives; the eldeſt of them was called Ammon, the Son of Achimaas; the ſecond was Daniel, the Son of Abigal; the third was called Abſolon, the Son of Maacha, the daughter of Tolmar King of Geſſure; the fourth was Adonias, the Son of his Wife called Aggite; the fifth was Sphacia the Son of Abithal; the ſixth Jethraam the Son of Egla. But after this civil War was begun, and that the Kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountred and fought together; Abner the General of the Army of King Sauls Son, a prudent man, and one that was beloved by the people, endeavored all N that in him lay, that the whole Countrey might be commanded by Isboſeth, and in effect they all ſubmitted unto him for a certain time: but when it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged to have kept company with Riſpa, Sauls Concubine, the Daughter of Sibath, and that Isboſeth reproved him for it, he was much incenſed, as thinking himſelf very ill rewarded for his ſervices; whereupon he threatned to eſtabliſh the Kingdom of David, and to make Isboſeth know, that it was neither his own valour nor conduct that made him Soveraign over the Tribes on that ſide Jordan, but that his fidelity and experience was the cauſe thereof. Whereupon he ſent unto Hebron to David, requiring him, by an oath, to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſuade the people to forſake Sauls Son, and to proclaime him King of the whole Country. David O

A of her Father Saul with the heads of 600 Philiſtines which Michol, Abner had taken from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſhboſeth alſo conſented, to whom David had written. Abner therefore aſſembled all the Elders and Governors of the people, and told them, that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſhboſeth, and to ſubmit themſelves to David, he diſſuaded them from that intent; but that he was now willing to comply with them,becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen David(by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet)to be King over all Iſrael;and had foretold that he ſhould ſubdue the Philiſtines,and bring them under his ſubjection. Which when the Elders and Governors underſtood,they all of them agreed to ſubmit themſelves to David. Abner ſeeing them thus reſolved, did afterwards aſſemble all the Tribe B of Benjamin (out of which the Archers of Iſhboſeths guard were choſen) and told them the like, and perceiving that they complied with him and ſubmitted themſelves unto his pleaſure, he gathered about twenty of his familiar friends, and came to David to receive him in his own perſon, in confirmation of what David had promiſed.
David received and entertained him very kindly,and magnificently feaſted him for many days; after which,Abner deſired him that he might return,and bring the people with him, to the end that in their preſence and ſight,he might deliver him up the government. When David had diſmiſſed Abner, ſome little time after his departure, Joad the General of Davids Army came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had been with David,and was lately departed from him, and conſidering the merit of Abner whom he knew to be a great C Captain, and the eminent ſervice which he was now likely to do for David, he began to fear ſome dieminution of his own greatneſs, and that the Army was not like to continue under his command, whereupon he endeavoured to perſuade David to give no credit to the promiſes of Abner; ſince he was very well aſſured, that he had no other deſign than to ſettle the Crown upon Iſhboſeth, that this whole treaty was nothing elſe but a meer trick to cheat him of his Kingdom; and that Abner was returned with a great deal of joy, becauſe his deſigns were like to ſucceed ſo well. But perceiving that theſe his ſubtilties took little effect with David, he attempted a more perilous exploit than the former. v. 24, &c.
For reſolving with himſelf to kill Abner, he ſent out certain men after him, whom he appointed, that as ſoon as they ſhould overtake him, they ſhould deſire him in Davids D name to return with ſpeed,becauſe he had forgot to ſpeak to him about ſome affairs of great importance. v. 26.

The Elders Captain purſuaded by Abner follow David. The Benjamites accord with Abner, he reſorteth to David, and certifieth him thereof. Abner being kindly entertained by David, is friendly diſmiſſed.

When Abner heard the words of theſe meſſengers (whoover took him in a place called Beſira, ſome twenty Furlongs off of Hebron) he ſtruck out of the way without ſuſpecting any treachery; and Joab going before him,embraced him with great kindneſs, v. 27. and like an affectionate friend, and ſingling him from his other company, and making as if he would inform him of certain ſecrets, and having drawn him into a by-way beſide the wall, accompanied only with his Brother Abiſai, he drew his ſword, and thruſt it into his ſhort ribs; of which wound Abner died, ſurpriſed by the Treaſon of Joab, who coloured that act of his, with the revenge and death of his Brother Azael, whom Abner E had ſlain whilſt he was purſued by him in the firſt war at Hebron; but in truth it was but the ſuſpition of his greatneſs and honour, fearing leſt he ſhould be deprived of his place, and Abner obtain the next degree of honour unto David. Hereby may a man perceive how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition ſake, and to the end they may not be inferiour unto any others. For when they deſire to attain riches and honours,they atchieve it by ten thouſand miſchiefs; and at ſuch time as they fear to be diſpoſſeſt, they ſtrive to continue their eſtates by means more pernicious, becauſe they think it to be the leſs ſin; and that the unhappineſs is leſs, rather not to have obtained to any greatneſs and power, than after the poſſeſſion thereof,to fall from it. Thence it cometh,that all of them intend and practiſe F many hazards and difficulty through the fear they have to forfeit their Grandeur. But it ſufficeth to have brieflytouched this point. David having notice of the murther of Abner, conceived a great grief in his heart, and called all his friends to witneſs, lifting up his hands unto God, and proteſting that he was no partaker of the murther, and that Abner had been ſlain without his knowledge. He likewiſe uttered moſt grievous curſes againſt the murtherer,his houſe and accomplices,praying that they might be overtaken by that vengeance which uſeth to purſue the murtherer: for he greatly ſuſpected leſt he v. 31. ſhould be thought to be a party in that which had hapned unto Abner, contrary to his Faith, and promiſe, which he had paſt unto him. Moreover, he commanded that all the people ſhould weep and lament for him, and that his Funerals ſhould be honoured G according to the accuſtomed manner, in renting of Garments and putting on Sackcloth: and that the ſame ſhould be done, the Coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefeſt Governours of the Iſraelites followed,beating on their Breaſts,and ſhedding

David is created King of one Tribe in Hebron*: over the reſt,* Saul's Son obtaineth the Sovereignty.

D THis Battel was fought on the ſame day that David returned Conqueror to Siceleg, after he had ſubdued the Amalekites. But about three days after his return, he that ſlew Saul, and had eſcaped from the Battel, having his garment rent, and aſhes upon his head, came and caſt himſelf proſtrate before David: and being asked from whence he came? he anſwered, from the Battel of the Iſraelites; and certified David of the unhappy event: telling him, that many thouſands of the Hebrews were ſlain, and that Saul himſelf and his Sons were fallen in the conflict. He likewiſe related, how he himſelf retreated amongſt the Hebrews, when the King fled: confeſſing that he had ſlain him, that he might not fall alive into the hands of his enemy: For (ſaid he) Saul E having caſt himſelf upon the point of his ſword, was ſo weak, by reaſon of the agony of his wounds, that he could not diſpatch himſelf. Thereupon he produced the bracelets, and the Royal Crown which he took from him. David perceiving no cauſe whereby he ſhould doubt of his death, whereof he had moſt evident and infallible teſtimonies, rent his garments, and ſpent the day in weeping and lamenting with his companions: but he was the more grieved for the loſs of his dear friend Jonathan, whom he acknowledged to be the preſerver of his life: And ſo affectionate ſhewed he himſelf towards Saul, that although he had oftentimes been in danger to have been ſlain by him, yet was he much troubled at his death; and not only ſo, but he likewiſe put to death him that ſlew him; telling him, that he himſelf had accuſed himſelf for ſlaying the King, and ſhown him- F ſelf by that parricide to be a true Amalekite. He compoſed likewiſe Lamentations and Epitaphs in the praiſe of Saul and Jonathan, which are yet extant. After that he had thus honoured the King, and performed his Lamentations and Obſequies, he asked counſel of God by the Prophet: What City of the Tribe of Juda he would give him to inhabit in? who anſwered him, That he would give him Hebron. For which cauſe he forſook Siceleg, and came and dwelt in Hebron, and brought thither his Wives and his Army. All the people of the Tribe reſorted thither unto him, and proclaimed him King: where underſtanding how the Jabeſins had buried Saul and his Sons, he ſent Ambaſſadors unto them, both to praiſe and approve their actions, aſſuring them, that he allowed their act, and would recompenſe that kindneſs which they had ſhewed to the dead: giving them likewiſe G to underſtand, that the Tribe of Juda had choſen him for their King. But Abner the Son of Ner, General of Sauls Army, a man of great courage, and a noble diſpoſition, underſtanding that Saul and Jonathan, and his two other Brothers were dead, came into the Camp, and bringing with him the only Son of Saul that was left, whoſe name was H Isboſeth, he paſſed to the other ſide of Jordan and proclaimed him King. He appointed likewiſe for his Royal ſeat and place of reſidence, a certain Countrey called in Hebrew Machare, that is to ſay, the Camp. From thence he went with a ſelect band of ſoldiers, with a reſolution to encounter thoſe of the Tribe of Juda, becauſe they had choſen David for their Kings. Againſt him marched out Joab the Son of Suri and of Sarvia, Davids Siſter, General of his Army, to encounter him, accompanied with his Brothers Abiſai and Azael, and all Davids ſoldiers: and arriving near a Fountain in Gabaa he drew up his Army in that place. Abner propoſing that before they joyned Battel they ſhould try ſome of the ſoldiers of each party, it was agreed between them, that twelve

of either ſide ſhould be choſen out to decide the quarell; Theſe men marched out into a I certain place betwixt both Armyes, and having darted their Javelins the one againſt the other, came at laſt to their Swords; and one taking his enemy by the hair, they all of them ſlew one another. upon the place Hereupon the Armyes met, and after a cruel Battel, Abner
with his followers were diſcomfited: and flyng in great haſte were purſued by Joab, who incouraged his ſoldiers to follow them cloſe without ſuffering any of them to eſcape. But amongſt the reſt, Joabs Brothers were hot upon the Chaſe, and the youngeſt of them called Azael, gave ſpecial teſtimony of his forwardneſs, for he ran not only more ſwift than other men, but outſtripped horſes alſo in their race. Whilſt thus he purſued Abner
with great vehemence, without turning either to the one ſide or the other; Abner ſeeing himſelf cloſely preſſed after, adviſed him to forbare his purſuit, and promiſed him a compleat K ſute of Armor for a preſent: but ſeeing him ſtill advance he deſired him that he would not conſtrain him to kill him, and thereby render his brother Joab implacable.
But Azal not regarding him, Abner ſtruck him through with a Javelin ſo that he preſently died. But they that purſued Abner, likewiſe arriving in the place where Azaels body lay dead, ſtood round about him, and forbare to purſue the Enemy any further.
But Joab and his Brother Abiſai paſſing by and conceiving a more mortal hatred againſt Abner, becauſe he had ſlain their Brother, they purſued him til Sun-ſet unto a place called Amon that is the aqueduct. There mounting upon a hillock, he ſaw Abner with the Tribe of Benjamin flying from him; who began to cry out to him that men of the ſame Tribe
ought not to be ſo incenſed the one againſt the other: that their Brother Azael was in L
the fault, becauſe that although he had exhorted him to ceaſe from purſuing him, yet could he not perſuade him, and that therefore he had ſlain him. Joab conſidering theſe
his ſayings, he commanded the Trumpet to ſound a Retreat, and forbare to purſue them any more, and incamped for that night in the ſame place: during which time, Abner travelled without ceaſing, and having paſt over Jordan, returned to his camp to Isboſeth Sauls Son. The next day Joab ſurveyed the dead, and cauſed them to be buried. Thoſe that were found dead on Abners ſide, were about three hundred and ſixty men; and on Davids nineteen, beſides Azael, whoſe body Joab and Abiſai took with them, and carried it to Bethlehem, and after they had interred it in the Tomb of their Anceſtors, they repaired to Hebron unto David. From that time forward there aroſe a civil War amongſt the Hebrews, M and endured a long time, in which Davids followers had alwayes the upper-hand, and never adventured the hazard of the field without ſome gaining advantage; whereas the Son of Saul and his partakers were daily weakened. David at that time had ſix Sons and as many Wives; the eldeſt of them was called Ammon, the Son of Achimaas; the ſecond was Daniel, the Son of Abigal; the third was called Abſolon, the Son of Maacha, the daughter of Tolmar King of Geſſure; the fourth was Adonias, the Son of his Wife called Aggite; the fifth was Sphacia the Son of Abithal; the ſixth Jethraam the Son of Egla. But after this civil War was begun, and that the Kings on both ſides had oftentimes encountred and fought together; Abner the General of the Army of King Sauls Son, a prudent man, and one that was beloved by the people, endeavored all N that in him lay, that the whole Countrey might be commanded by Isboſeth, and in effect they all ſubmitted unto him for a certain time: but when it afterwards fell out that Abner was charged to have kept company with Riſpa, Sauls Concubine, the Daughter of Sibath, and that Isboſeth reproved him for it, he was much incenſed, as thinking himſelf
very ill rewarded for his ſervices; whereupon he threatned to eſtabliſh the Kingdom of David, and to make Isboſeth know, that it was neither his own valour nor conduct that made him Soveraign over the Tribes on that ſide Jordan, but that his fidelity and experience was the cauſe thereof. Whereupon he ſent unto Hebron to David, requiring him, by an oath, to accept of him as his confederate and friend, promiſing him to perſuade
the people to forſake Sauls Son, and to proclaime him King of the whole Country. David O ſware unto him, as he had required, and very joyfully received his offices, and, the more to confirm this league betwixt them, he ſent back Michol Davids wife whom he had purchaſed

A of her Father Saul with the heads of 600 Philiſtines which Michol, Abner had taken from Phalti, who had ſince that time eſpouſed her: whereunto Iſhboſeth alſo conſented, to whom David had written. Abner therefore aſſembled all the Elders and Governors of the people, and told them, that at ſuch time as heretofore they were ready to forſake Iſhboſeth, and to ſubmit themſelves to David, he diſſuaded them from that intent; but that he was now willing to comply with them, becauſe he was aſſured that God had choſen David (by the mouth of Samuel the Prophet) to be King over all Iſrael; and had foretold that he ſhould ſubdue the Philiſtines, and bring them under his ſubjection. Which when the Elders and Governors underſtood, they all of them agreed to ſubmit themſelves to David. Abner ſeeing them thus reſolved, did afterwards aſſemble all the Tribe B of Benjamin (out of which the Archers of Iſhboſeths guard were choſen) and told them the like, and perceiving that they complied with him and ſubmitted themſelves unto his pleaſure, he gathered about twenty of his familiar friends, and came to David to receive him in his own perſon, in confirmation of what David had promiſed. David received and entertained him very kindly, and magnificently feaſted him for many days; after which, Abner deſired him that he might return, and bring the people with him, to the end that in their preſence and ſight, he might deliver him up the government. When David had diſmiſſed Abner, ſome little time after his departure, Joad the General of Davids Army came to Hebron, and knowing that Abner had been with David, and was lately departed from him, and conſidering the merit of Abner whom he knew to be a great C Captain, and the eminent ſervice which he was now likely to do for David, he began to fear ſome dieminution of his own greatneſs, and that the Army was not like to continue under his command, whereupon he endeavoured to perſuade David to give no credit to the promiſes of Abner; ſince he was very well aſſured, that he had no other deſign than to ſettle the Crown upon Iſhboſeth, that this whole treaty was nothing elſe but a meer trick to cheat him of his Kingdom; and that Abner was returned with a great deal of joy, becauſe his deſigns were like to ſucceed ſo well. But perceiving that theſe his ſubtilties took little effect with David, he attempted a more perilous exploit than the former. For reſolving with himſelf to kill Abner, he ſent out certain men after him, whom he appointed, that as ſoon as they ſhould overtake him, they ſhould deſire him in Davids D name to return with ſpeed, becauſe he had forgot to ſpeak to him about ſome affairs of great importance.

v. 26.

When Abner heard the words of theſe meſſengers (whoover took him in a place called Beſira, ſome twenty Furlongs off of Hebron) he ſtruck out of the way without ſuſpecting any treachery; and Joab going before him, embraced him with great kindneſs, and like an affectionate friend, and ſingling him from his other company, and making as if he would inform him of certain ſecrets, and having drawn him into a by-way beſide the wall, accompanied only with his Brother Abiſai, he drew his ſword, and thruſt it into his ſhort ribs; of which wound Abner died, ſurpriſed by the Treaſon of Joab, who coloured that act of his, with the revenge and death of his Brother Azael, whom Abner E had ſlain whilſt he was purſued by him in the firſt war at Hebron; but in truth it was but the ſuſpition of his greatneſs and honour, fearing leſt he ſhould be deprived of his place, and Abner obtain the next degree of honour unto David. Hereby may a man perceive how many and how mighty things men attempt and hazard for their avarice and ambition ſake, and to the end they may not be inferiour unto any others. For when they deſire to attain riches and honours, they atchieve it by ten thouſand miſchiefs; and at ſuch time as they fear to be diſpoſſeſt, they ſtrive to continue their eſtates by means more pernicious, becauſe they think it to be the leſs ſin; and that the unhappineſs is leſs, rather not to have obtained to any greatneſs and power, than after the poſſeſſion thereof, to fall from it. Thence it cometh, that all of them intend and practiſe F many hazards and difficulty through the fear they have to forfeit their Grandeur. But it ſufficeth to have briefly touched this point. David having notice of the murther of Abner, conceived a great grief in his heart, and called all his friends to witneſs, lifting up his hands unto God, and proteſting that he was no partaker of the murther, and that Abner had been ſlain without his knowledge. He likewiſe uttered moſt grievous curſes againſt the murtherer, his houſe and accomplices, praying that they might be overtaken by that vengeance which uſeth to purſue the murtherer: for he greatly ſuſpected leſt he ſhould be thought to be a party in that which had haped unto Abner, contrary to his Faith, and promiſe, which he had paſt unto him. Moreover, he commanded that all the people ſhould weep and lament for him, and that his Funerals ſhould be honoured G according to the accuſtomed manner, in renting of Garments and putting on Sackcloth: and that the ſame ſhould be done, the Coffin being carried before, which both he and the chiefeſt Governours of the Iſraelites followed, beating on their Breaſts, and ſhedding tears, tears, and teſtifying the love which they bare unto him during his life, and their ſorow for H his death, who had been murthered contrary to their will and intention. He was Entombed in Hebron with great Magnificence, and Epitaphs compoſed in his praiſe by David himſelf, who ſetting himſelf on the Tomb firſt of all lamented, and gave others an example to follow him. And ſo much was he troubled at the death of Abner, that he forbore all kind of meat until the Sun-ſet, notwithſtanding the inſtances of his friends, who urged him to take meat: which act of his purchaſed him much love amongſt the people. For they that loved Abner, were very glad to be witneſſes of that honour which he did him at his death, and that faith which he maintained in honouring him, as if he had been his Kinſman or friend, and not embaſing him with a vile and contemptible Tomb, as if he had been his Enemy. And in general, all of them were ſo much poſ- I ſeſſed with the ſweetneſs and Royal nature of King David, that they believed he would have the like kindneſs for them, as they ſaw him expreſs for deceaſed Abner. And by this means David happily maintained his credit, and increaſed the peoples good opinion of him, eſcaping thereby the ſuſpition that he might in ſome ſort have been acceſſary to his death. He proteſted alſo unto the people, that he conceived no ſmall grief at the loſs of ſo good a man, declaring that it was a great prejudice to the State to be deprived of him, maintained their peace by his good advice, and ratified the ſame by his executions and Warlike valour: But God (ſaid he) who hath care of all things, ſhall not ſuffer him to die unrevenged: And he it is that ſhall bear me witneſs, that it lieth not in my power to puniſh Joab and Abiſai, who have greater credit in the Army than K my ſelf; yet ſhall they not eſcape Gods juſtice for this fault. Thus ended the life of Abner.

CHAP. II.

Iſhboſeth is ſlain through the Treaſon of his followers: the whole Kingdom devolveth unto David.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 2. 2 Sam. 4. 1, ad 6.

WHen Iſhboſeth Sauls Son, had notice of Abners death, he was much troubled, not only that he was deprived of his near kinſman, but alſo of ſo great a perſonage as had ſetled the Crown on his head. Neither did he himſelf long time remain alive L after him: but by the Sons of Jeremon, Banaoth and Than, he was Traiterouſly ſlain. Theſe two being Benjamites, and of the chiefeſt Nobility amongſt them contrived to make away Iſhboſeth, and thereby obtain a great reward from David; ſuppoſing that ſuch an act would merit the chiefeſt place and dignity in the Army. For which cauſe, finding Iſhboſeth alone in his houſe about mid-day, laid on his bed and aſleep, and unattended by any of his Guard, and perceiving likewiſe that the Porter was aſleep: they entred into the lodging where Iſhboſeth was aſleep, and ſlew him: and having cut off his head, they travelled all the night and day as if they fled from thoſe whom they had offended, and ſought for reſcue. And when they came to Hebron, they preſented David with Iſhboſeths head, offering themſelves to do him ſervice, letting him know, that they M had delivered him of an enemy, and made away his adverſary. But David allowed not their act, but thus received them; O curſed men, (on whom I intend preſently to execute juſtice) have you not heard how I puniſhed him that murthered Saul, and brought his Royal Crown unto me? Yea, although he ſlew him at his own requeſt, and to the intent the enemy ſhould not ſurpriſe him alive? Did ye think that I was changed, and that I am not the ſame that I was, but that I take delight to be partaker with you in your wickedneſs, or that I will countenance it, as if theſe acts of yours (who are murtherers of your Maſter) were to be commended? Ungrateful Villains, have you no remorſe for having murthered, on his Couch, a Prince that never did an injury to any, and had ſhewed ſo much kindneſs unto you? but I will certainly puniſh you with the loſs of your lives, becauſe ye have thought that Iſhboſeths death N would work my content: for you could not in any thing diſhonour me more, than by conceiving ſuch an opinion of me. Which ſaid, he adjudged them to die by the moſt cruel torments that might be imagined: and with a great deal of ſolemnity, he cauſed Iſhboſeths head to be interred in Abners Tomb.

v. 6. ad 12. Iſhboſeths head is brought to David. Davids ſharp invective againſt the murtherers of Iſhboſeth, and their puniſhment.

2 Sam. 5. 1, 2, 3, &c. The Nobles of the Hebrews repair to David to Hebron, and declare him King.

Theſe murtherers being thus put to death, the cheif of the people repaired to David unto Hebron (both they that commanded over thouſands, and ſuch alſo as were governors) and ſubmitted themſelves unto him, they recounted the good offices they had done him, both during Sauls life-time, as alſo the honour which they had always ſhown him, ſince the firſt time that he was a Commander in that Army, eſpecially that he had been choſen by God through the mediation of the Prophet Samuel, to be their King, and O his children after him; declaring unto him, that God had given him the Country of the Hebrews, to defend the ſame, and diſcomfit the Philiſtines. David accepted their readineſs, A readineſs and affection, exhorting them to perſiſt, aſſuring them that they ſhould never repent themſelves of their obedience: and after he had entertained them, he ſent them to aſſemble the people.

David entertained the Nobles kindly.

The Armed Soldiers that came to David.

Of the Tribe of Judà, there came together about ſix thouſand and eight hundred men of War, bearing for their Arms a Buckler, and a Javelin; who before that time had followed Sauls Sons, and were not of thoſe that had adhered unto David. Of the Tribe of Simeon, ſeven thouſand, and one hundred, or ſomewhat more. Of that of Levi 4700, whoſe Captain was Jodam, with whom was Sadoc the High Prieſt, accompanied with twenty and two of the ſame lineage. Of the Tribe of Benjamin four thouſand men of War; for this Tribe were as yet of that opinion, that ſome of the Heirs B of Saul ſhould raign. Of that of Ephraim 20800 ſtrong and valiant men. Of that of Manaſſes, eight thouſand. Of that of Iſſachar two hundred, who were skilful in divination, and 20000 men of War. Of that of Zabulon 20000 choſen fighting men: for only this intire Tribe was wholly at Davids command, who were armed in like manner as they of Gad were. Of the Tribe of Nepthaly there were a thouſand Captains, famous for their valour, and armed with ſhield and Javelin, attended by an infinite number of their Tribe. Of the Tribe of Dan there were 27000 choſen men. Of that of Aſer 40000. Of the two Tribes on the other ſide of Jordan, and of the half Tribe of Manaſſes, ſixſcore thouſand armed men, with Buckler, Javelin, Helmet and Sword: The reſt of the other Tribes alſo wore Swords. All this multitude was aſſembled together in Hebron C before David, with great proviſion of victuals and wine, ſufficient to ſuſtain them all, who all of them with one conſent, appointed David to be their King. Now when the people had muſtered and feaſted for three dayes ſpace in Hebron, David diſlodged from thence with his whole Hoſt, and repaired to Jeruſalem. But the Jebuſites, who at that time inhabited the City, and were of the Race of the Canaanites, ſhutting up their Gates againſt his coming, and placing on their walls as many as were blind and lame, or maimed in any other ſort, in contempt of him, ſcoffingly jeſted and ſaid, That theſe were ſufficient to keep out the Enemy: ſo much truſted they to their fortifications. Wherewith David being incenſed, he prepared to beſiege Jeruſalem with all the vigor imaginable, that he might by making himſelf Maſter of that place ſtrike a terror into all the reſt that ſhould D dare to make any oppoſition. He took the lower Town; and becauſe the higher Town as yet held out, the King reſolved to encourage his men of War to ſhew themſelves valiant, promiſing them honours and rewards and, that he would make him General over all the people, that ſhould firſt of all Scale the Wall. Whilſt they thus put themſelves forward to mount without refuſing any danger (through the deſire they had to obtain the Government that was promiſed) Joab the Son of Servia, was the forwardeſt; and having got upon the Wall, called from thence to the King to acquit himſelf of his promiſe.

CHAP. III.

E David having taken Jeruſalem by force, turneth out all the Canaanites, and delivereth the City to be inhabited by the Jews.

AFter therefore he had caſt out the Jebuſites from the higher City, and repaired Jeruſalem, he called it the City of David, and reſided there all his Raign: ſo that the whole time that he ruled in Hebron, over the Tribe of Juda, was ſeven years, and ſix months. But after he had taken Jeruſalem for his Royal City, his fortunes daily more and more increaſed, becauſe God was with him. Hiram alſo King of Tyre, ſent unto him, and made a league with him: he preſented him likewiſe with Preſents of Cedar, and Workmen and Maſons, to build him a Royal houſe in Jeruſalem. Now when F the King had taken the City, he joyned the Cittadel unto it; and having walled them about, he gave the government thereof to Joab. This King was the firſt that drove the Jebuſites out of Jeruſalem, and called the ſame by his name. For, from the time of Abraham our forefather, it was called Solyma: neither want there ſome that infer, that Homer under that name intendeth Jeruſalem. For, in the Hebrew tongue Solyma is as much as to ſay, Security. All the time ſince the war made by Joſhuah againſt the Canaanites, and ſince the diviſion of the Countrey (during all which time, the Iſraelites could not drive the Canaanites out of Jeruſalem) until David took the ſame by force, were five hundred and fifteen years. But I muſt not forget one Orphan, a rich man amongſt the Jebuſites, who becauſe he was well affected towards the Hebrews, was not put to death G at the taking of Jeruſalem: but was much honoured by the King. David eſpouſed other Wives beſides thoſe which he had; and took many Concubines: by them he had eleven Sons, whoſe names are theſe which follow, Amnael, Seba, Nathan, Solomon, Jaber, Eliel,

CHAP. IV.

David aſſailed by the Philiſtines, obtaineth a great victory aaginſt them near Jeruſalem.

2 Sam. 5. 18. ad finem. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 4.

NOw when the Philiſtines knew that the Hebrews had created David King, they led forth their Army againſt him towards Jeruſalem, where, encamping themſelves in I the valley of the Giants (which is a place not far from the City) they in that place expected the encounter. But the King of the Hebrews, who was wont to do nothing inconſiderately, commanded the High Prieſt to ask counſel of God what ſucceſs the War ſhould have; who after he had informed him that God favored their deſignes, he pre-ſently drew out his Army againſt the Enemy: and giving them battel, he ſuddenly aſſailed the Enemies, ſlaying many of them, he put the reſt to flight. But let no man ſuſpect, that the Army of the Philiſtines was either ſmall in number, or weak in courage, which at that time aſſailed the Hebrews, becauſe they were eaſily overcome, without their performing any memorable action. For all Syria, Phenicia, (and the other Warlike Nations beyond them) were confederates with them, in this War: which was the cauſe, that notwithſtanding they were ſo many times overcome, and loſt many thouſands of men, that they de- K ſiſted not to aſſail the Hebrews with greater force: having been defeated in the battel be-forementioned, yet they reinforced their Army, and encamped in the ſame place. Whereupon David again required of God what the iſſue of this battel ſhould be; and the High Prieſt told him, that he ſhould encamp in the Forreſt called Tears, becauſe it was not far off from the Enemies Camp, and that he ſhould not depart from thence, neither make any attempt upon them, before the trees ſhould ſhake without any agitation of the wind.
Whereupon, as ſoon as the trees ſhook, and the time which God had appointed was come; without any delay he marched out with an aſſurance of returning victorious, For the ſquadrons of the Enemy were diſordered, and incontinently betook themſelves to flight, being purſued unto the City of Gerar (which is a frontire-town of their L Countrey) their Camp was plundred, and in it were found great riches; and amongſt other things, their gods, which were broken to pieces by the Iſraelites.

The Philiſtines moving War againſt David, are partly ſlain or put to flight. The Philiſtines invaded the Hebrews with a mighty army gathered out of ſundry nations.

2 Sam. 6. 1, ad 5. Davids command as touching the tranſportation of the Ark.

The battel being ended, it ſeemed good unto David (by the counſel of the Elders and Colonels over thouſands) that all the flower of their youth ſhould be aſſembled from all the parts of the Countrey, every one according to his Tribe. And that the Prieſts and Levites ſhould repair to Cariathiarim, and bring from thence the Ark of God and convey it to Jeruſalem; to the end that when it ſhould be there, the ſervice of God might for the future be celebrated in that place, and other ſacrifices and honours, agreeable to the divine Majeſty be performed. Which if Saul had religiouſly obſerved, he had not fallen into thoſe misfortunes which at the ſame time deprived him of his M Crown and his life. Now when all the people were aſſembled (according as it was appointed) the King himſelf alſo aſſiſted at the removal of the Ark; which being carried by the Prieſts out of Aminidabs houſe, they laid it upon a new Wain drawn by Oxen, and commited the conduct of it to their Brethren and their Children.

v. 6, 7, 8, 9. Oza ſtretching out his hand to ſtay the Ark, is ſuddenly ſtrucken dead.

v. 10, 11. David placeth the ark in Obed-Edoms houſe, who proſpereth there-through in all felicity.

v. 12. The Ark tranſported into Davids houſe and, placed in a Tabernacle.

The King marched foremoſt, and after him all his people, praiſing God, and ſinging Pſalms and Hymns to the ſound of the Trumpets and Cymbals, and ſeveral ſorts of Inſtruments: and in this manner conducted they the Ark into Jeruſalem. But when they were come to the threſhing floor of Chidon, Oza died, thorow the wrath of God: for the Oxen ſtumbling that drew the Chariot, and the Ark tottering, he ſtreched out his hand to hold it up; but being no Prieſt, God ſtruck him dead becauſe he preſumed to touch N the Ark. The King and the people were much troubled at the death of Oza, and the place where he died is called to this day, Oza's Striking. David, fearing leſt if he ſhould carry the Ark with him into the City, the like misfortune might attend him that had befallen Oza, (who died, becauſe he only ſtretched out his hand) he carried it not with him into the City, but commanded that it ſhould be left in the poſſeſſion of one called Obed, by deſcent a Levite, a good and vertuous man: where it remained for three months ſpace; during which time, his houſe was bleſſed with all worldly happineſs. The King being informed of the ſucceſs of Obed, (who of a poor man, was ſuddenly become very rich, ſo that all men had their eyes upon him, and ſome envied him) he aſſured himſelf that no inconvenience would befall him; if he ſhould take the Ark to Jeruſalem. It was car- O ried by the Prieſts; and ſeven quires of ſinging men who were appointed by the King, went before it: The King himſelf likewiſe played upon the Harp, ſo that Michol, Davids

Wife

A Wife and Sauls Daughter, ſeeing him, mocked at him. The Ark then being thus carried, was placed in a Tabernacle erected by David, who offered ſacrifices of all ſorts, in ſuch abundance that he feaſted all the people, both men women, and children, diſtributing unto every one a Cake, and a portion of the ſacrifice: and after he had thus feaſted the people, he diſmiſſed them, and retired unto his own houſe. But Michol his Wife, the Daughter of King Saul, drawing neer unto him upon his return, beſought God for him, that it might pleaſe him in all other things ſhe might expreſs unto her husband all that which became her intire and unequal'd love towards him: but in this ſhe blamed him becauſe that being ſo great and mighty a King he had diſhhonoured himſelf in dancing, and had thereby diſcovered that which became him not, doing all this in company B of his Servants and handmaids. To whom David anſwered, that he was not aſhamed of performing a thing ſo acceptable unto God as that was, who prefered him before her Father, and placed him above all others, aſſuring her that he ſhould oftentimes behave himſelf after that manner. This Michol had no children by David, but being married again to another (to whom her Father had betrothed her after he took her from David) ſhe bear five Sons of whom we will ſpeak hereafter. The King perceiving how by Gods aſſiſtance his affairs proſpered daily more and more, thought that he could not without offence dwell in an houſe of Cedar, and ſuffer the Ark to remain in a Tabernacle: wherefore he deſigned to build a Temple unto God, according as Moſes had foretold, and to this intent conſulted with the Prophet Nathan, who willed him to perform all that which he was minded to C accompliſh, aſſuring him that God would be aſſiſtant unto him: which confirmed him in the reſolutions he had taken. But the ſame night God appeared unto Nathan, commanding him to tell David, that he accepted his will, and commended his reſolutions yet notwithſtanding he permitted him not to proceed becauſe he had embrewed his hands in the blood of many of his Enemies. But after his deceaſe (which ſhall happen after he hath lived a long and proſperous life) his Son Solomon (to whom he ſhall leave the Kingdom after his death) ſhall cauſe a Temple to be built, promiſing him to aſſiſt the ſaid Solomon (even as the Father doth his Son) and that he would continue the Kingdom in his Heirs: And that if they ſhall happen at any time to offend him, he will only puniſh them with ſickneſs and famine. David hearing this was very joyful, becauſe D the Kingdom was aſſured to his heirs, and for that his houſe ſhould be renowned; and preſenting himſelf before the Ark, he proſtrated himſelf, and gave God thanks for all the benefits he had beſtowed on him; for that from a poor and humble ſhepherd, he had raiſed him to ſo great a heighth of Majeſty and Glory, that he had promiſed to to take care of his poſterity; and that he would ſecure the liberty of his people which he had aſſerted in delivering them from bondage.

CHAP. V,

David overcoming the neighbouring Nations, impoſeth tributes on them.

E NOt long time after this, David made War upon the Philiſtines, partly, that he might avoid the ſuſpition of ſloth and idleneſs; and partly, that having (according as God had foretold) diſcomfited his Enemies, he might leave a peaceable Kingdom to his poſterity after him. He therefore aſſembled his Army, commanding them to be in a readineſs to march, and departing out of Jeruſalem, he made an inroade into the Countrey of the Philiſtines; whom he overcame in battle, and took a great part of the Countrey from them, by means whereof he enlarged the frontiers of the Hebrews. He made war alſo againſt the Moabites: whoſe Army being divided into two parts, was by him defeated and overthrown, and many priſoners taken, and tributes were impoſed on them. Afterwards he led out his Army againſt Adarezer Son of Ara, King of Sophona: and F giving him battel near the River Euphrates, he ſlew about two thouſand foot and five thouſand Horſe: he took alſo almoſt a thouſand Chariots? the greater part whereof was wholly conſumed, and one hundred of them only reſerved to his own uſe:

moſt puiſſant Prince of this Countrey called Adad governed in Damaſcus, and over the reſt of H Syria (except Phœnicia) who making War againſt David King of Judea, and having oftentimes fought with him; in his laſt encounter (wherein he was overcome near the River Euphrates) he ſignalized himſelf by ſuch actions as were worthy of a great Captain and a great King. Moreover he ſpeaketh of his Heirs that reighned ſucceſſively after him. That he being deceaſed, his Sons reigned for ten generations after him, each of them receiving from their father, the ſame name and the ſame Kingdom, after the manner of the Ptolomies of Egypt. The third of theſe being more mighty than the reſt, and deſirous to revenge himſelf of the injuries, which were offered unto his grandfather, led forth his Army againſt the Jews, and deſtroyed the Countrey called at this day Samaria. Wherein he varied not from the truth: for he of whom he ſpeakth, is that Adad, that made War I in Samaria, during the Reign of Achab King of Iſrael, of whom we will ſpeak hereafter.
But when David had led forth his Army againſt Damaſcus, and againſt the reſt of the Countrey of Syria, he reduced them all under his obedience placing garriſons in their Countrey and impoſing tribute upon them. He dedicated alſo to God in the City of Jeruſalem, the Golden quivers and Arms of Adads guard: which afterward Syſſac King of Egypt took when he vauquiſhed Roboham his Nephew, and carried away great riches out of the temple of Jeruſalem, as it ſhall be declared hereafter, when we come to treat of that matter. This King of the Hebrews being inſpired by God (who made him proſperous in all his warrs) encamped before the chiefeſt cities of Adrezar, that is to ſay, Betha and Mazcon, which he beſieged, took, and ſpoiled: where there was found great ſtore of Gold K and Silver and of Braſs, which was more precious then Gold, whereof Solomon made that great veſſel called the Sea, and other fair lavers, as ſuch time as he adorned and furniſhed the Temple of God. When Thoy King of Amoth underſtood all which had hapned to Adarezer, and how his power and forces were deſtroyed, he grew afraid of his own eſtate, and reſolved to enter into a league and confederacy with David, before he ſhould come out againſt him: and to that intent he ſent his Son Adoram unto him, to congratulate his ſucceſs againſt Adarezer his Enemy, and to contract an amity with him. He ſent him preſents alſo, namely veſſels of antique worke of Gold, of Silver, and of Braſs: whereupon David made a league with him, and received the preſents that were ſent unto him; and afterwards honourably diſmiſſed his Son, both for the one L and the other: and conſecrated that to God which he had preſented him (together with the Gold and Silver, which he had taken from the Cities and Nations that were ſubiect unto him.) For God did not only ſo far favour him, as to make him victorious and happy in his own Warrs; but having alſo ſent Abiſai Joabs Brother the Lieutenant of his Army againſt the Idumeans, he likewiſe granted him victory: for Abiſai ſlew in the battel about eighteen thouſand of them, and filled all Idumea with garriſons impoſing a tribute throughout the Countrey by the Pole. This King loved juſtice of his own nature and the judgment which he gave was always moſt equitable, He had for his Lieutenant General of his Armies Joab, and appointed Joſaphat the Son of Achilles chief over the Regiſters, After Abiather, he eſtabliſhed Sadock of the houſe of Phinees for M High Prieſt, who was his friend. Siſa was his Secretary, Banaia the Son of Ioiada was Captain over his guard, and all the Elders were ordinarily about him to guard and attend him. He remembring himſelf alſo of the covenants and oaths that paſt 'twixt him and Jonathan the Son of Saul, and of their amity and affection (for amongſt his other excellent qualities he was alwayes moſt eminent for his gratitude.) He cauſed inquiry to be made, if any one of the houſe and family of Jonathan were left alive, to the intent he might return the friendſhip he had received from Jonathan. Whereupon a certain man named Ziba, was brought unto him (who was enfranchiſed by Saul) that might inform him what one of his Race was alive: who asked him if he knew any of Jonathans Sons then living, to whom he might make ſome return of the kindneſs N which he had formerly received from their Father. Who anſwered him, that he had one Son remaining, whoſe name was Mephiboſheth, who was lame of his legges for when the news came that both his Father and Grandfather were ſlain his Nurſe haſtily ſnatching up the child let him fall from her ſhoulders, and ſo hurt him. When he heard where he was brought up, he ſent unto the City of Labath to Machir, with whom Mephiboſheth, was kept, and commanded him to be brought unto him. Now when he came to Davids preſence, he caſt himſelf on his face before him; but the King exhorted him to be of good courage, and to hope hereafter for better fortune, and gave him his Fathers houſe with all the poſſeſſions, that were purchaſed by Saul his grandfather, appointing him to eat with him daily at his own table. The young man did him reverence, thanking him O for the Royal offers he had made him. At that time David called for Siba, and told him how he had given Mephiboſheth his Fathers houſe and all Sauls purchaſes, com-

A manding him to manure his poſſeſſions, and to have a care of all things, and to return the revenue to Jeruſalem, becauſe Mephiboſheth was every day to ſit at his table, charging both him and his fifteen Sons, and twenty Servants, to do him ſervice. After the King had thus diſpoſed of him, Siba did him reverence; and after he had promiſed to perform whatſoever he had given him in charge, he departed, and Jonathans Son remained in Jeruſalem, where he lived at the Kings table, and was entertained and tended as carefully as if he had been his own Son: he had a Son alſo called Mica. Theſe were the honours that thoſe children which ſurvived after Jonathan and Sauls death, received at Davids hands. About the ſame day died Nahas King of the Ammonites, who during his life-time was Davids friend, and his Son ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, to whom David ſent B Ambaſſadors to comfort him, exhorting him to bear his Fathers death with patience, aſſuring him that he would expreſs no leſs love towards him, than he did unto his Father. But the Governours of the Ammonites entertained this Embaſſage very contumeliouſly, and not according as David had intended it, and murmured againſt their King, telling him that they were but ſpies ſent by David to inquire into their forces, and diſcover the ſtrength of their Countrey, under a pretext of kindneſs; adviſing him to ſtand upon his guard, and not to give ear to his proteſtation, leſt being deceived, he ſhould fall into ſome remedileſs inconveniency.

unworthily affronted the Ambaſſadors that were ſent unto him: for cauſing the half of C their Beards to be ſhaven cloſe by the chin, and cutting away the half of their Veſtments, he ſent them back again. Which when David ſaw, he was much diſpleaſed, and proteſted that he would not ſuffer that injury ſo eaſily to be digeſted, but that he would make War on the Ammonites, and revenge thoſe indignities that were offered to his Ambaſſadors.
The Friends and Governors of Nahas conſidering how they had violated and broken the Peace, and how for that occaſion they deſerved to be puniſhed; prepared for that War, and ſent a thouſand talents to Syrus, King of Meſopotamia, deſiring him that he would be their confederate in that War, and receive their pay: they requeſted the like of Subas: theſe Kings had 20000 footmen in pay. They hired alſo with their mony

CHAP. VII.

How David overcame the Meſopotamians.

BUt David being nothing diſcouraged, either with the confederacy, or force of the Ammonites; but truſting in God, ſince he was ſatisfied that his cauſe was juſt, perſiſted to the revenge of thoſe outrages which he had received from them. Having therefore muſtered under Joab the flower of his whole Army, he commanded him to depart and make War upon them: who came and incamped himſelf before their chief City E called Aramath; which when the Enemies perceived, they came forth and ranged themſelves in battel, not in one body, but two ſeveral parties. For their confederates and allies were incamped apart in the Plain, and the Ammonites ſtood in battle-array near unto their City gate, to make head againſt the Hebrews. Joab perceiving this, took this courſe, that he might meet them without any diſadvantage: for he choſe out the ableſt and ſtouteſt of his men to ſerve under him againſt Syrus, and the other Kings confederate with him, and gave the reſt to his brother Abiſai; commanding him to oppoſe himſelf againſt the Ammonites whileſt he charged the reſt; and appointing him, that if he perceived that the Syrians were ſtronger than he, and did put him to the worſt, that he ſhould come to ſuccour him; promiſing to do the like, if he perceived him to be oppreſſed F by the Ammonites; When therefore he had exhorted his Brother to behave himſelf valiantly, he ſent him before to charge the Ammonites; and he on the other ſide aſſailed the Syrians, who valiantly reſiſted him for a little ſpace; but Joab having ſlain many of them, conſtrained them at length to turn their backs. Which when the Ammonites perceived (who were afraid of Abiſai and his people) retreated likewiſe, and following the example of their allies, they took their flight into the City. By which means, Joab having defeated his Enemies, returned in triumph and with victory unto the King to Jeruſalem.

Yet were not the Ammonites wholly weakned by this loſs: for although they had by thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe. David underſtanding that the Ammonites drew H to an head, and intended to aſſault him again, he ſurceaſed to ſend his Lieutenants, but went himſelf in Perſon, and meeting them, he overcame them and killed fourty thouſand of their Foot, and ſeven thouſand Horſe: he hurt Sobac alſo, Chalamas Lieutenant, ſo that he died of his wounds. Hereupon the Meſopotamians yielded themſelves unto David, and gave him many great and magnificent Preſents. He therefore, by reaſon of the Winter, retired to Jeruſalem, but at the Spring he ſent out his Lieutenant Ioab once more to make War upon the Ammonites: who overrunning their Countrey, utterly ſpoiled it, and ſhut them up in Aramath their principal City, which he beſieged and took.

About this time it ſo fell out, that David (notwithſtanding he were a juſt man, and one that feared God, and an exact obſerver of all the Laws and ordinances of his forefathers) I fell into a great ſin, and offended God. For as he walked on the top of his Royal Palace, in the evening, he diſcovered a Woman of incomparable Beauty, (whoſe name was Bethſabe) bathing her ſelf. His paſſion became forthwith ſo impetuous, that he could not reſiſt it; whereupon he ſent for her, and kept her with him till ſhe conceived. She deſired him to bethink himſelf of ſome means whereby her ſhame might be concealed, and her life (which was in hazard, by the Law, for her Adultery) might be preſerved. Who thereupon ſent for Vrias (Bethſabes Husband, and one of Joabs Captains, who at that time was at the ſiege of Aramath) and enquired of him upon his arrival touching the ſtate of the ſiege, and of the Army: who anſwering him that all things were fallen out according to his wiſh; David took a part of his own ſupper and gave it him, willing him K to repair unto his own houſe, and repoſe himſelf with his Wife. But Vrias ſlept among his fellow-ſouldiers near unto the perſon of the King. Which when David underſtood, he asked him wherefore he repaired not to his own houſe, according to the cuſtome of Husbands that had been long abſent: and why he viſited not his Wife from whom he had been ſo long parted? Vrias replied, That it became him not either to repoſe or take pleaſure with his Wife, whileſt his companions and General lay upon the ground in the Enemies Countrey. Which ſaid, David commanded him to ſojourn there all the day long, to the end that on the next morrow, he might ſend him back again to Joab. That night the King invited him to ſupper, and although he were made drunk through the abundance of Wine he received, which the King had purpoſely cauſed to be given him, L (yet he ſlept at the Kings gate without any deſire to go home unto his Wife.) Herewith the King being much troubled wrote unto Joab, commanding him to puniſh Vrias, becauſe he had offended him: enjoyning him to place him in the greateſt danger, and in face of the Enemy, to the intent, that he might be abandoned and left alone, whileſt they that fought next unto him, retired when they ſaw him charged. When he had thus written and ſealed up the Letter with his own ſeal, he delivered it to Vrias to carry to Joab: who receiving the ſame, and conceiving the Kings pleaſure, placed Vrias in that quarter where he knew the Enemies would fight moſt deſperatly; appointing him ſome of his beſt Soldiers to ſecond him; he aſſured him, that if he could make any breach in the wall he would come up to him with all his power, that he might through that place force M his way into the City.

v. 18, 19, 20.
Vrias with ſome others is ſlain and the King is certified thereof Vrias (who was a good Soldier, and a man of much honour and reputation among thoſe of his Tribe, and refuſed no danger) valiantly accepted the charge: But Joab privately appointed thoſe that were ranked next him, that when they ſhould ſee the Enemy ſally out with the greateſt fury, they ſhould abandon Vrias. When therefore the Hebrews drew naer unto the City, the Ammonites, fearing leſt the Enemy ſhould ſpeedily Scale and enter the City on that ſide where Vrias was placed, they choſe out a ſquadron of the moſt reſolute men amongſt them, and ſetting open their gates they furiouſly aſſaulted their Enemies. They that were near Vrias ſeeing them draw near, retired back again according as Joab had before-hand commanded them: but Vrias being aſhamed N to flie or forſake his rank, expected the Enemy, and valiantly encountring him, he ſlew divers of them; but at laſt being incloſed and ſhut in the midſt of them, he was ſlain with ſome others of his companions. This done, Joab ſent meſſengers unto the King, to let him know, that not enduring the delay of the ſiege, but attempting to carry the Town by Storm, he was compelled to return back into his Camp, with the loſs of ſome of his men; but he commanded the meſſengers, that if they perceived the King to be diſpleaſed with the news, they ſhould let him know that Vrias was dead alſo.

v. 20, 21.
David is diſpleaſed with the news of his overthrow.

The King hearing this ſeemed diſpleaſed, ſaying, that it was a fault in him that he had ſo nerly approached the wall, alledging that he might have done far better, to have taken the town by Mine, or by battering it with his Engines; in the caſe of Abimelech inſtancing O Gideons ſon, who intending to ſurprize by force a tower that was within the City of Tebez, was ſtrucken with a ſtone that was caſt at him by a woman: whereof he died. In remem-

A brance of whoſe diſaſter, they ought to have been more wary, and not to have approached the Wall of the Enemy ſo nearly. For it is the part of a Soldier to retain in his memory both fatal and fortunate ſucceſſes, to the end that when he ſhall be in the like danger he may follow the one, and fly the other. Whilſt he thus rebuked them, the meſſenger certified him of Vrias death, which did ſomewhat appeaſe him. So that he commanded them to tell Joab, that it was but an humane accident, and that ſuch was the nature of War, that ſometime the one had the better and ſometime the other: To conclude, that he ſhould provide for the ſiege, and take care leſt hereafter they ſhould receive any further loſs; counſelling him by Trenches and Engines to ruinate the wall, and commanding that all thoſe that were in the Town, ſhould be put to the Sword. The meſſenger thus diſmiſſed, reported all theſe B things unto Joab, according to the kings commandement. But Vrias Wife having notice of the death of her Husband, wept and mourned for him divers dayes: and when her mourning for the dead was ended, the King eſpouſed her, and ſhe bare him a man-child: Yet God beheld not this Marriage with a favourable eye, but was wroth with David, and appearing to the Prophet Nathan in a dream, he commanded him to reprove David. Now Nathan, who was a wiſe and experienced man, knew well that when Kings are diſpleaſed, they ſuffer themſelves rather to be guided by paſſion, than by reaſon: wherefore he thought fit to conceal the threatnings of God for that time; and to begin his diſcourſe with ſomething that ſhould be leſs harſh to the King; wherefore he addreſſed himſelf after this manner. Two men (ſaid he) dwelt in the ſame City: the one of them C was rich, having much great and ſmall cattell; the other was poor, and had but one only ſheep, which he fed and loved like his children. It hapned that this rich man had a ſtranger came to his houſe, for whoſe entertainment he would not ſuffer any one of his own Beaſts to be ſlain, but ſent a meſſenger, who took away, by force, the poor mans ſheep, and cauſed it to be dreſſed, to entertain his gueſt. This report of Nathans much diſpleaſed the King, inſomuch that he ſwore unto him, that he that had committed ſuch an act, was a wicked man, and that he ſhould reſtore him fourfold, and that afterward he ſhould be put to death. Whereunto Nathan replied, ſaying, That it was he that deſerved this puniſhment, who had given ſentence againſt himſelf; in that he had preſumed to commit ſo grievous a ſin. Moreover, he certified him of Gods diſpleaſure, who, notwithſtanding he had made him D King over all the Hebrews, and Lord over all the Nations round about, which were many and great; and had protected him from the hands of Saul, and had given him Wives, whom he had eſpouſed lawfully, was ſo diſhonoured by him, that he had taken another mans Wife, and cauſed her Husband to be ſlain. For which ſins, he pronounced that he ſhould be puniſhed by God, and his Wives ſhould be violated by one of his own Sons, who ſhould likewiſe lay a ſnare for him ſo that he ſhould ſuffer an open ſhame for the ſin he had committed in ſecret. Moreover, (ſaid he) the ſon which thou ſhalt have by her, ſhall ſhortly die.

After the had King received this meſſage, he was troubled, and wept, confeſſing that he had done wickedly: for before this time he had always feared God, and had never in his life offended him, but in the caſe of Vria: whereupon after his ſubmiſſion, God was E appeaſed, and took compaſſion of him, promiſing him to continue both his life and Kingdom, and that he would be no more diſpleaſed with him, if he repented him of the ſin he had committed. After Nathan had declared theſe things unto David he departed unto his own houſe. But God, according to the word of the Prophet, inflicted a grievous ſickneſs on the infant that was born by Bethſabe: for which cauſe the King was troubled, and for ſeven days ſpace would eat no meat, although he was earneſtly preſſed thereunto by his Servants. He put on likewiſe a mourning habit, and cloathed himſelf with Sackcloth, beſeeching God that it would pleaſe him to grant him the childs life. But when the infant was deceaſed about the ſeventh day of his ſickneſs, his ſervants durſt not let him know it, ſuppoſing that if it ſhould come unto his ear, he would the more obſtinately abſtain from eating, F and his health would be indangered by his inordinate grief, conſidering he had ſo vehemently been afflicted for his ſickneſs. But the King perceiving that his Servants were troubled, and that they concealed ſomething from him, and gathering thereby that his Son was dead: he called unto him one of his officers, who certifying him of the truth, he aroſe and waſhed himſelf, and changed his rayment, and preſented himſelf before the Tabernacle of God, and commanded that they ſhould bring him meat that he might eat.
Whereat his friends and Servants wondred, and beſought him that they might know the cauſe, he anſwered, while the child was alive, and I had hope of his recovery, I omited no means whereby I might move God to mercy; but now after he is dead, it were in vain for me to ſpend my ſelf with unneceſſary grief. Which when they heard they G approved the wiſdom of the King. After this Bethſabe his Wife brought him a ſecond Son,

The King, underſtanding what Joab had written,commended his affection and fidelity, and taking with him all the forces which he had, he came to the taking in of Rabatha, which being carried by force,and the plunder given to his Soldiers,he reſerved for himſelf the Crown of the King of the Ammonites,weighing a talent of Gold, in the midſt whereof was enchaſed a Sardonyx of great value, which David wore upon his head. He found likewiſe in that City divers ſpoils of great price: but the inhabitants he put to the Sword, and did the like in all the Cities of the Ammonites which he took by force. But after I the King was returned unto Jeruſalem, a great misfortune befell his family,upon this occaſion.
He had a Daughter which was a Virgin, fair and beautiful, and ſurpaſſed all other women in perfections, whoſe name was Thamar, born of the ſame Mother with Abſolon. Of her, Amnon the eldeſt Son of David became enamoured: and becauſe he could not enjoy her at his pleaſure,he grew ſo melancholy,that his body dryed up, and his colour changed through grief. A certain couſin and friend of his called Jonathan, perceiving his paſſion,and obſerving every day how Amnons beauty and ſtrength decayed, came unto him, and asked him the cauſe thereof,alledging that that indiſpoſition of his ſeemed to proceed from ſome amorous affection. Which when Amnon confeſſed, and how he was in love with his Siſter by the Fathers ſide, Jonathan ſuggeſted to him the K means how to compaſs his deſires: for he perſuaded him to counterfeit himſelf ſick, and that if his Father came to viſit him, he ſhould deſire him to ſend his ſiſter to attend him, by which means he ſhould eaſily be delivered of his ſickneſs. This counſel of his was plauſible in Amnons ears,who preſently counterfeited a ſickneſs; and laid him down on his Bed (as Jonathan had adviſed him) and when David came to viſit him,he deſired him to ſend his Siſter unto him. When ſhe came,he prayed her,that with her own hands, ſhe would make ſome Cakes for him, becauſe they would the more content him if they were of her own making: wherefore ſhe in her Brothers preſence tempered the flower, and made certain Cakes,and fried them in the Pan, and preſented them unto him: but he taſted them not, but commanded all his Servants to retire out of his lodging, becauſe L he intended to take his reſt without noiſe or trouble. As ſoon as this commandment of his was performed, he prayed his ſiſter to bring the Meat into his inner Chamber: He followed her, and diſcovering his paſſion began to offer violence. But the Virgin crying out,endeavoured what ſhe could,to diſſwade him from an action ſo ſinful,and diſhonourable to their family; or if he had not the power to reſiſt the ſame,ſhe adviſed him to require her at his Fathers hands, and not to take her honour from her by force. But he inraged with love, neglected all theſe ſayings,and violated her, notwithſtanding all her reſiſtance. And as ſoon as he he had ſatisfied his luſtfull deſire, he hated her and commanded her to ariſe and depart. She anſwered, that this ſecond outrage was more hainous than the former; for that having violated her,he would not ſuffer her to remain M there until night,but thruſt her out in the day time, to the end ſhe might have her ſhame diſcovered: notwithſtanding all theſe juſt reaſons of hers, he commanded his Servant to drive her out. She being greived at the outrage and violence that had been offered her, tore her Garment (which was ſuch as the Noble and Princely Virgins were wont to wear) and ſtrewed aſhes on her head,running thorow the City with cries and lamentations, wherein ſhe expreſſed what wrong had been done unto her. Her Brother Abſalom met her and enquiring what evil had befaln her, ſhe reported all the injury which her Brother Amnon had don her: whereupon he exhorted her to pacifie her ſelf, and to ſuffer moderately whatſoever had befallen her; and not to ſuppoſe herſelf to be diſhonoured by any act of her Brother. Whereupon ſhe was ſomewhat pacified and remained a long N time with her Brother Abſalom unmarried.

Ver. 24. ad 29. Abſalom invited his father and brethren to his ſheep-ſhearing, and commandeth his ſervants to kill Amnon, being over-charged with wine and ſleep.

David having intelligence of that which had hapned, was diſpleaſed, notwithſtanding he loved Amnon very entirely, (becauſe he was his eldeſt ſon) and would not diſquiet him: but Abſalom hated him extremely, expecting ſome fit opportunity, wherein he might revenge himſelf on the Raviſher. Now when two years were expired ſince his ſiſter was defloured,it chanced that Abſalom intending a ſheep-ſhearing in Belſephon,a City of the Tribe of Ephraim, invited his Father and Brethren to come to his Entertainment.
But when the King refuſed to go, leſt he might be chargeable unto him, Abſalom preſſed and perſuaded him to ſend his brothers thither; which he granted. Hereupon Abſalon commanded his ſervants, that when they ſhould ſee Amnon charged with wine and ſleep, O they ſhould ſuddenly (upon a ſign given by him unto them) kill him, without fear or regard of any perſon.

CHAP. VIII.

How through the Domeſtick diſcord of his Family, David was baniſhed by his Son out of his Kingdom.

The year of the World, 2912. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1052.

AFter that Abſalom's ſervants had thus executed his Commandment, a trouble and fear ſeized all the reſt of his Brethren, inſomuch as they ſuſpected their own perſons: wherefore mounting themſelves on Horſeback, they poſted all in haſte towards their Father. But a Meſſenger who arrived before them, reported unto David, that Abſalom had ſlain all his ſons. Who, ſurprized with the dreadful apprehenſion of ſo heinous a crime, B in ſuppoſing that ſuch a number of his Children ſhould be ſlain, and that by their own Brother, neither enquired the cauſe, nor had patience to expect the confirmation of the report, but gave himſelf over to extreme grief; and renting his garments, laid him down on the earth, bewailing all his children, both thoſe that were ſlain, as him alſo that had ſlain them. But Jonathan, the ſon of Sama his Brother, exhorted him to moderate his paſſion, telling him, That he could not be perſuaded that the reſt of his children were ſlain, in that he could conceive no probable cauſe of conjecture. But as touching Amnon, there needed no queſtion, for that it was very like that Abſalom (by reaſon of the injury which was offered unto his ſiſter Thamar) would hazard himſelf to kill him. Mean while a great trampling of Horſes, and a confuſed Troop of Men break off their diſcourſe. Theſe were the C Kings ſons, who returned in Poſt from the Entertainment, the afflicted Father ran forth to embrace them, accompanying their tears with a heavy and ſorrowful countenance: And ſeeing (beyond all hope) how they, whom a little before he ſuppoſed to be loſt, returned in ſafety, they gave themſelves over to tears and lamentations; the Brothers bewailed the loſs of their Brother, and the King his murthered Son. But Abſalom fled into Geſſur (unto his Grandfather on the Mothers ſide, and Lord of that place) and ſojourned with him three whole years: at the end whereof, David determined to ſend for his Son Abſalom, not to puniſh him, but receive him into favor, (for the indignation he had conceived againſt him, was at that time abated:) Joab alſo furthered this his reſolution by all means poſſible: For he cauſed a certain old Woman, attired in mourning D Habit, to preſent her ſelf before David, who ſaid unto him, That betwixt her two Sons that lived in the Countrey, there hapned ſuch a difference, that falling to handy-ſtrokes, they were ſo inraged one againſt the other, that not enduring to be parted, the one of them ſo wounded the other, that he died; and becauſe her Relations were incenſed againſt the Murtherer, and ſought without mercy, to deprive him of life, ſhe humbly beſought the King that he would give her her Sons life, and not deprive her of that onely comfort of her old age; which he ſhould bring to paſs, if ſo be he prohibited thoſe that would kill her ſon, from executing their intents: for except it were for fear of him, they would by no means be withdrawn from their fatal and bloody reſolution. Now when the King had granted her Requeſt, the Woman proceeded, I moſt humbly thank your Majeſty, (ſaid ſhe) who have had compaſſion of mine age, and do ſo pro- E vidently take care that I be not deprived of my Son; but that I may be the better aſſured of thy ſincerity, I beſeech thee (O King) firſt of all pacifie thy diſpleaſure conceived againſt thy Son, and be no more incenſed againſt him: For how can I perſuade my ſelf that you will grant me this favor, if you your ſelf continue your diſpleaſure conceived, upon the like occaſion, againſt your Son? For it is contrary to the Rules of Wiſdom, to add to the irreparable loſs of one Son, the voluntary deprivation of another. Upon theſe words, the King began to ſuſpect that Joab had ſuborned this Woman; and underſtanding no leſs by the old Womans report, he ſent for Joab, and told him, That he granted him that which he deſired, commanding him to ſend for Abſalom, aſſuring him that his diſpleaſure was pacified, and choler aſſwaged. Joab caſt himſelf down proſtrate before the King, and returning him Thanks, he went unto F Geſſur, and brought Abſalom from thence with him to Jeruſalem. The King underſtanding that his Son was come, ſent out a Meſſenger to meet him, commanding that as yet he ſhould not preſume to come into his preſence, becauſe he was not diſpoſed to ſee him ſo ſuddenly. Whereupon he forbore to ſhew himſelf unto him, and went and dwelt amongſt his own Friends, and Houſhold Servants: Neither was his beauty any way decreaſed by the ſorrow he had conceived, or for that his entertainment was far different from the quality of a Princes Son; but he rather exceeded, and grew more famous thereby: ſo that for beauty, and comelineſs of perſon, he excelled all others; his Hair was ſo thick, that it could ſcarcely be polled in eight days, and weighed 200 ſhekels, which amount to five pound. He lived two years in Jeruſalem, and was the Father of G three Sons, and one Daughter, which Roboam the Son of Salomon afterwards took to Wife, of whom he begat a Son called Abia. In proceſs of time, he ſent Meſſengers unto Joab, to deſire him that he would pacifie his Father, and prevail with him to admit him

And now, I beſeech thee, that thou wilt move my Father in my behalf; otherwiſe, I ſhall think Joab was perſuaded through the compaſſion he conceived of the neceſſity wherein he ſaw him, and went and ſollicited the King, with whom he ſo effectually debated, as touching Abſalom, that altering his diſpoſition, he graciouſly ſent and called for him. I As ſoon as he came unto his preſence, Abſalom caſt himſelf proſtrate on the ground, asking pardon for his offences: but David raiſed and lifted him up, and promiſed that from thenceforth he would no more upbraid him with thoſe miſdeeds. After theſe things had thus fallen out, Abſalom within a little ſpace, provided a great number of Horſes and Chariots, and entertained fifty Men for his Guard, and every day early in the Morning preſented himſelf before the Kings Palace, and talked with thoſe that reſorted thither about the tryal of their differences: and whereas ſome of them loſt their cauſe, he talked with them according as he found them affected, alledging, That his Father had no good Counſellers, and that perhaps he himſelf had in ſome things judged amiſs: and by theſe means endeavored he to get the good will of all men, telling them, That if he had the like authority, he K would make them know by proof what his equity was. Having by theſe plauſible perſuaſions drawn the hearts of the common People unto him, he was perſuaded they would ſerve attended with a great concourſe of People, (by reaſon he had appointed divers to meet and 200 others of Jeruſalem, who altogether ignorant of his deſign, aſſembled themſelves in that place to be aſſiſtant to his Sacrifice:) by all whom he was declared King, L according as he himſelf had commanded. When the News hereof came unto Davids ears, and he was aſſured how his Son had behaved himſelf; he was much troubled for his impiety and arrogancy: that he ſhould ſo ſoon forget the pardon, which he had obtained for his enormous Crimes; and, contrary to all Law, plunge himſelf, and hazard his Reputation in more grievous offences, to pervert the ſtate of the Kingdom which God had eſtabliſhed, to deprive his own Father of his Crown and Dignity; wherefore he reſolved to flie to the other ſide of Jordan, carrying with him his moſt truſty Friends, to whom he repreſented the unbridled fury of his Son, remitting all things unto God, who judgeth all things; and leaving the Government of his Royal Houſe to the management of his ſix Concubines, he departed from Jeruſalem. He was accompanied with a great number M of People, beſides thoſe 600 Soldiers, who had followed him in his Baniſhment during Sauls life-time. And although the High Prieſts, Abiathar and Sadoc, with all the Levites, had reſolved to depart with him, yet perſuaded he them to abide with the Ark, aſſuring them, that God would deliver them, although the Ark ſhould continue in its to his Command, followed him, whereby he more manifeſtly expreſt his affection towards him. But as he went on his bare Feet up the Mountain of Olivet, and all they of his Train followed him, (intermixing their travel with bitter tears) a certain Meſſenger N came and certified him, that Achitophel was with Abſalom. Which report aggravated and increaſed his grief: ſo that he beſought God, that it might pleaſe him to alienate the affection of Abſalom from Achitophel, that he might not give heed unto any of his counſels, becauſe Achitophel was a Man of a ripe judgment, and ready execution in all that concerned him. As ſoon as he came unto the top of the Mountain, he beheld the City: and, as if he had utterly been baniſhed from his Kingdom, he began, with abundance of tears, to call upon God. There met he with Chuſai, his ſincere and unfeigned Friend, whom, when he beheld with his Garments rent, with aſhes on his Head, and lamenting

This Man drave before him two Aſſes loaden with Victuals, which he preſented to David and his company, to refreſh themſelves; and being demanded, Where he had left Mephiboſheth?

riches which he had confer'd upon Mephiboſheth in times paſt, judging him more worthy of the ſame than Mephiboſheth. Wherewith Siba was very well contented.

2 Sam. 16. 1, ad 5. Siba accuſing his maſter wrongfully, is made owner of his riches.

When David drew near unto a place which is called Bachor, a Kinſman of Sauls, called Simei, the Son of Gera, came out againſt him, and caſt ſtones at him, and reviled him; and the more Davids friends invironed and defended him, the more obſtinately perſevered he in his reproofs and ſcandalous railings: calling him Murtherer, and Captain of the wicked, charging him like an execrable Man, to get him out of the Kingdom; giving God thanks for that he had deprived him of his Kingdom, by the means of his own ſon, as a puniſhment for thoſe Crimes which he had committed againſt his own Maſter.
C This his licentiouſneſs, moved all Davids followers to diſpleaſure, ſo that all of them were ready to revenge them on Simei; and amongſt the reſt, Abiſai would have ſlain him: but David would not permit him, but commanded him to forbear: For fear, (ſaid he) leaſt to our preſent miſeries we annex a further and new occaſion. Foraſmuch as concerneth my ſelf, I ſet light by this mad Dog, and refer the matter to God, who hath permitted him to be thus deſperately bent againſt us. Neither is it to be wondred at, that I ſuffer my ſelf to be thus abuſed by him, ſith mine own ſon is ſo wicked, that he dareth openly declare himſelf my mortal enemy; but God, through his goodneſs, will at length look upon us with an eye of mercy, and his juſtice will certainly confound all thoſe that have conſpired to my ruine. He therefore walked onward on his way, not caring what Simei ſaid, who ran on the other ſide D of the Mountain, railing and reviling him. When David was arrived on the bank of Jordan, he muſtered and refreſhed his Army, who were wearied with their march: mean while Abſalon entring Jeruſalem with Achitophel his Counſeller, was ſaluted and applauded by the concourſe of the people; and amongſt the reſt, Davids friend came unto him, who proſtrated himſelf before Abſalons feet, wiſhing him a long and happy Reign. Abſalon asked, how it came to paſs, that he who was reputed to be one of Davids moſt intimate friends, and eſteemed alwayes to be moſt loyal and faithful unto him, ſhould at that time (when occaſion ſerved to expreſs his loyalty) abandon him, and ſubmit himſelf to his enemy? To whom Chuſai anſwered readily, That it became him to follow God, and the good will of the people.

Ver. 9, ad 15. David forbiddeth to kill Simei.

Ver. 16, 17, 18. Chuſai, under a colour, offereth his ſervice to Abſalon.

E Since therefore (ſaid he, my Sovereign) that both theſe are on your ſide, it concerneth me to follow you, becauſe you have received the Kingdom from God: If therefore you ſhall think fit to account me amongſt your friends, I will approve unto you my loyalty and affection in like manner, as to your knowledge I have done unto your father, who ought not to be diſpleaſed at that which hath hapned, ſince the Kingdom is not removed into another houſe, but remaineth in his own family, becauſe he who was his ſon received the ſame. By theſe words he reconciled himſelf to Abſalom, and removed all ſuſpition. Hereupon Achitophel was ſent for to conſult about their affairs in hand: who adviſed him to abuſe all his fathers Concubines, and make them his own. For, (ſaid he) from that time forward, the people will believe that you and he will never be reconciled; and will be more ready to bear Arms, and oppoſe your F father for your ſake. For hitherto (ſaid he) they have unwillingly profeſſed themſelves to be his Enemies, ſuſpecting leaſt a peace ſhould be concluded betwixt the father and the ſon. Abſalom giving heed to this advice, cauſed a Tent or Royal Pavilion to be pitched in the ſight of all the people whereinto he entred, and enjoyed his fathers Concubines.
And thus was accompliſhed what was foretold by Nathan the Prophet.

Abſalon's War againſt his Father: his death, and the diſcomfiture of his Army.

G WHen Abſalon had done that which Achitophel had adviſ'd him, he requeſted him once more to counſel him concerning that War which he had undertaken againſt his Father: who required 10000 choſen Men, by whoſe aſſiſtance he promiſed to kill David, and to bring all that were with him under his ſubjection: aſſuring him, that Ab- ſalon's Kingdom would be then eſtabliſhed, when Davids head was cut off from his H ſhoulders. This counſel pleaſed Abſalon, whereupon he ſent for Chuſai, who was the chiefeſt amongſt Davids friends, (for ſo David himſelf had termed him) to whom he diſcovered the advice which Achitophel had given him, and required him to give his opinion what he thought thereof: who knowing very well, that if Achitophels counſel were followed, David would be in danger to be ſurprized and ſlain, enforced all his arguments and counſels to the contrary. For, (ſaid he) Sir, you are ſufficiently informed both what your Fathers valor is, and their virtue that accompany him; who hath fought many Battels, and hath returned victorious over all his enemies. It is not to be doubted but that he is at this preſent encamped in the field. For he is well exerciſed in leading Armies, to prevent any ſtratagems, I whereby the enemy may injure him; and about the evening, he hath perhaps left a party of his men in ſome ſtraights, or placed them in ambuſh behind ſome Rock: and if our men ſhall aſſail him, his Soldiers will by little and little retire, and afterward recovering courage, by reaſon that the King ſhall be near unto them, they will charge us afreſh; and during the encounter, your father will ſuddenly break out of his ambuſh, and encourage his own men, and diſcomfort yours: wiſely therefore examine mine advice, and if you find that it be good, neglect that which Achitophel hath given you. Therefore in my opinion (without following the advice of Achitophel*) your Majeſty ought to gather together all your Forces, and to take the command of them your ſelf, without committing them to the conduct of any other, and by this means you may aſſuredly expect to have an eaſie victory over him, if you aſſail him in the open field, becauſe he is accompanied with a very few men, and your ſelf are attended by many thouſands, who* K will be very forward to expreſs their affection towards you at the beginning of your Reign, whereby you may eaſily rid you of your enemy. And if ſo be your father ſhut himſelf up in any City, we may eaſily take the ſame by Mines and Engines. This advice of his ſeemed to be better than that of Achitophels, ſo that Abſalon accepted it. For it was God that put this into his heart, to neglect Achitophels, and reſpect Chuſai's counſel.

Ver. 14. Chuſai's counſel accepted: Achitophels rejected.

Now when Chuſai had thus prevailed, he preſently went to the High Prieſts Sadoc and Abiathar, acquainting them with Achitophels deſigns, and how he had contradicted him; finally, how his opinion had taken place, giving them in charge to ſend private intelligence unto David thereof, and to inform him of his ſons reſolution; wiſhing him with all ſpeed to paſs over the River of Jordan, leſt Abſalon, being informed of his abode L in that place, ſhould make haſte and purſue him, and overtake him, before he might recover a place of ſecurity.

Ver. 15,16. Sadoc and Abiathars ſons ſent unto David.

The High Prieſts before-hand, had provided that their ſons ſhould lie hid without the City, on purpoſe, that they might be ſent unto David, to inform him how affairs went. They therefore ſent a truſty ſervant unto their ſons, who brought them news of Abſalons intentions, with expreſs commandment to inform the King thereof with all ſpeed, who preſently, upon this intelligence, like good and faithful miniſters, poſted away, to report their fathers meſſage unto the King.

Ver. 17,18, ad 22. The High Prieſts ſons being purſued, are hidden by a Woman in a Pit.

But ſcarcely had they travelled two furlongs, when certain Horſemen diſcover'd them, and brought news thereof unto Abſalon, who preſently ſent out Scouts to apprehend M them: which when the children of the High Prieſt perceived, they forſook the Highway, and retired into a certain Village near unto Jeruſalem, which is called Bocchura, where they beſought a certain Woman to hide them, and ſhut them in ſome place of ſecurity, who let them down into a Well, and covered the mouth thereof with bundles of Wooll. She being demanded by thoſe that purſued them, Whether ſhe ſaw them? denied the ſame, ſaying, That as ſoon as ſhe had given them drink, they departed from her preſently, aſſuring them, that if they preſently purſued them, they might eaſily apprehend them: But after they had a long time followed, and could not find them, they returned from whence they came. The Woman perceiving that they were departed, and that there was no cauſe of fear, leſt the young men ſhould be ſurprized, ſhe drew them out of the Pit, and N ſet them on their way: who, with as great ſpeed as was poſſible, repaired unto David, and declared unto him Abſalons deſigns. Hereupon David paſſed the River Jordan with all his men, and although it were night, he was not diſcouraged by the darkneſs.

Ver. 22. David informed of Abſalons deliberation, paſſeth himſelf and his whole Army over Jordan by night.

Ver. 23. Achitophel perceiving his counſel was deſpiſed, hung himſelf.

But Achitophel ſeeing that his counſel was rejected, took his Horſe, and went unto his Country of Gelmone: there calling together his houſhold ſervants, he related unto them what advice he had given Abſalon; which ſince he had not accepted, he told them that they ſhould ſhortly find that he was a loſt man, and that David would be victorious, and return into his Kingdom. It is better therefore, ſaid he, for me, as it becometh a valiant man, to depart out of this life, than to ſubmit my ſelf to Davids puniſhment, for having joined my ſelf unto Abſalon, and giving him counſel. This ſaid, he went into the moſt private O part of his Houſe, and hung himſelf, being both his own Judge and Executioner; after which, his kinſmen cut him down, and buried him. But David having paſt Jordan, came and

A and encamped in a ſtrong City, the beſt fortified in that Countrey: there was he kindly entertained by all the Noblemen of that Countrey, partly moved thereunto by the mans preſent neceſſity, partly through the reverence of his former felicity. The chief of theſe were Berzillai the Galaadite, and Siphar the Governor of the Province of the Ammonites, and Machir the chief of the Countrey of Galaad, who ſupplied David and his Army with whatſoever they wanted: ſo that they lacked neither beds, nor bread, nor fleſh, but were plentifully ſtored with all things. They that were ſick and wearied alſo, wanted nothing that either might ſerve for their repoſe or refection. In this ſtate remained he. But Abſalon aſſembled a great multitude of people to make War upon his father, and after he had paſſed Jordan, he pitched his Tents near unto his fathers, within B the Countrey of Galaad, and made Amaſa General of his Army, oppoſing him againſt Joab his couſin: for Amaſa was the ſon of Jothar and Abigal, the ſiſter of Sarvia, the mother of Joab, both of them ſiſters unto David. When David had muſtered and numbered his Forces, and found that he had 40000 fighting men, it was thought fit to put it forthwith to a battel, and not to expect till Abſalon ſhould attack him.

Ver. 24. Abſalon paſſeth over Jordan.

He therefore appointed Colonels over thouſands, and divided them into three ſquadrons; the one of which he gave to Joab, the ſecond to Abiſai his brother, and the third to Ethei his familiar friend (who was of the City of Geth.) In this battel his friends would not permit him to be preſent, (and that upon good conſideration) for they ſaid, That if they ſhould be defeated in his company, they ſhould utterly loſe all hope: but if one ſqua- C dron ſhould be overcome, the reſt might have recourſe unto him, who might unite and reinforce; the rather, for that the enemies would alwayes think it likely, that he had ſome other recruits with him. This counſel pleaſed him, for which cauſe he remained within the City. But at ſuch time as he ſent out his friends unto the battel, he beſought them (that in remembrance of all the benefits and favors he had beſtowed on them) they would both ſhew themſelves couragious in the fight, and that having obtained the victory, they would ſpare his ſon, for fear leaſt his death ſhould increaſe and redouble his diſcontents. Thus praying God to give them victory, he diſmiſſed them to the battel, But when Joab had placed his Army right over againſt the enemy, and had extended them on the Plain, having a Wood upon their backs; Abſalon alſo drew out his Army againſt him; ſo that D encountring one another, they performed many notable actions on both parts: the one hazarding themſelves in all dangers, and employing all their affections, to the intent that David might recover his Kingdom: the others neither refuſing to do or endure any thing, ſo that Abſalon might not be deprived, or expoſed to his fathers puniſhment and diſpleaſure for his inſolent attempt. Beſides that, they held it an indignity for them, that being ſo great in number as they were, they ſhould be overcome by ſuch a handful of people as followed Joab: thinking it an utter diſgrace unto them, that being ſo many thouſands of them in Arms, they ſhould be diſcomfited by Davids followers.

But Joab and his men being more ſkilful and trained in feats of Arms than the reſt, diſcomfited and brake Abſolons Army: ſo that they fled through Woods, and into ſtrong E places. Davids Soldiers purſuing after them, took ſome, and ſlew others; ſo that both in flight and fight, a great number of them were put to the Sword: for there fell that day about 20000 Men. But all Davids Troops freſhly ſet upon Abſalon, who was eaſily known by his beauty and ſtature: he fearing to be ſurprized by his enemies, mounted upon a ſwift Mule, and fled in great haſte. But by the ſwift motion of his body, his locks being ſcattered abroad, his buſh of Hair was intangled in a thick and branchy Tree, where he hung after a ſtrange manner, and his Mule ran onward with great ſwiftneſs, as if ſhe had as yet born her maſter on her back: but he hanging by the Hair amidſt the branches, ſuddenly fell into his enemies hands. This when a certain Soldier perceived, he brought news thereof unto Joab, who promiſed him to give him 50 ſicles, if he would kill him.

Ver. 8, 9. The flight and overthrow of Abſalons Army.

F The Soldier anſwered, That if he would give him 2000, he would not commit ſuch a murther on the ſon of his Sovereign, the rather, for that in the preſence of them all, David had requeſted them to ſpare him. Hereupon Joab commanded him to ſhew him the place where he had ſeen Abſalon hang: who had no ſooner diſcovered him, but thruſting a Javelin to his heart, he ſlew him. That done, Joabs Eſquires ſurrounded the Tree, took him down, and caſt him into a deep Pit, they overwhelmed him with ſtones: ſo that in appearance it ſeemed to be a Tomb or Monument. After this, when Joab had ſounded a retreat, he withdrew his Soldiers from purſuit, as thinking it unnatural for one Countreyman to imbrue his hands in the blood of another. Abſalon had erected in the Royal Valley, two furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem, a Marble Pillar, with an Inſcription upon it, to G the intent that if his Race ſhould be extinct, his memory might be preſerved by that Monument which he had erected. Now he had 3 ſons, and a daughter called Thamar, who was married to Roboam, Davids Nephew, and had by him a ſon called Abia, who ſucceeded his father in the Kingdom; of whom we ſhall ſpeak more at large.

CHAP. X.

The happy ſtate of David being reſtored unto his Kingdom.

Ver. 21, ad 32. Chuſai ſent to certifie David of the victory.

Ver. 33. David hearing of Abſaloms death by Chuſai, grievouſly bewaileth him.

AFter that Abſalon was ſlain, all the people returned privately to their own houſes: but Achimaas, the ſon of the High Prieſt Sadoc, drew near unto Joab, requiring his leave to repair unto David, and to certifie him of the victory, and how by Gods help and providence he had vanquiſhed his enemies. This did the General deny him, telling him, That it was not convenient that he, who heretofore was wont to bring joyful news, ſhould now certifie the King of his ſons death. He therefore commanded him to ſtay, and calling Chuſai to his preſence, he gave him commiſſion to certifie the King of that I which he had ſeen. Achimaas requeſted him the ſecond time that he would ſuffer him to go, promiſing him that he would make no mention but of the victory; and that as touching Abſalons death, he would not utter any thing: whereupon he diſmiſſed him alſo, who chooſing the ſhorter way, outſtripped Chuſai. Now as David ſate in the gate of the City, (expecting ſome meſſenger that might certifie him of the ſucceſs of the battel) one of the Sentinels perceiving Achimaas, that came running haſtily, and not being able to diſtinguiſh who it was, told David that he ſaw a meſſenger coming towards him: who anſwered, that it was ſome one that brought joyful news. Anon after, he told him that a certain other meſſenger followed: to whom David anſwered likewiſe, that it was one that brought glad tydings. And when the Watchman perceived that it was Achimaas, K Sadoc the High Prieſts ſon, and that he was near at hand, he ran firſt of all and certified David; who was very glad thereof, ſaying, That he brought ſome good and deſirable news touching the event of the battel: and no ſooner had the King ſpoken the word, but Achimaas entred, and fell down upon his face before David, to whom he reported that his Army had the victory. Being afterwards demanded what was become of Abſalon? He anſwered, That he incontinently departed from the Camp, as ſoon as the enemies were put to flight, but that a great number of Soldiers purſued Abſalon: and further then that he knew nothing, becauſe by Joabs commandment he was ſpeedily ſent away to bring tydings of the victory. When Chuſai was come, and had humbled himſelf before the King, and had declared unto him the ſucceſs of the battel, the queſtion L was asked how Abſalon did? whereunto he anſwered: The like fortune happen to all thine enemies (O King) as hath happed to Abſalon. Theſe words quite extinguiſhed the delight and joy that David conceived in the victory, and the exceſs thereof much troubled his ſervants; for the King aſcending into the higheſt part of the City, bewailed his ſon, beating his breaſt, tearing his hair, and afflicting himſelf after ſuch a ſort as cannot be expreſſed, and crying out in a mournful manner: My ſon, (ſaid he) would God, my ſon, that I were dead with thee. For although of his own nature he was of a tender diſpoſition, yet loved he Abſalon above all the reſt of his children.

2 Sam. 19. 1, 2, 3, 4. Joab and his army enter the city in mournful manner.

Ver. 5, ad 8. David is taxed for lamenting his ſon, and upon Joabs perſwaſion preſenteth himſelf unto the people.

When the Army and Joab were informed that David lamented his ſon in this ſort, they had this reſpect unto him, that they would not enter the City after a triumphant and vi- M ctorious manner: but they entred hanging down their heads, and weeping all of them moſt tenderly, as if they had returned from ſome defeat. But when the King, having his head covered, perſevered to bewail his ſon, Joab entred in unto him, and ſaid, O King, you conſider not that in this behaviour of yours, you diſhonour your ſelf: for it is to be thought that you hate thoſe that love you, and expoſe themſelves to all perils for your ſake; yea, that you hate your ſelf and your own ſucceſſion: and that contrariwiſe, you love your moſt mortal enemies moſt entirely, ſince you bewail them, when they are juſtly deprived of their lives. For if Abſalom had had the victory, and had poſſeſſed the Kingdom, there had not any one of us been left alive that love you, but had all ſuffered death; nay, and in the firſt rank, your ſelf and your own children: neither would they, being our enemies, have lamented, but laughed at our deaths; N yea, they would puniſh them likewiſe, who ſhould have any compaſſion of our miſeries: yet are you not aſhamed to lament after this manner, for a man that hated you, who, although he received his life from you, yet he ſhewed not that honour and reſpect which he was obliged to expreſs towards a father. Deſiſt therefore from thy unjuſt lamentation, and offer thy ſelf in preſence to thy well-deſerving Soldiers, and give them thanks, that by their valor have obtained this victory: otherwiſe if thou continue as thou haſt begun, this day will I tranſlate the Kingdom from thee, and give thee a more juſt occaſion to lament than hitherto thou haſt had. By theſe words Joab allayed the Kings Lamentations, and drew him to the care of his Commonweal; for cloathing himſelf in a Royal habit, whereby he might appear the more glorious unto his Soldiers, he ſate in the gate: ſo that all the people hearing thereof, flock- O ed out to ſalute him.

A Whileſt theſe things paſt after this manner, they that remained alive of Abſalons Army, returning home unto their houſes, ſent meſſengers to every Village, to remind them how many benefits they had received at Davids hands, and how after many and grievous Wars, he had brought them to a ſecure liberty, and how unjuſtly they had revolted from him, and tranſlated the Kingdom unto another. For which cauſe it behooved them, ſince he was dead whom they had choſen, to make their ſubmiſſion unto David, that he might be reconciled to them, and receive the people into his favor, and that according as heretofore, ſo now alſo, he would vouchſafe them his pardon and protection. David being informed of theſe things, by expreſs Letters, commanded Sadoc and Abiathar the chief Prieſts, that they ſhould certifie the Princes of the Tribe of Juda, that it would be B a great indignity for them, that other Tribes ſhould prefer David to the Kingdom before them, eſpecially ſince he was of their Tribe. In like manner he commanded them to ſpeak with Amaſa the General, and expoſtulate with him, why he who was his Nephew by the ſiſters ſide, did not perſuade the Army to recommend the Kingdom to his hands: willing them to aſſure him, that he was not only to hope for pardon for that which was paſt, but alſo for the government of the whole Army, according as Abſalon had granted it unto him. Hereupon the High Prieſt not only conferred with the Princes, but alſo informed Amaſa what the King had promiſed in his behalf, whereby they drew him to their party. And firſt of all, thoſe of his own Tribe recalled David into his Kingdom; the reſt of the Iſraelites by their example, and Amaſa's authority, did the C like, and flocked from all parts, to congratulate his happy return to Jeruſalem. But the Tribe of Juda ſignalized themſelves above the reſt, by going out as far as the bank of Jordan to meet him: with theſe came Simei the ſon of Gera, with a thouſand men, which he had brought with him of the Tribe of Benjamin; Siba likewiſe Sauls freeman came thither with his 15 ſons, and 20 ſervants, who made a bridge over Jordan, that the King might the more eaſily paſs over with his Army. As ſoon as he came unto Jordan, he was ſaluted by the Tribe of Juda: and Simei marched forward on the bridge, and proſtrating himſelf at the Kings feet, asked pardon for his offences, and beſought him to be reconciled: and that in recovering his authority, he would not make him the firſt example of his juſtice, but that he ſhould remember this alſo, that he had repented of his error, D and did with the foremoſt march out to meet him upon his return. Whileſt thus he beſought the King, and lamented, Abiſai, Joabs brother, ſpake after this manner: Why ſhould he not dye that hath thus villanouſly reproached the King, whom God hath eſtabliſhed? But David turned back unto him, and ſaid, Ye ſons of Servia, will you never ceaſe to promote new troubles, and to add new diviſions to your former commotions? Know ye not that this is the firſt day of my Reign? For which cauſe I ſwear an oath that I will pardon all them that have committed any crime againſt me, and that no one man ſhall depart from me without my pardon. For which cauſe be of good cheer Simei, and fear thou not that I will ſeek thy blood. Whereupon he caſt himſelf down before the King, and afterward marched on his way. After this, Mephiboſheth, Sauls Grandchild, came out to meet him, cloathed in mean apparel, having E his Hair hanging down in a neglected and ſorrowful manner. For ſince the time that David fled and forſook the City, he had been ſo afflicted, that he neither had trimmed his Hair, nor changed or cleanſed his garment, ſuppoſing this calamity to touch him as nearly as it did the King: and he was the rather grieved, that Siba his ſteward, had unjuſtly detracted from him, and accuſed him to the King. After he had proſtrated himſelf, and adored the King, David asked him, For what cauſe he forſook him in his troubles, and offered not himſelf to accompany him in his flight? Who anſwered, That it was the wickedneſs of Siba, who was the cauſe thereof: for he, ſaid he, being commanded to prepare my neceſſaries for that journey, neglected the execution thereof, contemning both me and it, as if I had been ſome abject ſlave: otherwiſe, had I had the uſe of my feet, and the means to have waited F on thee in thy journey, I had never endured to have forſaken thee. Neither was he contented to hinder me from performing my duty, and to give your Majeſty a teſtimony of my affection and loyalty, but furthermore, he hath maliciouſly incenſed your Majeſty againſt me: yet know I well, that your wiſdom will not give credit to his detractions, both for that you are juſt, as alſo for that GOD and Truth, which you onely aſpire to, are onely beloved by you. For, whereas during my Grandfathers dayes, you were alwayes converſant amongſt the greateſt dangers, and perſecuted by him; and whereas all our poſterity by that means deſerved to be utterly extinguiſhed, yet have you uſed moderation and meekneſs in forgetting thoſe indignities, when it was in your power to revenge them. And notwithſtanding all theſe things, you have entertained me like your Friend, feaſted me at your Table, and dignified me with no leſs Honours, than if I had G been one of your neareſt Kinſmen. When David heard theſe things, he thought neither good to puniſh Mephiboſheth, nor to examine whether Siba had wrongfully accuſed him; but after he had certified him, that he had given Siba all his Goods, yet did he pardon him, and promiſe him the reſtitution of half his poſſeſſions. Whereunto Mephiboſheth H replied, Let Siba poſſeſs the whole, it only ſufficeth me, that I ſee your Maieſty reſtored again to your Kingdom. After this, David invited Berzillai the Galaadite (a virtuous man, and of great authority, and by whoſe bounty, during the time of his War, he was aſſiſted, and who had attended him as far as Jordan) to accompany him unto Jeruſalem, promiſing him to make no leſs account of him than of his Father, and aſſuring him that he would allow him all things that were ſuitable to his age and quality. But he being deſirous to live in private, beſought his Majeſty to diſmiſs him from the Court, becauſe (as he ſaid) his age was ſo great as it made him unfit for pleaſures, conſidering that he had attained to the age of fourſcore years: alledging, that it beter became him to think of I death, and his departure out of this World. For which cauſe he beſought David to favour him ſo much, as that he might govern himſelf according to his own deſire, becauſe that by reaſon of his age he neither knew how to ſavour meat nor drink; beſides, for that his hearing was loſt, ſo that he could not diſtinguiſh or diſcern the ſound of inſtruments, wherein they who converſe in Kings Courts do moſt uſually take ſuch delight.

Davids concubines, whom Abſalon had deflowred are ſequeſtred from him.

Joab by reaſon of Amaſa's delay is ſent out againſt Siba by David.

To this David replied, ſince (ſaid he) thou doſt ſo earneſtly requeſt me to give thee leave to depart from me, I diſmiſs thee: but leave thou thy Son Achimaas with me, that I may expreſs that kindneſs unto him which thou haſt deſerved. Hereupon Berzillai left his Son with him, and taking leave of the King (with prayer that God would grant him the fulneſs of his deſires) he returned to his own houſe. But David went unto Gilgal K (having already the half of the people with him, and the whole Tribe of Juda.) Thither reſorted then unto him the chief governors of that countrey, attended by a great multitude of people, complaining unto the Tribe of Juda, for that unwitting to the reſt they had reſorted to him, when as by a mutual conſent they ſhould all of them have met him together. But the Princes of the Tribe of Juda requeſted them in no ſort to miſinterpret their prevention of them. For that by reaſon of their alliance, and being of the ſame Tribe with the King, they were obliged to ſhew him a more particular reſpect, neither for that diligence of theirs received they any reward, whereby they that came after ſhould think themſelves prejudiced. This anſwer of theirs the Princes of the Tribes took not in good part, but ſpake thus unto their brethren: We wonder (ſaid they) L that you only challenge the King to be your kinſman, as if he were not to be accounted an Ally unto us all, whom God hath equally placed to be Governour over us all; when as therefore the whole people conſiſteth of eleven parts, you only are but one; beſides, we are your elders: ſo that you have not dealt uprightly, in that you have ſecretly ſought out the King, without giving us notice of your deſign. Whilſt the Governours after this manner debated the matter, a certain wicked ſeditious perſon called Siba, the Son of Bochri, of the Tribe of Benjamin, ſtanding up in the midſt of the people, began to cry out with a loud voice, and exclaim after this manner: We have no part with David, nor inheritance with the Son of Jeſſ.e This ſaid, he ſounded a Trumpet, and proclaimed War againſt the King, ſo that all men followed him, and forſook David. Only the tribe of Juda remained with M him, and eſtabliſhed him in the Royal Throne in Jeruſalem: upon his firſt coming thither he removed his Concubines (which his Son Abſalon had known) out of his Palace, and never after that time had any company with them. After this he declared Amaſa General of the Army, and placed him in the ſame degree which Joab had, near unto the Perſon of the King; commanding him that he ſhould aſſemble what forces he could out of the Tribe of Juda; and that within three dayes he ſhould return unto him, to the end that having delivered him both the Army and the place of General, he might ſend him to make War upon the Son of Bochri. After that Amaſa was departed, and had employed his time in gathering up his Army; the King ſeeing that he failed to return upon the third day, told Joab that it was dangerous to permit Siba to gather a greater head by N delay, and thereby breed more trouble and moleſtation than Abſalon had done. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ſtay thou not, but take unto thee thoſe forces which thou haſt in readineſs, and my ſix hundred men, with thy brother Abiſai; and purſue thou the Enemy, and in what place ſoever thou meeteſt him, by all means endeavour to give him the Battel, Haſte therefore, and overtake him, leſt he ſeize ſome of our ſtrongeſt Cities, and thereby create us a greater trouble.

v. 9, 10. Joab killeth Amaſa.

Joab with all expedition obeyed his commandment, and took with him the ſix hundred, with his Brother Abiſai, and commanded all the forces that were in Jeruſalem to follow after him, and marched in good order after Siba. When he came unto Gabaon (a Village about forty furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem) Amaſa met him, with great forces. Joab having his Sword girt by his ſide, whilſt Amaſa came onward to ſalute him, he on pur- O poſe let his Sword ſlip out of his ſheath, and taking it up from the ground with one hand, he drew near unto Amaſa, under pretence to ſalute him, and taking him by the beard, he

Which action of his was hainous and deteſtable, proceeding from a jealouſie he had conceived againſt a virtuous young man, one of great merit, and of great hopes, being his near Relation, who had in no ſort offended him; but only by accepting the place of General which the King had conferred on him; and becauſe David had equalled him in honour with him; for which very cauſe heretofore he had ſlain Abner. Notwithſtanding that act of his ſeemed in ſome ſort more excuſable, by reaſon of the wrong which he had pretended to be done unto his Brother Azael, yet was not this a ſufficient colour to excuſe the murther of Amaſa. When this was done,he purſued Siba,and left a certain man to wait upon the body of Amaſa, who had commandment given him to proclaim, with a loud voice, I thorow the whole army,that he was juſtly and deſervedly ſlain;commanding thoſe that favored the Kings title,to follow their General Joab, and his Brother Abiſai; whileſt his body lay thus in the way, and all the multitude (as it is uſual in ſuch like accidents) flocked round about it,he that had charge of the body took it up, and bare it into a certain place out of the way,and covered it with a Garment: which done,all the people followed Joab.

v. 9, 10. Joab killeth Amaſa.

Now whileſt he purſued Siba thorow all the Region of the Iſraelites, he told him that he had retired himſelf into a certain ſtrong City called Abelmacha; where he no ſooner arrived, but that he begirt the City,and entrenched it round about,commanding his Soldiers to undermine and overthrow the walls: for he was much incenſed becauſe they had ſhut the gates againſt him. But a certain prudent woman, ſeeing her countrey in extreme K peril, ſhe went up to the top of the walls and called unto Joab; who coming forth unto her, ſhe ſpake after this manner, God hath ordained Kings and Generals of Armies, to the end they might deſtroy the Enemies of the Hebrews, and plant amongſt them an univerſal and perpetual peace; but you enforce your ſelves to deſtroy one of the chief Cities of Iſrael, that hath in no ſort offended you. Joab declared, that far from any ſuch deſign, he wiſhed them all happineſs and proſperity, and ſaid, that for his own part it was not his meaning that any one of the City ſhould die, neither his pretence to raze and deface ſo famous a City; his intent only was that if Siba the Son of Bochri and the Kings adverſary were delivered into his hands, to do juſtice on him, he would raiſe the ſiege, and cauſe his Army to retire from thence. When the woman heard what Joab had ſaid, ſhe prayed him to ſtay a little while, promiſing him L very ſpeedily to caſt his head over unto him. Whereupon ſhe came down amongſt the aſſembly of the Citizens, to whom ſhe ſpake after this manner: Wretched men that you are, will you miſerably ſuffer your Wives and Children to be ſlain for a wicked mans cauſe, and a ſtranger whom ye know not? will you admit him in the place of David your King, from whoſe hands you have received ſo many benefits? think you that one only City can reſiſt ſo vaſt an Army? After this manner perſuaded ſhe them to cut off Sibas head, and to caſt it into Joabs camp: which done, Joab commanded the retreat to be ſounded, and raiſed the ſiege; and returning back unto Jeruſalem, was once more declared General of all the people. The King alſo appointed Benaja Captain of his Guards, and of ſix hundred Soldiers, Adoram was made Treaſurer to gather in the Tributes; Sabath and Achilaus had M the charge of Regiſters; Suſa was made Secretary; Sadoc and Abiathar were made the High-Prieſts. After this, it hapned that the Countrey was afflicted with a famine: For which cauſe David beſought God that he would have compaſſion on his people, and that it might pleaſe him to manifeſt not only the cauſe, but alſo the remedy of the malady. The Prophets anſwered him, that God would be revenged of the wrong done to the Gibeonites whom King Saul had deceived and traiterouſly ſlain, without reſpect of the oath, which the Governour Joſuah and the Elders made unto them. If therefore he would ſuffer the Gibeonites to revenge the death of their ſlaughtered friends according to their deſire, God had promiſed to be appeaſed, and to deliver the people from their imminent and preſent evils. Aſſoon as he underſtood by the Prophets what God required, he ſent N for the Gibeonites, and asked them what it was which they required? who wiſhed him to deliver into their hands ſeven of Sauls Sons to take their revenge on them: whereupon the King made ſearch after them, only ſparing and protecting Mephiboſeth the Son of Jonathan. When the Gibeonites had laid hold of theſe ſeven, they executed them according to their pleaſures: and thereupon God incontinently ſent down Rain, and diſpoſed the earth to bear fruit; allaying the drought, ſo that the Land of the Hebrews recovered again its former fruitfulneſs. Not long after, the King made War upon the Philiſtines, and vanquiſhed them in a great Battel; but it ſo fell out, that the King hotly purſuing the chaſe, was left alone, and diſcovered in his wearineſs by one of the Enemies called Acmon, the Son of Araph of the race of the Giants, who beſide his Sword had a Javelin, O the point whereof weighed three hundred ſicles, and a coat of Mail; this man turning back charged David very violently, with an intent to kill the King of his enemies, by reaſon that he ſaw him ſpent with travel. But about the ſame inſtant, Abiſai, Joabs Brother,

The King having intelligence that the Philiſtines were aſſembled in the City of Gazara, ſent out an Army againſt them, in which the Hittite, Sobach one of Davids chief Captains behaved himſelf very valiantly, and got great reputation: for he ſlew divers of them that vaunted themſelves to be of the Race of the Giants, and that were very proud and puffed up with preſumption of their valour, and was the chief authour of that victory which the Hebrews obtained.

After this laſt defeat, the Philiſtines once more hazarded their fortunes, againſt whom when David ſent out an Army, Nephan his kinſman ſhewed himſelf very valiant. For fighting hand to hand againſt him that was accounted the moſt valiant Champion amongſt all the Philiſtines, he ſlew him, and put the reſt to flight, very many of them dying in the Battel. in proceſs of time they re-incamped near unto a City not far from the Frontiers of the Countrey of the Hebrews: In this Army their was a man ſix Cubits high, who had on either foot ſix toes, and on either hand ſix fingers. Againſt whom Jonathan the Son of Sama (one of thoſe that were ſent by David in this Army) fought hand to hand, and ſlew him: ſo that approving himſelf to be the means of that victory, he bare away the honour of the Battel, and praiſe of his valour; for this Philiſtine boaſted likewiſe that he was deſcended of the Race of the Giants. After this Battel, they warred no more on the Iſraelites. Hereupon David, delivered from War and danger, and ever after enjoying a perfect peace, compoſed Odes and Hymnes in praiſe of God, in divers kinds of verſe: for ſome were Trimeters, other were Pentameters. He made Inſtrnments alſo, and taught the Levites to praiſe God upon them, on the Sabbath days and other Feaſts. The form of theſe Inſtruments was after this manner. The Vaial was Compoſed of ten ſtrings, and plaid upon with a bow. The Nable containeth twelve ſounds of cords and is ſtricken with the fingers. The Cymbals were large and made of Braſs, of which it ſufficeth, in this ſort, to make ſome mention, leſt the nature of thoſe Inſtrnments ſhould wholy be unknown. Now all thoſe that were about the King were valiant men; but amongſt all the reſt, there were eight moſt notable and heroick men. The noble actions of five of which I will declare, which will give ſome ſpecimen of that extraordinary and heroick courage by which they were able to conquer whole Nations. The firſt of them was Iſſem the Son of Achem, who having thruſt himſelf into the midſt of his diſordered Enemies, never gave over fighting till he had ſlain nine hundred of them. After him was Eleazar the Son of Dodeias, who had accompained the King in Sarphat: He, in a certain Battel (wherein through the multitude of the Enemies, the Iſraelites were affrighted and put to flight) kept his place, and faced the Enemy, and ruſhing in among them, made a great ſlaughter of them, ſo that thorow the great quantity of blood which he ſhed, his Sword ſtuck faſt to his hand; and the Iſraelites ſeeing the Philiſtines put to flight, by him, came down and ran upon them, and obtained a great victory over them. For Eleazar ſlaughtered thoſe that fled, and the reſt of the Army followed and ſpoiled thoſe that were ſlain. The third was the Son of Ilus called Sebas, who fighting againſt the Philiſtines, in a place called the Jaw, (and ſeeing the Hebrews to be afraid of their power, and almoſt out of heart) reſiſted them alone, as if he had been an Army, and ſlew ſome of them, and purſued and put the reſt to flight, in that they were unable to ſuſtain his force and violence. Theſe three performed, with their own hands, theſe great atchievments. About that time that the King lived in Jeruſalem, the Army of the Philiſtines came out to make War upon him; and David (as we have declared heretofore) was gon up into the higher City to ask counſel, of God, what the event of that War ſhould be; and the Enemies being encamped in that Valley (that extendeth it ſelf as far as Bethleem, a City ſome twenty Furlongs diſtant from Jeruſalem,) David ſaid to his companions: There is very good water in the place where I was borne, and eſpecially that which is in the pit, which is near unto the gate; if any one will bring me of that water to drink, I ſhall eſteem it more than if he gave me gaeat riches. Theſe three men hearing theſe words, inſtantly ran out, and paſt thorow the Enemies Camp, and went to Bethleem; where having drawn water, they returned back unto the King, forcing their way through the midſt of their Enemies, declaring that the Philiſtines being afraid of their hardineſs, and great courage, kept themſelves upon their guard, and dared not charge them; notwithſtanding their ſmall number. But the King taſted not of this water which they brought him, ſaying, that it was bought

A *with the danger of mens lives, and therefore that it was no reaſon that he ſhould drink thereof, but he powred it out as an oblation unto God, giving him thanks becauſe he had delivered his Servants. After theſe three followed Abiſai Joabs Brother, who ſlew ſix hundred of the Enemy in one day. The fifth was Banaia of the race of the Levites, who being defied by certain Brothers, famous amongſt the Moabites for their valour, overcame them. Moreover a certain Egyptian of a wonderful ſtature, having defied him (notwithſtanding the ſaid Banaia was naked and the other Armed) yet charged he him, and took away his Javelin and ſlew him. To theſe foreſaid acts of his, a man may annex this as the moſt valiant, or very nearly equalling the reſt. For it came to paſs, that after a certain Snow, a Lyon fell into a pit (whoſe mouth was ſo narrow, B that a man could not diſcern where it was, eſpecially ſince it was at the ſame time covered with Snow) where being incloſed, and ſeeing no means to eſcape, he roared out: which when Banaia who paſſed that way heard, he followed the voyce, and drew near unto the place; and afterwards went down into the pit, where with a ſtaffe he bare in his hand, he fought with, overcame and ſlew the Lyon. The thirty three other were of like valour and courage. But King David being deſirous to know how many thouſand men he could number amongſt the people, and forgetting the commandment ordained by Moſes (who had given order that if the people ſhould be numbred, there ſhould be payed unto God for every head half a ſicle) he commanded Joab to go and number all the people: and although Joab repreſented it unto him as a C thing no wayes neceſſary; yet could he not perſwade him, but that he enjoyned him with all expedition, to ſet forward on his way, and muſter the people of the Hebrews.

David ſendeth Joab to muſter the people.

Hereupon Joab took with him the principals of the Tribes and the Scribes, and went about the Countrey of the Hebrews, to know how many there were; and at the end of nine moneths and twenty days, he returned to Jeruſalem to the King, and preſented him with the liſt of the people, the Tribe of Benjamin only excepted (for he neither numbred that Tribe, nor the Tribe of Levi.) The King when it was now too late, perceiving that he had diſpleaſed God, was very ſorrowful and penſive. The number of the other Iſraelites was of 900 thouſand men, able to bear Arms, and to follow the War, beſides that the only Tribe of Juda contained 400 thouſand men. When the D Prophets had certified David how God was diſpleaſed with him, he began to pray and beſeech him, that it might pleaſe him to appeaſe his wrath, and to pardon his offence.
Hereupon God ſent the Prophet Gad unto him, who brought him the choice of three things, willing him to make choice which of the three he would endure: either that Famine for ſeven years ſpace ſhould reign in his Countreys; or that War for three moneths ſpace ſhould afflict the ſame, wherein he ſhould always have the worſt; or that the Plague and peſtilence ſhould rage for three days amongſt the Hebrews. Being thus troubled by reaſon of his difficult choice, amongſt theſe imminent miſeries; and the Prophet urging him to return a ſhort anſwer, whereby God might be ſatisfied: the King bethinking him that if he ſhould ask Famine, he ſhould rather ſeem to reſpect his own E ſecurity, than the Common-Wealth, in that no danger might by that means touch him, for that he had great ſtore of Corn in his Barn, and they were unfurniſhed; and if for three months he ſhould make choice to be overcome by the Enemy, in that caſe alſo he might ſeem to have care of himſelf in that he had many ſtrong Caſtles, and a valiant Guard of men, to attend his perſon; he therefore made choice of a Plague, that was both as incident to the Prince, as the Subjects; wherein each man is equally concerned in the danger: ſaying, That it was better to fall into the hands of God, then into the hands of his Enemies. When the Prophet had received this anſwer from him, he reported it unto God; who ſent a Plague and mortality amongſt the Hebrews, which afflicted them ſo variouſly, ſo that it was very heard to diſcern the malady; which being but one F kind, yet notwithſtanding it diſcovered it ſelf by great variety of ſymptomes. For one of them died after another, and the ſickneſs ſeizing them unawares, brought a ſudden diſſolution of the ſpirits, and ſwouning upon them; ſo that ſome of them gave up the ghoſt with grievous torments, and ſtrange dolors. Others were preſently parched up through the burning agonies they endured, and (irrecoverable by any counſel or remedy) departed in the midſt of their tortures. Others died ſtrangled, having their eyes ſuddenly darkned and blinded. Others giving order for the burial of their houſhold Servants, died before they were thorowly interred; and from the day-break (at which time the peſtilent mortality began to rage) until dinner time, there died ſeventy thouſand perſons. And now had the Angel of God ſtretched out his hand over Jeruſalem, G ready to inflict puniſhment thereon, when the King put on ſackcloth, and proſtrated himſelf on the ground, beſeeching God that it would pleaſe him to appeaſe his anger, and be content with the number of thoſe that were already conſumed with the peſtilence.

Hereupon God giving ear unto his prayer, ceaſed the Plague, and ſent the Prophet Gad unto him, commanding him that he ſhould preſently repair to the threſhing-floor of Oronna the Jebuſite, and there build an Altar, on which he ſhould offer ſacrifice unto God. Which when David underſtood, he neglected not this command, but went preſently to the appointed place. When Oronna (as he was threſhing his Corn) ſaw the King accompanied by his Sons coming towards him, he ran out to meet him, and I humbled himſelf before him. This man was by Nation a Jebuſite, and one of the greateſt friends that David had (by means whereof he plundred him not at ſuch time as the fortreſs of the Jebuſites was taken, as we have heretofore declared.) Oronna asked him for what cauſe his Lord came thus unto him, who was his Servant? David anſwered, that it was to purchaſe his threſhing-floor, to the intent that he might build an Altar in that place, and offer ſacrifice unto God. Oronna replied, that both his Floor, his Ploughs, and Oxen were the Kings to offer up for a burnt-ſacrifice, beſeeching God that he would graciouſly accept that offering. To this the King anſwered, that he commended his liberality and beneficence, and that he accepted the offer he had made him, yet that it was his pleaſure that he ſhould receive the price of the ſame, becauſe he ought not to offer ſacrifice unto K God upon other mens charges. To this Oronna anſwered, that his Majeſty might do as beſt pleaſed him. Hereupon he bought the foreſaid Floor of him for fifty ſicles. Then erected he an Altar in this place, and offered ſacrifice thereon, as well burnt-offerings as peace-offerings: and by this means the Divine Majeſty was appeaſed, and ever after ſhewed himſelf favourable. (Now this place was the very ſame, whereto Abraham in times paſt had brought his Son Iſaac to offer up for a burnt-ſacrifice unto God; and as he was about to ſacrifice him, a Wether upon the inſtant preſented it ſelf unto the Altar, which Abraham offered up in ſtead of his Son, as we have heretofore related) David ſeeing that God had heard his prayer, and favourably accepted his ſacrifice, decreed that in that place the general Altar of the people ſhould ſtand, and that on L the very ſame Floor he would build a Temple unto God: which words of his, God afterwards ratified. For ſending his Prophet unto him, he aſſured him that his Son that ſhould ſucceed him, ſhould build a Temple. After this Prophetical declaration, the King commanded to number the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, and it was found that there were one hundred and fourſcore thouſand men: of which number he appointed eighty thouſand to intend the hewing of ſtones; and ordered that the reſt of the common people ſhould bear Stones unto them: and he appointed three thouſand and five hundred, who ſhould govern them, and have the overſeeing of the works. He gathered alſo a great quantity of Iron and Braſs, to work upon, with ſtore of huge Cedar-trees, which they of Tyre and Sidon ſent him, whom he had put in truſt to furniſh him therewith; M telling his friends that he made that preparation at that time, to the intent that when his Son ſhould govern after him, he might have materials in a readineſs for the building of the Temple: and to the intent that he being as yet young and unexperimented, ſhould not be troubled with the gathering thereof, but having all things in a readineſs might finiſh the building of the Temple.

A the ſame. And as touching the Temple (which he will that thou ſhalt build when thou ſhalt obtain the Kingdom) take care to diſcharge that duty towards God: neither be thou diſmaid or afraid at the greatneſs of the work. For before I ſhall depart out of this world, I will ſet all things in a readineſs for thee. Know therefore that I have already gathered ten thouſand talents of Gold, and an hundred thouſand talents of Silver; and an incredible quantity of Braſs and Iron, of Stone and of Wood. Moreover thou ſhalt have many thouſands of Maſons and Carpenters, and if after this any thing elſe ſhall be wanting, thou ſhalt thy ſelf make proviſion thereof: thou ſhalt hereby perform that which is moſt agreeable in the ſight of God, and he ſhall be thy ſovereign and ſafe conductor. He exhorted alſo the Governours of the people to ſet to their helping hand, and yeeld their aſſiſtance to his Son in finiſhing this Work, B and in furthering the ſervice of God without ſuſpition of any inconveniency; aſſuring them that they ſhould enjoy a firm peace, and flouriſhing eſtate (ſuch bleſſings as God beſtoweth upon thoſe that ſtudy after piety and juſtice.) Moreover he charged him to place the Ark within the Temple at ſuch time as it ſhould be finiſhed, with all other ſacred utenſils, for the reception whereof the Temple ſhould long ſince have been builded, had not their fore-fathers neglected Gods command, who had enjoyned them, that at ſuch time as they ſhould poſſeſs their Enemies Land, they ſhould build him a Temple. Theſe were Davids exhortations, not only unto his Son, but alſo to the other Princes.

Now when David was very old, ſo that by reaſon of his years his body was cold and benum'd, that notwithſtanding the many coverings and clothes they laid upon him, C yet could he not be warmed: it was the advice of his Phyſitians, that one of the faireſt Virgins that was in the Countrey ſhould be choſen to lie with the King: becauſe by this means ſhe might warm his chill limbs, and comfort his decaying heat. Whereupon after ſearch made, they found out a Damſel called Abiſag, which ſurpaſſed all other in beauty, who ſlept with him and warmed him: for by reaſon of his age, he was unable to have the uſe of a woman. But of this Virgin hereafter we ſhall make furthermention.

Hedio & Ruffinus, chap 15. 1 King. 1. 1, 2, 3, 4. David groweth old and numb. Abiſag warmeth him.

The fourth Son of David was a goodly tall young man, called Adonias, the Son of Aegiſtha, who (reſembling Abſalon in complection and ambition) deſigned to make himſelf King: and amongſt his ordinary diſcourſes which he uſed to his friends, he ſaid that the ſucceſſion to the Crown belonged of right unto him. To this intent he D prepared many Chariots and Horſes, and fifty men to attend him for his Guard. His Father certified of theſe his proceedings, reprooved him not, nor croſſed his deſigns; nor demanded any account of his actions. Joab the General, and the High prieſt Abiathar, were ingaged on his ſide, and ſtood firm to his intereſt; but they that oppoſed him, were the High Prieſt Sadoc, and the Prophet Nathan, and Benaia the Captain of the Guard, with Simei, Davids friend; beſides all other the Valiant men at Arms. Whereas therefore Adonias made a banquet without the City, and in the Suburbs near unto the Fountain of the Park-Royal, he invited all his Brethren unto the ſame, except Solomon; and took with him Joab and Abiathar, with the Governours of the Tribe of Juda: but as touching Sadoc, the Prophet Nathan, Benaia, and the reſt of the contrary party, he called them not E unto the banquet. This did the Prophet Nathan tell to Bethſabe, Solomons mother, certifying her that Adonias was made King, without the knowledge of David, adviſing her both to have care of her own ſecurity, and the ſtate and Majeſty of her Son (who by reaſon of Adonias uſurpation was like to be ſupplanted) wiſhing her in perſon to certifie the King thereof: and further promiſing, that while ſhe debated theſe things with the King, he would come in the mean while and confirm that which he had ſaid. Bethſabe being thus perſwaded by Nathan, came unto the King, and humbling herſelf before him (and afterwards deſiring leave to ſpeak unto him) ſhe informed him of all thoſe things that had hapned, according as ſhe had been adviſed by the Prophet: particularly giving him an account of the banquet which Adonias had made, and what gueſts he had F invited (namely Abiathar and Joab, with the reſt of his Sons, except Solomon and his particular friends) urging this furthermore, that the people expected who it ſhould be whom David would nominate to ſucceed him: for which cauſe ſhe earneſtly beſought David that he would provide, that he who ſhould ſucceed him in the Government, ſhould neither ſeek her blood, nor the death of her Son Solomon. Whileſt Bethſabe diſcourſed after this manner, the King had notice that Nathan attended to ſpeak with him. Whereupon, David commanded that he ſhould be called in, and as ſoon as he was entered, he asked the King if that day he had appointed Adonias to govern and ſucceed in the kingdom after him? for that (ſaid he) he hath made a ſumptuous feaſt, whereunto he hath invited all thy Sons, but Solomon, thither alſo hath he called Joab; where after the great cheer and banqueting, they have proclaimed and cryed, Long live the King Adonias; Furthermore (ſaid he) G he hath neither invited me, nor the High-Prieſt Sadoc, nor the Captain of the Guard Banaia; It therefore behooveth thee to let us know, if this be done by thy approbation and allowance.)

v. 30. The kingdom is confirmed to Solomon by an oath.

v. 33, ad 40. Solomon is annointed King and placed in his Fathers Throne.

As ſoon as Nathan had made an end of his ſpeech,David comanded that Bethſabe ſhould H be called in (who had retired out of the Kings chamber, at ſuch time as the Prophet entered in.) As ſoon as Bethſabe re-entred the chamber, David ſaid unto her, I ſwear unto thee by the great God, that thy Son Solomon ſhall raign after me, according as before this time I have already ſworn unto thee, and he it is that ſhall ſit upon my throne, yea even this preſent day. Upon theſe words Bethſabe humbled herſelf, and beſought God to grant the King long life. Whereupon he called for Sadoc, the high Prieſt, and Banaia the Captain of the Guard, and appointed them to take the Prophet Nathan with them, and all the men at Arms that attended him in Court ; charging them to mount his Son Solomon upon his Royal Mule,upon which only the King was wont to ride, and to conduct him out of the City,near unto the Fountain of Gehon : in which place (after they had I anointed him with holy oyle) he willed them to proclaim Solomon King ; commanding the High Prieſt Sadoc,and the Prophet Nathan to ſee his will performed : charging thoſe that followed him throw the City,with ſound of Trumpet,and a loud voyce, to cry out, that Solomon was ſeted for ever in his fathers throne,to the intent that all the people might underſtand that by his Fathers conſent he was declared King. And calling Solomon unto him,he gave him inſtructions by which he might,with juſtice and integrity,govern the Tribe of Juda and the reſt of the Iſraelites. After this, Banaia beſought God that it would pleaſe him to be favourable unto Solomon ; and with all expedition Solomon was mounted upon the Kings Mule, and conducted out of the City near unto the fountain ; where (after he had been anointed with oyle) they brought him backagain into K the City with great joy and applauſe, wiſhing him a long and proſperous government : then reconducting him to the Kings Palace,they placed him on his Throne;and the people generally gave themſelves over to feaſting and mirth and to ſport,and rejoyce with dances and inſtruments of muſick ; ſo that by reaſon of the multitude of inſtruments, not only the air reſounded, but the earth alſo ſeemed in a manner to be moved therewith.So that Adonias and they that banqueted with him,hearing the noiſe,were all of them troubled and Joab in particular,ſaid that thoſe tunes and trumpettings did no wayes pleaſe him.

*v.*40,41,ad 50. Adonias, for fear of the Kings diſpleaſure, flyeth from his banquet, and taketh hold of the hornes of the Altar.

Whileſt thus they ſate at the banquet, and every man thorow penſiveneſſe forbore to eat (being diſtracted thorow variety of thoughts) Jonathan the Son of Abiathar came haſtily in amongſt them. This young man did Adonias moſt willingly behold, and L ſaid that he was a meſſenger of ſome glad tidings : but contrariwiſe he recited unto them all that had befallen Solomon, or had been decreed by David. Whereupon Adonias, and all his gueſts forſook the banquet, and ſuddenly fled every man unto his own houſe.
But Adonias fearing the Kings diſpleaſure (by reaſon of his ambition and arrogancy) ran unto the Altar, and laying hold of it after the manner of a ſuppliant,hung thereon, according as he in reaſon had cauſe to do.

Now when theſe tydings were brought unto Solomon,and what he had done, and how he required that Solomon would aſſure him,that he would never more call to memory that which had hapned, but pardon his offence : Solomon anſwered him graciouſly and moderately, and pardoned that fault ; notwithſtanding with this caution,that if hereafter M it ſhould appear that he intended or acted any rebellion, it ſhould be Adonias himſelf, who ſhould be the author of his miſchief : with this anſwer he ſent ſome to deliver him from the Altar.

When as therefore he came into Solomons preſence, and had ſaluted him,he was commanded to repair home unto his houſe, without fearing any miſchief that might befall him : yet by the way was he admoniſhed to behave himſelf uprightly for the time to come, if he reſpected his credit or profit.

But David willing that his Son ſhould be accepted for their known and anointed King the Prieſts from the reſt of their Tribe, he found four and twenty families of

He appointed alſo, that all (as well Levites as Prieſts) ſhould ſerve God day and night, according as they were commanded by Moſes. That done, he diſtributed his whole Army into twelve companies, with their Governors, Centurions, and other field Officers: every ſquadron contained four and twenty thouſand men, whom he appointed to guard and attend King Solomon, for the ſpace of thirty dayes (continuing from the firſt to the laſt, with their Captains over Thouſands, and Centurions.) He likewiſe eſtabliſhed thoſe men in Office and Authority over every ſquadron, whom he knew to be moſt reſolute and couragious. He appointed alſo Surveyors, who ſhould I have the charge of the treaſure, of the burroughs and fields, and of the Cattel (whoſe names in mine opinion it were unneceſſary to declare.) After that every one of theſe things were in this manner diſpoſed, he ſummoned all the civill Magiſtrates of the Hebrews (and in general all thoſe that had any commiſſion over the affairs or demains of the Kings) to a genaral aſſembly, and placing himſelf on a high Throne, he ſpake after this manner: My bretheren and countreymen, I am deſtrous that you ſhould know, that having determined with my ſelf to build a Temple unto God, I have made proviſion of a great quantity of Gold and Silver, the ſumme whereof amounteth to an hundred thouſand talents: but God, by the Prophet Nathan, hath forbidden me to build the ſame, by reaſon of your Wars, and becauſe my hands have been ſtained with the ſlaughter of the Enemies, which I have conquered K in ſo many Wars in which I have been ingaged for the publick good and the intereſt of the State; but he hath commanded that my Son (who ſhall ſucceed me in my Kingdom) ſhall erect a Temple unto him. Now therefore, ſince you are ſatisfied that amongſt the twelve ſons of Jacob, Juda, by the general conſent of them all, obtained the principality; and that I amongſt my ſix brethren have been preferred and placed by God in the Kingdom, and notwithſtanding no one of them ſuppoſeth himſelf to be injured: ſo do I alſo requeſt that Solomon having obtained the Empire, my other ſons ſhould neither in reſpect of him nor amongſt themſelves nouriſh any unnatural hatreds and ſeditious, but knowing that he is choſen by God, they may willingly ſubmit themſelves to his dominion. For whereas if God ſhall think meet you ought patiently to ſubmit your ſelves to the yoak of a foreign Prince, how much greater reaſon have L you to rejoyce that God hath confered this honour on one of your Bretheren, whereof you alſo by your Proximity of blood may ſeem in ſome meaſure to partake. I deſire nothing more than that Gods promiſes may be accompliſhed, and that the felicity which attendeth this Nation (under the Government of Solomon) may be durable. Which without doubt will ſo fall out, and all things ſhall happily ſucceed, if thou my Son be a maintainer of piety and juſtice, and the antient Laws and ordinances of thy progenitors: otherwiſe, if theſe be neglected, there is no other thing to be expected, but miſery and diſtruction. After he had finiſhed theſe ſayings, he gave his Son the model of the building of the Temple, with all the foundations both of the houſes and chambers, together with the number, height and breadth of the ſame. He alſo limitted the weight of thoſe veſſels that were to be faſhioned either of Gold or of Silver, M exhorting him to imploy all his care and diligence in performing the ſame. He incouraged likewiſe the governors and the Tribe of Levi to aſſiſt him, both becauſe his years were not yet come to maturity, as alſo becauſe by Gods divine providence he was elected King, and appointed to build the Temple, aſſuring them that the building would be very eaſie, and no wayes laborious; conſidering that he had prepared a great number of talents of Gold, and far more of Silver, and Wood, beſides a great multitude of Carpenters, and hewers of Sone, a great quantity likewiſe of Emeraulds, and other ſort of precious Stones. Laſtly, he told them, that now alſo for the preſent he would beſtow on them, to that uſe, other three thouſand talents of pure Gold, out of his own treaſury to adorn the holy place, and the chariot of God, and the Cherubins, that ſhould ſtand upon the Ark, and cover it with their wings.

1 Chron. 29. 5, ad 9. The Princes of the people gave a huge ſumme of Gold, Silver, Braſs, and precious Stone towards the building of the Temple.

N This ſpeech of the Kings was received with great joy by all the Governours, Prieſts aud Levits who ſhewed a greater readineſs, and voluntarily proffered to contribute towards the carrying on of this holy work five thouſand talents of Gold, and ten thouſand ſtateres, of Silver an hundred thouſand, and of Iron many thouſand talents; and if any one of them had a precious Stone, he brought it and delivered it into the Treaſurers cuſtody, who was called Jalus, being one of Moſes poſterity. This thing pleaſed all the people, and David (ſeeing the affection and readineſs of the Governours and Prieſts, and in general of all the reſt) began to bleſs God with a loud voyce, calling him the Creator and Father of this whole World, the faſhioner both of divine and humane things, and the Preſident and Governour of the Hebrews whoſe Kingdom he had com- O mitted into his hands. After this, he prayed for all the people, that God would be pleaſed to continue his favors unto them and to inrich the heart of his Son Solomon with all Princly virtues. He commanded the people likewiſe to ſing praiſes unto God; which they

The next day as a ſacrifice to God they offered up a thouſand Calves, a thouſand Rams, and a thouſand Lambs, for a burnt-offering: and for peace-offerings they ſlew many thouſand other Beaſts. The King celebrated a feaſt all that day with the whole people, and Solomon was anointed with Oyl the ſecond time, and proclaimed King. Sadoc alſo was eſtabliſhed High Prieſt of all the people, and Solomon was conducted into the Kings houſe, and placed in his Fathers Throne, and from that day forward they obeyed him.

For which cauſe, whileſt I yet live and draw onward to my death, I earneſtly exhort thee (as heretofore I have counſelled thee) that thou behave thy ſelf juſtly towards thy Subjects, and piouſly towards God, that hath honoured thee with this kingdom; charging thee to keep his precepts and laws, which he hath given us by* Moſes, and to take heed, leſt either ſurprized by flattery, or miſ-led by favour, or ſeduced by covetouſneſs, or any other ſiniſter affection, thou be drawn to neglect C and forſake the ſame: for thou canſt by no means continue in Gods favour, except thou keep his laws, for otherwiſe he will withdraw his providence from thee. But if according to the obligation which lieth on you, you ſhall follow my counſel, and diligently perform your duty, thou ſhalt eſtabliſh the Kingdom in our family; and no other houſe at any time but our own, ſhall obtain the dominion over the Hebrews. Remember likewiſe the iniquity of Joab, who, through emulation, ſlew two good and juſt Generals, Abner the Son of Ner, and Amaſa the Son of Jethram; *puniſh him as thou thinkeſt meet, for hitherto he hath eſcaped puniſhment, becauſe he was ſtronger and more powerful than my ſelf. After he had thus exhorted his Son, and had communicated with him all his affairs, both touching his friends, and thoſe whom he thought worthy of puniſhment, he gave up the ghoſt (after he had lived ſeventy years, and Reigned in Hebron a City of Juda for the ſpace of ſeven years and an half, and thirty three in Jeruſalem over the whole Nation.) E He was a juſt man, adorned with all vertue, requiſite in a King that ſhould govern ſo many Nations. For he was valiant beyond compariſon, and in thoſe battels which he fought for his Subjects, he was the firſt that thruſt himſelf into danger, and exhorted his Souldiers to behave themſelves valiantly, not commanding them like their Governour, but fighting with them as their fellow-ſoldier. He was very well qualified by his knowledg and experience to make the beſt uſe of the preſent, and to manage his future occaſions: he was moderate and juſt, courteous and favourable to thoſe that were afflicted; which are thoſe ornaments which are worthy of a great Prince, and in this great authority wherein he was placed, he ſtept not any ways awry, but in the caſe of Uria's Wife. He left as much or rather more riches behind him, than any other King of the Hebrews, or other Nations had F done. His Son Solomon buried him moſt Royally in Jeruſalem, with all thoſe ceremonies which were accuſtomed in Royal obſequies, and amongſt other things, he buried a great quantity of riches with him; the incredible eſtimate whereof may be conjectured by that which followeth. For one thouſand three hundred years after, the High Prieſt Hircanus being beſieged by Antiochus ſurnamed the Religious (who was Demetrius's Son) and willing to gratifie him with ſome ſumme of money (to the intent he might raiſe the ſiege, and remove his Army) and unable to levy money by any other means, he opened the Sepulchre of David, from whence he took three thouſand talents, which he delivered to Antiochus, and by this means delivered the City from the ſiege (as we have declared in another place.) And again a long time after, this Herod alſo opened it, and took from G thence a great ſumme. Neverthelеſs no man violated that part of the monument where the body of the King was laid, for it was ſo artificially hidden under ground, that it would be very difficult to diſcover it.

CHAP. I.

1 Kings 2. Solomon King of Iſrael after Davids death.

WE have declared in the former Book what David was, how great his virtue hath been, what profits and benefits thoſe of his Nation received by him, what Wars he undertook, what Victories he obtained, and how happily at laſt (through extremity of age) he departed D out of this life. But after that Solomon his ſon (being at that time very young) had obtained the Kingdom, and was placed in his fathers Throne (according as David had determined, and the divine power had decreed) the whole people (according to the common courſe in the election of new Princes) with many acclamations wiſhed him a long and proſperous Reign. But Adonias, who during his fathers life-time, thought to poſſeſs and ſeize himſelf of the Royal eſtate, came unto the Kings mother, and with all humility and reverence ſaluted her. To whom Bethſabe ſaid, That if there were any thing wherein ſhe might ſerve him, he ſhould let her know it, and that ſhe would willingly apply her ſelf unto it. Whereupon he began to ſay, That it was a thing very well known, that the Kingdom appertained unto him, both in regard of his age, as alſo in reſpect of E the favor and good liking of the people: but ſince that it had been tranſferred unto Solomon, her ſon, by the Will of God, he was content therewith, and would be his ſervant, being very glad of the fortunate ſucceſs of his Affairs. He therefore beſought her, that ſhe would ſollicite Solomon in his behalf, and perſuade him to give him Abiſag to Wife, who had ſlept with David, for that he had not any carnal company with her by reaſon of his age, and that as yet ſhe was fully poſſeſſed of her virginity.

Ver. 17 ad 24. Adonias requireth Abiſag to wife.

Bethſabe promiſed him to further his ſuit to the uttermoſt of her power, and willingly to employ herſelf toward the accompliſhment of the Marriage, ſince ſhe knew the King was willing to gratifie her in whatſoever ſhe ſhould deſire, as alſo for that ſhe would inſtantly intreat him: ſo that he departed from her with aſſured hope of good ſucceſs in F his deſigned Marriage. Hereupon Bethſabe preſently addreſſed herſelf to the King, intending to certifie him both what Adonias had requeſted, and what ſhe had granted. When Solomon heard that his Mother came to viſit him, he went out to meet her, and embraced her, and afterwards conducting her into his Preſence-chamber, he ſate him down, and commanded his ſervants to place a ſeat on his right hand, for his Mother; who being ſeated by him, ſpake unto him after this manner: My ſon, vouchſafe me one favor that I ſhall requeſt at thy hands, and ſend me not hence diſcontented, and diſſatisfied, through thy refuſal. Solomon anſwered her, That ſhe ſhould command him, by reaſon that duty tyed him to the ſatisfaction and favor of his Mothers ſuits; reproving her for that inſinuation ſhe had uſed, by reaſon that thereby ſhe evidently expreſſed that ſhe was not G thorowly aſſured to obtain her demand, but that ſhe feared a refuſal and repulſe: ſhe therefore required him to give the Damſel Abiſag for Wife to Adonias his Brother. The King diſpleaſed at this her ſuit, diſmiſſed his Mother, alledging that Adonias had ill deſigns, ſigns, and that he wondered that in requiring Abiſag to Wife, he had not requeſted Solomon H likewiſe to give him place in the Kingdom: for Adonias was elder than he, and had more mighty friends than he had; namely, the General Joab, and the High Prieſt Abiathar. For which cauſe he forthwith ſent Benaia, Captain of his Guard, to kill Adonias his Brother. Then calling unto him the High Prieſt Abiathar, The pains (ſaid he) that thou haſt endured by accompanying my father David, and attending and bearing the Ark with him, make thee eſcape from death; yet notwithſtanding, for that thou haſt been aſſiſtant to Adonias, and followed his faction, I baniſh thee from my preſence, charging thee not to ſee my face any more, but to retire thy ſelf to thine own houſe, and there to live in thy Countrey, until thou haſt ended thy dayes: ſince you have made your ſelf unworthy of that charge wherewith you are entruſted. For this cauſe was the Houſe of Ithamar deprived of the Prieſtly I dignity (according as God had foretold Eli, one of the Anceſtors of Abiathar) and tranſlated to the Race of Phinees, and eſtabliſhed in Sadoc. Thoſe of the Race of Phinees, who led a private life all that time that the Prieſthood remained in the family of Ithamar (whereof Eli was the firſt) were theſe: Boccias, the ſon of Joſeph; Joathan, the ſon of Boccias; Mareoth, the ſon of Joatham; Aropha, the ſon of Maræoth; Achitob, the ſon of Aropha; Sadoc, the ſon of Achitob, who was the firſt High Prieſt under King David.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 2. 1 Kings 3. 1, ad 4. Solomon marrieth the King of Egypts daughter, and eſtabliſheth the kingdom.

Joab having heard of the death of Adonias, was very much ſurprized; for he loved him more than King Solomon: and by reaſon of that friendſhip which he bare unto him, he, upon good grounds, apprehended his own danger, and in this reſpect he fled unto the K Altar, hoping in that place to be ſecured, in regard of that reverence which the King bare unto God. But when Joabs reſolution was made known unto the King, he ſent Benaia unto him, with Commiſſion to bring him from the Altar, and to conduct him to the Judgment-ſeat, that he might in that place juſtifie his actions: but Joab ſaid, That he would never abandon the Temple, but that he had rather dye in that place than in another. When Benaia had certified the King of this his anſwer, he commanded him to cut off his Head in the ſame place, as he required, and that in that ſort he ſhould be puniſhed, by reaſon of the two murthers which he had curſedly committed upon the perſons of Abner and Amaſa: commanding that his body ſhould be buried in the ſame place, to the end that his ſins ſhould never depart from his Race, and that both David and Solomon might be held guiltleſs L of the death of thoſe Men that had been murther'd by Joab. This command of his Benaia executed, and was afterward made General of the Men of War. Moreover, the King eſtabliſhed Sadoc ſolely in the place of Abiathar whom he had depoſed. He commanded Simei alſo to build him an Houſe in Jeruſalem, to keep himſelf therein, without paſſing the brook of Cedron: for if he ſhould break that commandment, the penalty which he ſhould incur, ſhould be no leſs than death; and to the more ſerious performance of this his injunction, he tyed him by a ſolemn oath. Simei thanked Solomon for the charge he had impoſed on him, and ſwore that he would fulfill the ſame: ſo that forſaking his own Countrey, he came and dwelt in Jeruſalem, where after he had ſojourned for the ſpace of three years, it hapned that he had news that two of his ſlaves had fled, and M betaken themſelves into Gath: whereupon he went to find them out, and no ſooner returned he back again with them, but that the King had intelligence that he had neglected his commandment; and which is more, that he had broken that oath which he made unto God: which incenſed him very much. Wherefore calling unto him, he ſpake after this manner: Haſt thou not ſworn (ſaid he) that thou wilt not go out of this City to another?
And doſt thou think it a ſmall matter, to add Perjury to that other vilany which thou haſt been guilty of in ſo ſcandalouſly reproaching my father of bleſſed memory, when the rebellion of Abſalom compell'd him to forſake the capital City of his Realm? Prepare thy ſelf therefore to ſuffer the puniſhment which thou deſerveſt, which ſhall be ſuch as ſhall ſuffice to convince the World, that though the puniſhments of the wicked are oftentimes late, yet they are abundantly N recompenced by their ſureneſs and ſeverity. Whereupon Benaia ſlew Simei, according as he was commanded. From that day forward, Solomon had his Royal eſtate ſecured; and after that his enemies had received condign puniſhment, he took to wife the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt, and afterwards builded the walls of Jeruſalem, far larger and ſtronger than they were before: and all the reſt of his life, he governed his Commonweal in peace; ſo that his youthful years hindered him not from the obſervation of juſtice, and the maintenance of laws, neither excluded the remembrance of that which his father had charged him at the hour of his death: but behaving himſelf in all things exactly, he executed the affairs of his kingdom with that circumſpection, that ſuch as excelled him in years, could not ſurpaſs him. O

CHAP. II.

Of the wiſdom, prudence and riches of Solomon, and how firſt of all he builded the Temple in Jeruſalem.

The year of the World, 2931. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1033.

AS ſoon as he came to Hebron, he determined to pay his vows unto God, on that brazen Altar which was erected by Moſes, and ſacrificed thereon in burnt-offerings a thouſand head of Cattel; which honourable devotion of his was moſt acceptable unto God. For the very ſame night he had appeared unto him in a dream, and commanded him to ask whatſoever bleſſing he thought fit, as a recompence of this his piety. But Solomon required a moſt excellent thing, which God doth liberally beſtow, and Men very B happily receive. For he demanded neither gold nor ſilver, nor any other kind of riches, (ſuch as a youthful Man would require) for theſe are only affected by the common ſort, when the other are only worthy of the divine magnificence: But give me (ſaid he) O Lord, a ripe judgment, and a good underſtanding, to the intent that by theſe means I may adminiſter juſtice to this people with truth and equity. With this demand of his, God was well pleaſed, and promiſed him to give him all other things whereof he had made no mention, namely, riches and glory; and above all theſe, ſuch an underſtanding and wiſdom, as no King or private Man hath had before him. Moreover, that he would continue the Kingdom in his family for many ages, if he continued in the wayes of juſtice, and obeyed God in all things, and walked in his fathers wayes, and imitated his virtues.

Ver. 5, ad 8. God appeareth to Solomon by night in a dream, and willeth him to ask that which moſt of all he deſired.

Ver. 9, ad 15. Solomon requireth wiſdom at Gods hands, who with it giveth him riches and honours alſo.

C After that Solomon had received theſe bleſſings from God, and was made happy by theſe promiſes, he forſook his bed, and worſhipping God, returned unto Jeruſalem, where he offered great Sacrifices before the Tabernacle, and magnificently feaſted all thoſe of his Houſhold. About the ſame time a very difficult caſe was brought him to decide, the reſolution whereof was very hard to be diſcovered. And I have thought it neceſſary to declare the occaſions whereon at that preſent the debate was grounded, to the end that the Readers may underſtand the difficulty of the thing in queſtion, and that if they happen at any time to be concerned in ſuch affairs, they might by his example learn to diſcover the truth. Two Women of looſe life and converſation came unto him, one of the which (who ſeemed to have ſuffered the injury) began after this manner:

D I, O King, (ſaid ſhe) and this Woman, dwell together in one Chamber; but ſo it fortuned, that both of us on one day, and at the ſame hour, bare each of us a ſon: ſome three dayes after we were delivered, this Woman lying by her Infant, had in ſleep overlaid it, and ſtifled it, and hath taken my Child from between my knees, and laid it by her, and put the dead Child, whileſt I ſlept, into my boſome. Now on the morrow, when I thought to give mine Infant ſuck, I found not mine own, but perceived that her Child lay dead by me: for I knew it, becauſe I had exactly marked it. This my Child I have demanded at her hands; and becauſe I could not recover it, I have made my Addreſs unto your Majeſty: for in that we were alone, and ſhe is obſtinate, and feareth not to be convicted by any, ſhe perſiſteth in her denial of the ſame.

After the King had heard her requeſt, he enquired of the other if ſhe had any thing E to anſwer to this accuſation. But ſhe denying the act, and averring that the Child which remained alive was hers, and that the dead one appertained to the other; and beſides that, ſince no Man appeared that might determine the controverſie, but all that ſtood by were amazed at the obſcurity and difficulty of the debate; the King at laſt found out this expedient of diſcovering the truth: He commanded that both the Children ſhould be brought before him, as well the living as the dead; and calling one of his Guard unto him, he commanded him with his naked Sword, to cut both the Children into two parts, to the intent that both of them might take the half of the living, and the other half of the dead Child. This ſentence of his at firſt ſeemed ſo ridiculous, that it was exploded by all that ſtood by. In the mean time the true Mother began to cry out, and deſire that F the matter might not paſs ſo far, but rather that they ſhould give the whole Child that was alive, unto the other: for that it ſufficed her, ſo ſhe might ſee him alive, though he might be ſuppoſed to be anothers. The other willingly conſented to the diviſion of the Infant; and moreover, required that the true Mother ſhould be puniſhed. But the King conjecturing by the diſcourſe both of the one, and of the other, which was the true Parent, adjudged the Infant unto her that oppoſed his death, (for that in equity ſhe was the true Mother) and condemned the wickedneſs of the other, who had murthered her own Child, and laboured as much as in her lay, to procure the death of her companions innocent Infant. All the people took this judgment for an aſſured proof and ſign of the Kings prudence and wiſdom, and from that time forwards, they reſpected and honoured him, as G one that was endowed with a divine ſpirit. The Chieftains and Governors under him thorow all the Kingdom, were theſe: Uri governed the Countrey of Ephraim, wherein was compriſed the rule of Bethlehem; Aminadab commanded over the quarter of Dura, and the Sea-coaſt, and had eſpouſed the daughter of Solomon. The great Plain was ſubjected H to Benaia the ſon of Achila, who governed likewiſe all the Countrey that extended towards Jordan. Gaber commanded the Galaadites and Gaulonites, as far as the Mountain Libanus, and had under him ſixty great Cities and Forts. Achinadab governed all Galilee as far as Sadon, and had eſpouſed alſo one of Solomons daughters called Baſima: Banacat preſided over the Maritime Countrey near to the City of Arce: Saphat commanded the Mountains Itabyr and Carmel, and the Land of Galilee as far as Jordan: Sonbeia governed the whole Land of the Benjamites: Tabar had all the government on the other ſide of Jordan, and was elected Governor-general over them all. Thus about this time did the Hebrews wonderfully increaſe in riches, and particularly the Tribe of Juda, by reaſon that the people addicted themſelves wholly to the tilling and manuring of their I Lands. For they were aſſured of their peace, and not diſtracted by any warlike tumults, and beſides that fruitfully enjoying a moſt deſired liberty, they eſpecially intended this thing onely, to increaſe their private eſtates. The King alſo had other Governors who ruled the Syrians, and commanded other ſtrange Nations, which are extended from Euphrates as far as Egypt, who gathered the Tribute of thoſe Nations for the King. Theſe Barbarians every day furniſhed the King for his own Table, and the maintenance of his Houſhold, with thirty meaſures of fine flour, and ſixty of the courſer: ten fat Oxen, and twenty graſs Beeves, with an hundred fat Lambs. All which things, beſides Veniſon and Buffalles taken in chaſe, Birds and Fiſh were furniſhed daily by the Barbarians to ſerve the Kings Houſhold. He had likewiſe a great number of Chariots, ſo that he had forty K thouſand Mangers wherein his Horſes fed; and beſides theſe, he had twelve thouſand Horſemen, half whereof kept alwayes about the King in Jeruſalem, the reſt were billetted in divers Villages belonging to the King, and remained there. And they that had the charge to furniſh the Kings expences, provided likewiſe neceſſary provender for the Horſes, conveying it to what place ſoever the King took his progreſs. But ſo great was the wiſdom and prudence which God had beſtowed upon Solomon, that he ſurpaſſed all his Progenitors, and the Egyptians likewiſe, who are eſteemed the wiſeſt of all Men, were far behind him. For he excelled all thoſe that in that time were in the greateſt account amongſt the Hebrews, whoſe names I will not omit; theſe were Ethan, Eman, Chal, and Dodan, all four the ſons of Machol. He compoſed alſo 5000 Books of Odes and Songs, L and 3000 Books of Parables and Similitudes; beginning from the Hyſſop, unto the Cedar. The like did he of all living creatures that feed on the earth, ſwim in the waters, or flie in the air; for none of their natures was he ignorant of: neither had he omitted to ſearch after their qualities in particular, and diſcourſed of them all, and had knowledge of their ſeveral and ſecret properties. He obtained alſo the knowledge of the Art of Magick, for the profit and health of Men, and the exorciſing and caſting out of Devils; for he deviſed certain incantations, whereby the diſeaſed are cured, and left the method of conjuration in writing, whereby the Devils are enchanted and expelled; ſo that never more they dare return: And this kind of healing to this day, is very uſual amongſt thoſe of our Nation. For I ſaw a certain private man amongſt the Hebrews, by M name Eleazar, in the preſence of Veſpaſian, his Sons, Tribunes, and other Soldiers, that cured divers that were poſſeſſed. And the manner of his Cure was this: He applied to the Noſe of the Demoniack a Ring, under the Seal whereof was a root of thoſe things that Solomon had declared, which drew the Devil out of the Noſtrils of the Sick, as ſoon as he ſmelled the root: and as ſoon as the Man was fallen, he adjured him never more to return, intermixing ſome mention of Solomon, and rehearſing thoſe Incantations that were invented by him.

1 Kings 5. 1, ad 12. Hiram's Ambaſſadors to Solomon.

After this, the ſaid Eleazar being deſirous to ſhew unto them that were preſent, the efficacy of his Art, he ſet a Pot or Pitcher of water not far from the place where the poſſeſſed ſtood, and commanded the Devil, at ſuch time as he forſook the Man, to overturn N the Pot, and thereby to give a ſign unto thoſe that ſtood by, that he had forſaken the poſſeſſed: which act of his, manifeſtly declareth how great the ſcience and wiſdom of Solomon was. For which cauſe I thought good in this place to make mention thereof, that the worthy endowments of this King might be known unto all Men; and how beloved of God he was, and how ſurpaſſing in all kinds of virtue. When Hiram King of Tyre underſtood that Solomon ſucceeded his father in the Kingdom, he was glad thereof, (for he was Davids friend) for which cauſe he ſent Meſſengers unto him to ſalute him, and to congratulate his ſucceſſion to the Crown; by whom Solomon returned an anſwer in theſe terms:

Solomon to Hiram the King: Know thou that my father having a great deſire to build a O Temple unto God, hath been hindred from performing it, by the continual Wars and Troubles he hath had: for he never took reſt, before he either had defeated his enemies, or made them tributaries

A butaries unto him. For mine own part, I thank God for the peace which I poſſeſs, and that by the means thereof, I have opportunity (according to mine own deſire) to build a Temple unto God: for he it is that foretold my father, that his houſe ſhould be builded during my reign.
For which cauſe I pray you ſend ſome one of your skilfulleſt men with my ſervants to the mountain Libanus, to hew down trees in that place: for the Sidonians are more skilful in hewing and preparing timber, than our people are, and I will pay the Workmen according to your direction. When Hiram had read this Letter, he was very glad to peruſe the Contents of the ſame, and wrote back again unto him to this effect:

Ver. 6. Solomon requireth Carpenters and workmen from Hiram.

The King Hiram unto King Solomon: Thou haſt cauſe to thank God, that he had delivered thy fathers Kingdom (who was a wiſe and virtuous Prince) into thy hands. For which cauſe, B ſince no news can come unto me more acceptable, I will accompliſh all that thou requeſteſt: for after I have cauſed a great quantity of Cedar and Cyprus wood to be cut down, I will ſend it thee by Sea by my ſervants, whom I will command, (and furniſh with convenient veſſels of burthen) to the end they may deliver the ſame, in what place of thy Kingdom it ſhall beſt pleaſe thee, that afterwards thy Subjects may tranſport them to Jeruſalem. And I deſire that by way of exchange, you would furniſh us with Corn, whereof we ſtand in need, becauſe we inhabit an Iſland.

Ver. 7. ad 10. Hiram promiſeth Solomon wood, and inſtead thereof requireth corn.

The Copies are yet at this day kept, not only by thoſe of our Nation, but alſo by the Tyrians: ſo that if any man deſire exactly to know what they be, let him ſearch the publick Records of the Tyrians, and he ſhall find in them matters agreeing to that we have C ſaid. All which I ſay, to the end the Readers might be aſſured, that I go not beyond the truth in any ſort, and that I inſert not in this Hiſtory matters that are meerly apparent and deceitful, and only faſhioned for delight; neither fear I that any man ſhall examine my Writings, nor deſire I likewiſe that every Man give credit at the firſt ſight to the ſame, or that I be held blameleſs in ſuffering my ſelf any wayes to vary, or improperly dilate ought in this Hiſtory: but contrariwiſe, if I cannot approve the truth by ſufficient te-ſtimonies, I deſire not to be allowed. As ſoon as Solomon had received theſe Letters from the King of the Tyrians, he praiſed his facility and benevolence, and preſently ſent him that which he demanded: every year therefore he ſent him two thouſand meaſures of Wheat, and two thouſand Baths of Oyl, and two thouſand Baths of Wine (each D Bath containing about 72 Quarts.) From that time forward, the friendſhip betwixt Hiram and Solomon increaſed more and more, ſo that both of them proteſted that it ſhould continue for ever. The King ordered that thirty thouſand Workmen ſhould be provided, whom he gave in charge to work continually, alotting to each man his part.
He ordained that ten thouſand of them ſhould cut wood in Libanus for the ſpace of one Month; and that then they ſhould reſt two Months, returning every man unto his own dwelling place, until ſuch time as the twenty thouſand had in their turn accompliſhed the task in the time that was prefixed unto them, and then the firſt ten thouſand renewed their work, and followed the ſame in the fourth month. Adoram was conſtitu-ted Superintendent over them. Beſides theſe, there were Seventy thouſand Men ap-E pointed to carry ſtones and wood, who were ſtrangers in that Countrey, according to the commandment of David. There were fourſcore thouſand Hewers of ſtone, over which were 3200 Commiſſaries; theſe had the King commanded to cut the greateſt ſtones, to make the foundation of the Temple: which after they had hewed and prepared in the Mountain, he commanded ſhould be drawn and brought into the City, which was obſerved not only by his Countreymen, but by thoſe Workmen alſo that were ſent him by Hiram.

Solomon began this Building in the fourth year of his Reign, in the ſecond Month, April) Five hundred ninety and two years after the departure of the Iſraelites out of thouſand four hundred and forty years after the Deluge: And ſince Adam the firſt Man ned in the eleventh year of the Reign of Hiram, who governed in Tyre: and ſince the firſt time that Tyre began to be inhabited, until the ſaid building of the Temple, there paſſed Two hundred and forty years. The King therefore laid the foundation of the Temple, and made a deep Trench, and fortified it with moſt ſtrong ſtones, which might be able to reſiſt all the injuries of time. Theſe ſtones were cloſely joined the one unto the other, that by the ſtrength of the foundation, they might make the baſe and ground G to ſuſtain that which ſhould be builded thereupon, which foundation was as much to be admired, as that Fabrick which it was deſigned to ſupport: neither could the foundations be of leſs ſtrength and hugeneſs, which were to ſuſtain a ſumptuous pile of that height, greatneſs, magnificence and ornament. The walls were made of white ſtone, M and continued of the ſame matter even until the roof. The height of the Temple was ſixty cubits, and the length as much, and the breadth twenty. Over that was another edifice, having the like dimenſions, ſo that the whole height of the Temple was ſixſcore cubits, and the entry thereof was Eaſtward. The porch thereof had twenty cubits in length, (which was the breadth of the Temple) and in breadth ten cubits: and the height thereof was ſixſcore cubits. About the Temple was built thirty Cells, which invironed the ſame on the outſide, and ſerved to ſuſtain all the Edifice; for that they were of that number, and they paſſed out of the one into the other. The entries were made after the ſame manner, from whence a man might eaſily paſs from the one to the other. Every one of theſe Cells had 25 Cubits in breadth, and as many in length, and 20 in height: and above them there were others built: and others likewiſe above theſe N of like number and dimenſion: ſo that they were almoſt as high as the other buildings; they were all covered with Cedar: every Cell had his cover apart, and had no dependence on the other roofs. The reſt of the building of the Temple was covered with long beams, mortized the one within the other, which ſuſtained the whole: ſo that the walls being in this manner faſtned the one unto the other, were the ſtronger. To theſe beams was faſtned wainſcot of the ſame ſtuff, which was curiouſly poliſhed, carved and gilded. The walls on the inſide were covered with Cedar plants, intermixed with gold: ſo that all the Temple ſhined, and the burniſht gold dazled their eyes that entred into it. All the whole building of the Temple was moſt artificially made of ſtones moſt exactly carved, and moſt cloſely and cunningly joined together: ſo that they that O curiouſly pryed into the ſame, could not any wayes obſerve the ſtroke of any Hammer, nor other Workmans tool, but all the whole maſs ſeemed to be a natural and no artificial

H cial frame; and rather growing in that place of it ſelf, than garniſhed by the hands of cunning workmen. Touching the aſcent into the higheſt part of the Temple, the King ſo contrived it, that in the thickneſs of the wall he included a pair of winding ſtairs to that purpoſe. This part had not a great gate towards the Eaſt as the lower had, but in the ſides there were little doors made: All the whole Temple both within and without was covered with Cedar-planks faſtned together with ſtrong chains to ſtrengthen the ſame. The Temple within was divided into two parts, the one whereof contained the Sanctum ſanctorum, of twenty Cubits, (which was unacceſſible) the reſt of the ſpace of forty Cubits was conſecrated to the uſe of the Prieſts. And in the midſt of the wall made he two gates of Cedar, inriched with ſtore of Gold, and divers curious carved I works, and hung them with Tapiſtrie: wherein were imbroidred divers flowers of Hyacinth, Purple, and Scarlet intermingled with pure white and delicate Linen. He placed alſo upon the Holy of Holies (which was twenty Cubits broad, and as many long) two Cherubins of maſſie Gold, each one five Cubits high, and each of them had two wings that were ſpread five Cubits broad, by which means they were not far diſtant the one from the other, but that the one of their wings touched the Southern wall of the ſacred place, and the other the Northern wall: the other wings that touched one another ſerved for a cover for the Ark, which was placed between them both. But what the figure of the Cherubins was it is impoſſible to expreſs: he made the pavement of the Temple alſo, of plates of beaten Gold. To the gate of the Temple he alſo faſtned con-K venient doors twenty cubits high, anſwerable in height to the wall, and covered with plates of Gold. In a word, he left not one place either within or without the Temple, that was not garniſhed with Gold: he likewiſe adorned the out ſide of the gates as he had done the inſide. But the gate of the Porch had no ſuch ornament. After this Solomon ſent unto Hiram King of Tyre, for one who was a cunning workman, called Uram, the Son of a woman of the line of Nephtali, and of Urias the Iſraelite; this man had great knowledge in all kind of works, but his eſpecial excellency was in working gold, Silver and Braſs, who made all that which covered the temple according as the King commanded. He made two pillars of braſs, four fingers thick and eighteen Cubits high, and twelve in the circumference; on the chapters of each of them, he placed Corniches in the form of Lillies, of five Cubits in height, L which he invironed with certain Grates made of Braſs after the manner of enterlaced nets, which covered the lillies on each ſide, on which there hung down two hundred pomegra-nats in two ranks These Pillars placed he in the entrance of the porch, the one on the right hand called Jachin, the other on the left called Boz. He founded alſo the Brazen Sea, made after the manner of a Hemeſphere, and this veſſel was called the Sea by reaſon of the hugeneſs thereof. For it was a laver that by meaſured line was ten Cubits broad, the thickneſs of a hands breadth, the midſt thereof was ſuſtained with a pillar ten times twiſted, whoſe bigneſs was a cubit. This laver was ſuſtained by 12 heifers, which by three and three were placed directly oppoſite againſt the quarters of the four winds: and the hindermoſt part of theſe Heifers were ſet ſomewhat ſtooping, to the end that this M round and ample veſſel might be the more ſurely ſupported by them. This Sea contained two thouſand Baths, which is a meaſure made uſe of for liquids. He made alſo ten brazen baſes four ſquare, for the lavers, each one in length five cubits, in breadth four, in height three; thus were the parts of this work ſeverally faſhioned. There were four little pillars ſquare and erected at every corner one, in which the ſides of the Baſes were adjoyned, and divided into three ſorts, according to the place diſtinguiſhed between the joynts; with Images, here a Lion, there a Bull, and in another place an Eagle. The pillars likewiſe were adorned with the ſame ingraving: and all this whole work hung upon four wheels, which were made of caſt work, which had certain naves or ſpoaks a cubit and a half in the Diameter: and it was a wonderful thing to ſee the N circumferences of them, how cunningly they were wrought, and properly ſetled to the ſides of the baſes by their naves, or ſtrakes. They were thus made; the corners or Angles on the upper part were ſuſtained by certain ſhoulders made after the manner of extended hands, on which there was placed a ſpire, to which the laver was faſtned, being upheld by the paws of a Lion, and an Eagle, which were faſhioned and ſo properly united, that they that beheld them, would have ſuppoſed them rather to be natural creatures, than otherwiſe; and betwixt them alſo there were certain Palm-trees figured: Such was the compoſition of the ten lavers. Moreover, he made ten other Brazen lavers after the manner of a round Cockleſhell, each of which contained forty Choes: for they were in height four cubits, and from brim to brim, there were likewiſe four cubits: O which lavers he placed upon ten baſes or feet called Meconoth, five of which ſtood on the left ſide of the Temple, that extended Northward, the other five on the right hand toward the South. Here likewiſe placed he the Sea full of water, to the intent that the that were ſacrificed. He builded likewiſe a brazen altar of twenty cubits long, and as many in breadth, and ten in height, to offer burnt offerings thereon. He made likewiſe all the veſſels that belonged thereunto of braſs: as Kettles, Water-Pots, Hooks, and Forks, and ſuch like, that in brightneſs equalled the pure Gold. The King alſo dedicated many Tables, and amongſt theſe, one great one of Gold (on which the Sacred Bread was laid) the reſt not far inferiour, yet made after divers manners, held Ewers and Platters of Gold, to the number of twenty thouſand, and of Silver forty thouſand. He made likewiſe ten thouſand Candleſticks (according as Moſes had commanded) whereof one he dedicated to the Temple, that according to the law it might give light there in the I day time. He made a Table alſo, on which the loaves of Bread were laid, on the North-ſide of the Temple, hard by the Candleſticks, which were placed towards the South.

The Altar of Gold was placed betwixt them both. All which things were incloſed in that part of the Temple that contained forty cubits, before the Tapeſtry of the Holy of Holies, where the Ark was to be placed. The King alſo cauſed fourſcore thouſand Pots, and an hundred thouſand Ewers of Gold, and twice as many of Silver, to be made, and fourſcore thouſand plates of Gold, and twice ſo many of Silver, to offer the kneaded flower in them upon the Altar; and threeſcore thouſand Cups of Gold, and twice ſo many of Silver, to lay the flower mingled with Oyl thereon; and two thouſand meaſures of Gold, and twenty thouſand of Silver, reſembling a Hin or an Epha of Moſes. Twenty thouſand Cenſers alſo of Gold, wherein the perfume was burnt, to hallow the Temple; K and other Cenſers likewiſe in which they carried fire from the great Altar, and laid it on the leſſer, which was within the Temple, to the number of fifty thouſand; he prepared alſo a thouſand veſtments for the uſe of the Prieſts, with their ſurcots, heads, and pectorals, notwithſtanding there was but one Crown, wherein Moſes had written the Name of God, which had continued even until this day. He made alſo ten thouſand Stoles for the Prieſts of fine linnen, with ſcarlet girdles for every one of them; two hundred thouſand trumpets according to the ordinance of Moſes, and forty thouſand inſtruments of Muſick, to record and praiſe God with (as the Pſaltery and Harp of a mixt matter the fifth part Gold, and the fourth part Silver.) All which Solomon moſt magnificently prepared for the ſervice of God, ſparing no coſt, but imploying himſelf to the utmoſt L of his power, toward the ornament of the Temple: which he beautified and endowed with all theſe treaſures. He environed the Temple likewiſe with a wall three Cubits high, which in our tongue we call Giſon, to exclude the prophane multitude, and admit none but the Prieſts only. Without this wall there ſtood a Temple four-ſquare with great and broad Iſles, which opened with very great gates; every one according to the quarter of the wind; and the doors thereof were covered with Gold. Into this place all the people that were purified might enter, and they likewiſe that kept the ordinances of Moſes. It can ſcarcely be believed, how admirable that exteriour Temple was: for he filled huge trenches, which by reaſon of their unmeaſurable depth, could not be lookt down into without vehement apprehenſion of fear, (for they were four hundred M cubits deep) yet notwithſtanding he filled them and raiſed them to the height of the Hill, whereon the Temple was built; and by this means it came to paſs, that the walk without the Temple was equalled with the foundation of the ſame. This did he begirt with double porches ſuſtained by pillars of rich ſtone; the roofs whereof were of poliſht Cedar, and the Gates were of Maſſive Silver.

After that King Solomon had in ſeven years finiſhed theſe ſo fair and magnificent buildings, and all the other neceſſaries which he had beſtowed upon the Temple, and declared thereby his great riches, and ſhewed his power, that that which at the firſt ſight might require a mans whole life to finiſh, he accompliſhed in few years: He wrote unto the Governours and Elders of the Hebrews, commanding them to aſſemble all the N people in Jeruſalem to behold the Temple, and to bring in the Ark of God: and although this aſſembly was publickly proclaimed, yet ſcarcely did the people make their appearance in Jeruſalem before the ſeventh moneth which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberete. About this time fell the feaſt of Tabernacles, which the Hebrews, moſt religiouſly obſerve and honour with great feſtivals. They therefore took the Ark and the Tabernacle that Moſes had made, with all thoſe neceſſaries which appertained to the Divine ſervice, and bare them into the Temple. The King and all the people, with the Levites marched before, having their cattel ready to ſacrifice, and filling the way with offerings, and the blood of divers ſlaughtered beaſts, burning an infinite quantity of perfumes, wherewith the air was filld round about, the ſcent whereof diſperſed O

A conducted they the Ark. But when it was to be carried into the Holy of Holies, the reſt of the multitude departed, and the Prieſt only placed it under the two Cherubins, who imbraced it with their wings, as if it had been covered with a pavilion or ſome canopy: for they had been faſhioned after that manner by the workmen. The Ark contained nought elſe but the two tables of Stone, in which were kept in writing the Ten commandments pronounced by God on mount Sinai. For as touching the Candleſtick, and the Table and Altar of Gold, he placed them in the Temple before the moſt Holy of Holies, in places correſpondent to thoſe where they ſtood, when they were in the Tabernacle. Then offered they the ordinary ſacrifices, and placed the braſen Altar before the Temple near unto the gate: ſo that when it was opened, the other ſtood in ſight, and a B man might ſee the ſervice and magnificence that was uſed in the ſacrifices. And as touching the other utenſils, he gathered them all together, and placed them in the Temple. But after the Prieſts (having given order for all things about the Ark) were departed from thence, ſuddenly there fell amidſt the ſanctuary a thick Cloud, not pitchy, nor ſuch as reſembleth winter Clouds loaden with rain; but diffuſed and tenuous, which darkned the ſight of the Prieſts ſo that they ſaw not one another. But thereby every mans mind was eaſily induced, to believe, and his opinion confirmed, that God was deſcended into the Temple which was dedicated to his Name, to teſtifie how acceptable it was to his divine Majeſty: In effect all men had no other opinion: But King Solomon ariſing from his throne whereon he was ſeated, addreſſed his prayers unto God, in ſuch words C as he thought to be agreeable to the divine nature, and convenient for him to uſe: O Lord (ſaid he) thou haſt an eternal houſe, neither are we ignorant that thou haſt framed this whole maſs of the Univerſe for thy ſelf, which conſiſteth of heaven, earth, air and ſeas: which thou altogether filleſt, yet art thou not contained by them. But therefore have we adorned and erected this Temple to thy Name, to the end that we might offer up our prayers in the ſame, and ſend them up to heaven (as a ſweet ſacrifice) to obtain thy favour, aſſuring our ſelves that thou art here preſent alſo, and wilt never be abſent from this place. For whereas thou ſeeſt all things, heareſt all things, yet forſakeſt thou not us at all, neither doeſt thou abandon the place where thou doſt inhabit: but rather thou art alwayes near unto all men, but in eſpecial preſent with thoſe that both do humbly deſire to approach unto thee day and night. Theſe words ſpak he, looking upwards towards God, and afterwards addreſſing himſelf unto the people, he ſpake unto them D touching his power and providence, how he had foretold his father David of all that which ſhould happen: the greater part whereof was already accompliſhed, and the reſt was ſhortly to ſucceed. Furthermore, he declared how God himſelf had given him his name before he was born, and that it was known how he ſhould be called: and how at ſuch time as he ſhould be King after the deceaſe of his Father, he ſhould build him a Temple; which things they ſaw brought to paſs according as they were foretold; for which they ought to give God thanks, and not to loſe any hope of any of thoſe things that had been promiſed them for their future happineſs, having ſufficient incouragement to believe by the accompliſhment of thoſe things which were already come to paſs.

v. 55, 56, &c. Solomons prayer wherein he thanks God for his benefits, and beſeecheth his future protection.

When the King had ſpoken after this manner unto the people, he turned again, and E beheld the Temple, and lifting up his hands towards the people, he began thus: It is impoſſible (ſaid he) for men to return thanks unto God according to the greatneſs of thoſe benefits which they have received, for he is by his infinite greatneſs placed ſo far above us that our oblations are altogether unprofitable unto him. But (O Lord) it behoveth us, that ſince of thy grace thou haſt made us more excellent than other living creatures, we ſhould bleſs and give thanks unto thy Majeſty, and in eſpecial it concerneth us to honour thee for the benefits thou haſt beſtowed on our Family, and all the Hebrew Nation. But by what other means can we appeaſe thee when thou art diſpleaſed, than by that voyce which we draw from the air, and which returneth into the air again? I ought therefore firſt of all to give thee thanks in reſpect of my Father, whom from a low degree thou haſt raiſed to the higheſt honour: next that thou F haſt fulfilled all thoſe things which thou haſt foretold of me until this preſent day; I beſeech thee for the time to come to furniſh me with thoſe things, that thou beſtoweſt on ſuch as are dear unto thee, that thou increaſe our houſe every way, according as thou haſt promiſed my Father David, eſtabliſh the Crown on my head, and continue it I beſeech thee, to my ſucceſſours, for many generations. Beſtow thou this benefit upon us, and bequeath unto all mine, that virtue wherein thou takeſt delight. Moreover I beſeech thee that a portion of thy Spirit may come and dwell in the Temple, to the intent that we may underſtand that thou dwelleſt upon earth; for not only this Temple, but the whole Heavens are too little for thy habitation. I beſeech thee therefore that it may pleaſe thee to take care of it as thine own, to the end it may never be deſtroyed by the Enemy, but that thou mayeſt alwaies ſecure it, as thine own peculiar inheritance. G And if thy people ſhall at any time forget thy Name, and offend againſt thy Majeſty, let it ſuffice, I beſeech thee, to chaſtiſe them with famine or peſtilence, or ſuch other calamities as thou art wont to inflict on the diſobedient; but when they ſhall be touched with repentance for their former ſins, and have recourſe unto this Temple, and beſeech thy mercy; hear them I beſeech thee, Solomon humbly beſeecheth God, that he will protect this Temple as his own houſe.

v. 41. He prayeth that ſtrangers may be heard alſo in this place.

as being preſent in this place and have compaſſion on them, and deliver them from their adverſities. A

Neither do I only intreat thee for the Hebrews when they ſhall have offended thee: but if it happen that if any ſtranger of what Countrey ſoever he be, ſhall from hence implore thine aſſiſtance, hear thou him, I pray thee, and grant his requeſt: For by this means all men ſhall know, that it is thy will that thy houſe ſhould be built in this place, and that we are not ſo inhumane as to envy this happineſs unto others, but that we have deſired that thy help and the communication of thy bleſſings ſhould be beſtowed, not only on thoſe of our Nation, but alſo on all the World. This ſaid, he caſt himſelf on his face, and continued in prayer a long time, and afterwards riſing again, he offered ſacrifices upon the Altar; and having filled the Temple with offerings, he knew moſt evidently that God did graciouſly accept of his oblations; for a fire paſſing through the aire, and lighting upon the Altar in the ſight of B all men, conſumed and devoured the ſacrifice. When this viſion had hapned, the people manifeſtly conjectured that Gods abode ſhould be in that Temple, and with great joy humbled themſelves on their faces, and lay proſtrate on the pavement. But the King began to praiſe God, and incited the people to do the like, conſidering they had already received the teſtimonies of his mercy, exhorting them to pray that he would be alwayes merciful unto them, and that he would keep them for ever in cleanneſs and uncorrupt minds, and that they might juſtly and religiouſly lead their lives in obſerving thoſe commandments which he had given them by Moſes. For in ſo doing, the people of the Hebrews ſhould proſper and grow more happy, than all the Nations of the World. Moreover he exhorted them to keep in their remembrance thoſe means, by which the benefits they poſſeſſed had been gotten; aſſuring them that by the ſame C they ſhould be continued, increaſed and multiplied. For they ought to think that they received them not, but for their piety and juſtice; and that thoſe bleſſings were not to be preſerved, but by the ſame means by which they were firſt required. When the King had ſpoken after this manner unto the people, he diſmiſſed the aſſembly (having firſt of all accompliſhed the ſacrifices both for himſelf and the people, by offering up twelve thouſand Oxen, and ſixſcore thouſand ſheep.) For then firſt of all was the Temple embrewed with the blood of the ſlaughtered ſacrifices, and all the Hebrews with their Wives and Children were entertained therein. The King alſo feaſting with the whole people, celebrated the ſolemnity of the Tabernacles for the ſpace of fourteen dayes in great pomp and magnificence. And when all things were performed, and nothing was deficient that concerned D the ſervice of God, every one (diſmiſſed by the King) departed to his own dwelling-place, giving him hearty thanks for the care he had taken of them, and for the works he had done for them; praying God that it might pleaſe him to grant their King a long life. And thus they returned home with joy, praiſing and ſinging hymnes unto God, ſo that they arrived at their own habitations without being ſenſible of the toil of their journey.

v. 6 7 8 9. A grievous commination againſt the Iſraelites, if they fall from the way of righteouſneſs.

After they had conducted the Ark into the Temple, and beheld the greatneſs and beauty of the ſame, and had celebrated moſt excellent ſacrifices, and made great ſolemnities they returned every one unto his City. But a viſion that night appeared unto the King during his ſleep, which gave him aſſurance that God had heard his prayer, and that he would guard his Temple, and dwell in the ſame for ever (if his poſterity and all the E people ſhould obſerve his commandments,) promiſing him, that if he continued in the obſervation of thoſe commands which were given him by his Father, he would ſecure his bleſſing unto him, that none but his poſterity ſhould ſway the Scepter, and rule over the Tribe of Juda for ever; provided that they kept his ſtatutes and obſerved his laws: but if he forgot the Lord and followed ſtrange gods, he would pluck him up by the roots, without leaving any remainder to Reign after him; neither ſhould the people of Iſrael remain unpuniſhed, but ſhould be exterminate by infinite Wars and adverſities, and be caſt out of the Countrey which he had given unto their anceſtors, and become baniſht men, and runnagates in a forraign Land. And concerning the Temple which is built at this preſent, I will (ſaid he) deliver it to the Enemies to ranſack and burn it, and the F City ſhall be deſtroyed by the hands of the Enemies: and their miſeries ſhall be ſo notorious through the world, and to ſuch extremity ſhall they be driven, as it ſhall hardly be believed: ſo as their neighbours round about them, hearing of their calamities, ſhall be aſtoniſhed, and ſhall ſeek out the cauſe why the Hebrews are thus hated by God, who beforetime have been ſo advanced by him in riches and honors: and they ſhall be informed by thoſe that ſurvive, that thoſe calamities are brought upon them by their ſins; and the tranſgreſſions which they have committed againſt the ordinances of their forefathers. Theſe things that were declared unto him in a dream, are regiſtred in the ſacred Letters.

1 King 7. 1. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 5. Solomons Palace finiſhed in thirteen years.

Seven years after the Temple had been thus built (as it hath been heretofore declared) he began the building of his Palace, which he ſcarcely finiſhed in thirteen years G ſpace; for he was not ſo intent and earneſt in building thereof, as he was in the ſtructure of the Temple. For although the temple was very great, and of incredible and marvellous magnificence, yet ſo it is that God (for whom it was made) aſſiſting the workmen, it was

The year of the World, 2941. before Chriſt's Nativity, 1023.

A thorowly finiſhed within the term of the years aforeſaid. But the Royal Palaces, being far leſs than the Temple, were built more ſlowly, becauſe the ſtuff had not been prepared ſo long time before, nor with ſo great diligence; and the rather, becauſe the Palaces that were, were not for God, but for Kings: notwithſtanding, this Houſe was built very magnificently, according as the wealth of the Countrey, and the power of the Hebrew King required. But it will not be amiſs if I declare all the order and diſpoſition of the ſame Houſe, that by the deſcription thereof, the Reader may be informed of its capaciouſneſs. It was a great and goodly Fabrick, ſuſtained by divers Pillars, prepared to receive and contain much People at the time of their aſſemblies, wherein they treated of affairs, and held pleas. It was an hundred cubits in length, and in breadth B fifty, and in height thirty, ſupported by ſixteen ſquare pillars covered with Corinthian work, with ſtairs and carved gates, which contributed no leſs to its beauty, than its ſecurity.

Ver. 8. The Hall. The Tribunal.

In the midſt of this ſpace, and hard by the Temple, there was another Pavilion thirty cubits ſquare, ſuſtained with ſtrong pillars, within which there was another magnificent Tribunal, on which the King ſate to give judgment, unto which there was adjoined another Palace prepared for the Queen. All the Chambers, as well thoſe that were ordinarily in uſe, as thoſe for recreation, after he had retired himſelf from publick affairs, were adorned with planks of carved Cedar, and were built partly of ſtone ten cubits ſquare, partly of curious marble, and very rarely and cunningly wrought by the moſt C curious and exact Maſons. And that which made it more beautiful, were three panes of Tapiſtry, and the fourth admirable for the artificial engravings: for the Workmen had made therein Trees and Plants of divers ſorts, ſhadowed with their branches and leafs, hanging in ſuch ſort, that to behold them, a Man would have thought that they ſhook, the workmanſhip was ſo exquiſite and curious that covered the ſtone. The reſt, as far as the roof, was enchaſed, and flouriſhed with divers Antiques and Pictures. Furthermore, he built other places of pleaſure, with very long porches to beautifie the Palace; amongſt which, there was one moſt magnificent to make Banquets and Feaſts in, which was throughout adorned with gold: and all the neceſſaries for entertainment were of gold. It would be difficult to give an exact account of the variety, the capaciouſneſs D and magnificence of theſe ſtructures, whereof ſome were of a greater, and ſome of a leſſer bulk; ſome under ground, and others raiſed to a great height: the pleaſant Arbors likewiſe, and the Gardens, which were ſo faſhioned, that they afforded a pleaſant proſpect to the eye, as well as refreſhment from the heat. All the building was made of white Marble, of Cedar, of Gold, and of Silver: the floors and walls were figured with diverſity of flowers, and of precious ſtones, inchaſed in gold, after the manner of the Temple of God, which ſhined with ſuch like ornaments. There was likewiſe erected a very large Throne, made in form of a Tribunal, with ſix ſteps of pure Ivory: on each ſide of which there ſtood two Lyons, and the like number were placed above. About the place where the King ſate, there were ſeveral Arms ſtretched out, which ſeemed to E ſuccor or protect him; and he ſate upon an Oxe looking backwards: this Throne was all covered with gold.

Solomon built all this that hath been ſpoken of, in the ſpace of twenty years, being furniſhed by Hiram, King of the Tyrians, for theſe his buildings, with great ſums of gold, and far greater of ſilver, beſides a quantity of Cedar and Pine-trees. Solomon alſo remunerated him, and gave him great Preſents, and ſent him every year abundance of Corn, Wine and Oyl, (as we have heretofore declared) whereof he ſtood in great need, by reaſon that his Countrey was an Iſland. And beſides that, he gave him twenty Cities in Galilee, not far diſtant from Tyre. Hiram having viſited them, and not well-pleaſed with them, ſent unto Solomon to certifie him thereof, that he had no uſe for his Cities: and F from that time forward they were called the Countrey of Chabel, which is as much as to ſay, in the Phœnician tongue, unpleaſant. Hiram likewiſe ſent unto Solomon certain myſteries, and difficult queſtions, requiring him to explicate them, and ſolve thoſe doubts and difficulties that occurred in his demands. Solomon being a Man of ripe judgment and underſtanding, explained them all with a great deal of perſpicuity. Of theſe two Kings, Menander (who Tranſlated the Antiquities of the Tyrians out of the Phœnician Tongue into Greek) maketh mention, after this manner: After the deceaſe of Abibale, Hiram his ſon ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, who lived Fifty and three years, and reigned Thirty and four. He annexed the Field, which is called the great Field, unto the Iſland, and conſecrated a golden pillar in Jupiters *temple. Solomon repaireth the walls of Jeruſalem, and erecteth towers. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 6. Solomon buildeth certain Cities, Azor, Magedon, Gaza, Betachor, Baleth.

The King ſeeing that the City of Jeruſalem wanted both Bulwarks and Towers to ſecure the ſame, and that the ſtrength of it was no way anſwerable to the dignity thereof, he repaired the walls, and erected great Towers on the ſame. Moreover, he built certain Cities, which deſerve to be commemorated amongſt the moſt Renowned, namely, Aſcor and Magedon, and the City of Gaza in the Countrey of the Philiſtines: againſt which Pharaoh King of Egypt led out his Army, and took it by force; and after he had put all the Inhabitants thereof to the Sword, he deſtroyed the ſame, and he gave it in K dower unto his daughter which was married to Solomon. For which cauſe the King fortified it; ſeeing it to be already ſufficiently fenced by nature, and that it ſtood very commodiouſly for the War, and to hinder the incurſions of the enemy. Not far from thence, he fortified two other Cities, whereof one was called Betachor, and the other Baleth. Beſides theſe, he built others, which were Cities of recreation and pleaſure, by reaſon of the good temperature of the Air, and the pleaſantneſs of the fruits, and in eſpecially the ſweet Rivers wherewith they were watered. Afterwards entering into the Deſart that is above Syria, and conquering the ſame, he built another great City two dayes journey diſtant from the higher Syria, a dayes journey from Euphrates, and ſix from the great Babylon. The cauſe why this City was inhabited far from peopled quarters of Syria, was, L becauſe in no place of the lower Countrey there was water to be found, and in this City onely there were fountains and ſprings.

Thadamor, or Palmira.

He therefore built this City, and begirt it with ſtrong walls, and called it Thadamor, (which is the name which the Syrians term it by, even at this day, and amongſt the Greeks it is called Palmyra.) And theſe were Solomons works in that time.

Why the Egyptian Kings were called Pharaohs.

But ſince divers are inquiſitive to know the reaſon why the Kings of Egypt that have been ſince Mineus the founder of Memphis, (who reigned divers years before our great Anceſtor Abraham) till Solomons time, for the ſpace of more than Thirteen hundred years, have been called Pharaohs, deriving that name from one that reigned in the midtime between both: I have thought fit to give ſome account of it. The name of Pharaoh amongſt the Egyptians, ſignifieth as much as King. But I ſuppoſe M that from their childhood they had other diſtinct names, and that afterward when they are created Kings, they take upon them that name, which in their Mother-tongue ſignifieth no leſs than Authority. (For the Kings of Alexandria having been heretofore called by other names, at ſuch time as they take upon them the Kingdom, they are called Ptolomies, by the name of their firſt King.)

The Roman Emperors likewiſe, notwithſtanding they have other names at the time of their birth, yet are they called Cæſars; becauſe the ſovereignty and honour whereunto they are raiſed, impoſeth that title on them: and the name that was given them by their Fathers, is no more retained. For this cauſe it is, that although Herodotus of Halicarnaſſeus, ſaith, that ſince Mineus the Founder of Memphis, there have been Three hundred and thirty Kings of Egypt; yet declareth he N not their names, becauſe they were called Pharaohs. For when after theſe a Woman had obtained the Kingdom, he called her by her own proper name, Nicaule: whence it appeareth, that the men who have been Kings, were uſually called by this name, and that it had not been communicated unto this Woman: for which cauſe it was neceſſary to declare her own firſt name. For mine own part, I have found in the Books of our Nation, that ſince Pharaoh, who was Father-in-law to Solomon, none of the Kings of Egypt have been called by that name: and that ſome little while after, the forementioned Woman came unto Solomon, who reigned in Egypt and Ethiopia: of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. But at this preſent I have made mention of it, that it might appear that our Records, and the Chronicles of the Egyptians, agree in many things. O

But King Solomon conquered the Canaanites, (which till that time were not under his ſubjection) and thoſe that inhabited the mountain Libanus, as far as the City of Amath, and

For no Hebrew was a ſlave: neither was it convenient, that ſince God had ſubjected divers Nations under them, (whom they might make ſlaves of) that they ſhould tye thoſe of their own Nation to that bondage, who were all of them employed in Arms, and rather took delight to ride in Chariots, and on Horſes, than to ſubmit to any mean or ſervile employment. Over the Canaanites (whom he employed in his ſervice) he appointed Five hundred and fifty Commiſſaries, who had their charge and authority from the King, and impoſed on them thoſe works wherein they were employed. He built a Navy alſo in the Gulf of Egypt, in a certain place of the Red Sea called Aſiongaber, which is named B Berenice, not far from the City of Elana (which Countrey in times paſt appertained to the Jews.) And toward the building of his Navy, he obtained of Hiram, King of Tyre, a very conſiderable aſſiſtance: for he ſent him Models of Ships, and Men that were skilful in Navigation, whom he appointed to ſail with his Factors to the Countrey at that time called Ophir, and at this preſent the Land of Gold, in the Countrey of India, to bring Gold from thence: who returned back again unto the King, after they had gathered about Four hundred Talents.

The Queen of Egypt and Ethiope reſorteth to Solomon

About this time the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, (a Woman adorned with wiſdom, and admirable in all other things) having heard of the renowned virtue and prudence of Solomon, deſired to ſee with her own eyes whether thoſe things which were C reported of him were true; nor was ſhe deterr'd either by the length or difficulty of the journey from undertaking it, that ſhe might thereby receive that ſatisfaction which ſhe had promiſed her ſelf. She therefore came unto Jeruſalem with great pomp, glory, and riches; for ſhe brought with her ſeveral Camels laden with gold, odors, and precious ſtones of great value. After that the King had graciouſly entertained her, and honoured her in all things, he eaſily apprehended thoſe doubts which ſhe propoſed, and gave her a more ſpeedy ſolution of the ſame, than might be expected: ſo that ſhe was raviſhed with the incredible wiſdom of Solomon, knowing by the effect, that it exceeded the report which ſhe had heard of him. But in ſpecial ſhe wondred at his Palace, conſidering the greatneſs and beauty thereof; and, above all, at the rich furniture and curious architecture D of the ſame; wherein ſhe perceived the great wiſdom of the King: but nothing more ſurprized her, than the beauty of one ſingle Room, called the Foreſt of Libanus: but the magnificence of his ordinary Table, and the furniture and ſervice of the ſame, made her aſtoniſhed. The attire of his ſervants likewiſe, and the goodly order which they obſerved in their ſervice. Moreover, the Sacrifices that were every day offered up unto God, and the care and diligence of the Prieſts in diſcharging their offices, pleaſed her more than all the reſt, when ſhe obſerved them daily: and being not able to contain her ſelf, ſhe expreſſed how wonderfully ſhe was affected; and her admiration ſtill encreaſing, ſhe could not but expreſs it to the King, after this manner:

We may very well doubt of things extraordinary, when we have no opportunity of being E acquainted with them but by report: But the fame of your riches, both thoſe which you have in your ſelf, (I mean your wiſdom and prudence) as thoſe alſo which your Kingdom hath brought you, is neither falſe nor feigned; but yet I muſt confeſs, that the happineſs which I have ſeen, is much more excellent than that which was repreſented to me: for report dependeth only on hear-ſay, neither giveth it ſo certain a notice of things as the ſight diſcovereth, when one is near unto the ſame. For mine own part, I gave no credit to what I heard, but I have ſeen far more than I could expect, and repute the people of the Hebrews to be moſt happy; and your ſervants and friends moſt bleſſed, who are continual witneſſes and hearers of your wiſdom. And each one of you ought to give God thanks, that he hath ſo much loved this Region, and the Inhabitants thereof, that he hath eſtabliſhed you in the Royal Seat. I ſhall relate alſo, how ſhe expreſſed F her affection ſhe bare unto the King, by divers Preſents which ſhe offer'd unto him. For ſhe gave him twenty talents of gold, and an innumerable quantity of ſweet odors and precious ſtones. It is ſaid likewiſe, that we have that Plant that diſtilleth balm, and which our Countrey bringeth forth at this day, by the gift of this Princeſs. Solomon for his part requited her bountiful Preſents with the like, which ſhe made choice of according to her own liking, for there was nothing which ſhe could require, which he granted not unto her: ſhewing himſelf moſt ready to give her ſatisfaction with a liberal and royal heart. When the Queen of Egypt and Ethiopia had received theſe favors at the Kings hands (according as it hath been ſpoken) and he likewiſe had magnificently requited her, ſhe returned back again into her own Countrey.

ments of Muſick likewiſe, as Harps and Cymbals, on which the Levites might praiſe H God. Amongſt all the gifts that were ever preſented unto Solomon, that which was given him at that time, was moſt excellent in greatneſs and beauty. But let no man think, that the Pine-wood (which we ſpeak of) had any reſemblance with that which we call by that name at this day, or which the Merchants, to delude their Chapmen, ſell for the ſame. For they are like unto fig-trees, but that they are more white and clearer: which I thought good to take notice of in this place, leſt any Man ſhould be deceived through ignorance, in not diſcerning the one from the other, becauſe the affairs of Solomon have drawn us to make mention of this matter. The weight of gold which this Navy brought unto the King, was Six hundred ſixty and ſix Talents: beſides that which the Merchants I bought themſelves, or that which the Kings and Princes of Arabia had ſent unto him by way of Preſent. This gold cauſed he to be molten down, and made thereof Two hundred Targets, each one weighing Six hundred ſhekels; and Three hundred Bucklers, each one of them weighing Three hundred mines of gold, and placed and hung them in the Hall, called the Foreſt of Libanus. He cauſed alſo divers veſſels of gold and precious ſtones to be made for the uſe of his Table, all curiouſly wrought; the reſt of his neceſſaries alſo were of gold: for nothing was either bought or ſold for ſilver. For the King had many ſhips upon the Sea of Tharſis, which upon his command carried divers merchandize into remote Countries, by vent whereof they brought him home much gold and ſilver, and much Ivory and Ethiopian Moors and Apes; and this Navigation in ſailing to and fro, was finiſhed in three years. The renown and fame alſo of Solomons K virtues and wiſdom, ſpread far and near throughout all Nations: ſo that Kings of the remoteſt Countries, had a deſire to ſee him, becauſe they believed not the report, and deſired to manifeſt their affection to him by magnificent Preſents. They therefore ſent him veſſels of gold and of ſilver, ſcarlet Robes, and all ſorts of aromatique Drugs, Horſes and Chariots, Mules and Sumpter-Horſes, wherein (as it was reported unto them) the King took pleaſure, by reaſon of their ſtrength and beauty: ſo that to the uumber of Horſes and Chariots which he had before, there were annexed Four hundred more, which had been ſent him as Preſents, For before that, he had a Thouſand Chariots, and Twenty thouſand goodly Horſes, excellent for ſhape and ſwiftneſs: ſo that the like were not to L be found, that were comparable to them for beauty and pace. And that which gave them the greater grace was, that they were backed by young Men, of goodly perſonage to behold, and ſurpaſſing all other in heighth, having long locks, which they daily intermixed with wires of gold, that when the Sun ſhould ſhine upon their heads, they might appear more glorious and bright. The King mounted on his Chariot, and apparelled in a white Rayment, was accuſtomed to ride abroad about the Sun-riſe, guarded with theſe young armed Men, having Bowes and Quivers.

There was a certain place called Ittan, ſome eight Leagues diſtant from Jeruſalem, delightful and enriched with gardens and pleaſant fountains of water, whither he uſually retired himſelf for his pleaſure. He forgot not likewiſe to make Cauſeys, but cauſed the Highways that led to Jeruſalem, (where he made his abode) to be paved with black M ſtone, to make them more acceſſible for thoſe that travelled to and fro, and to ſhew his magnificence and riches. He then divided his Chariots, and placed them in ſuch ſort, that in every City there was a certain number, and ſome few he kept about himſelf, and thoſe Cities he called the Cities of Chariots: he ſtored Jeruſalem alſo with abundance of ſilver, ſo that it was as plentiful as ſtones; and with Cedar-wood (whereof before that time there was no quantity) he ſtored the Countrey, that it was as plentiful to be had as wild Fig-trees. He commanded the Merchants of Egypt alſo, to buy him certain Chariots drawn by two Horſes, for the price of Six hundred drachms of ſilver, which he ſent unto the Kings of Syria, and to thoſe on the other ſide of Euphrates.

Now although he were the moſt magnificent and entirely beloved of God, ſurpaſſing N both in prudence and riches all thoſe that before him had the government of the Hebrews; yet continued he not in this ſtate until the end. For, forſaking the obſervation of the ordinances of his Fathers, his latter years were not correſpondent to his former: for he grew altogether diſſolute, and immoderately given over to Women; and was not content only with thoſe of his own Countrey, but took alſo ſtrange Women for his Wives, as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, and Idumæans, whereby he tranſgreſſed the laws of marriage inſtituted by Moſes, who inhibited to marry with thoſe of foreign Nations. Afterwards he began to honour their gods alſo, that he might the more affectionately expreſs the love which he bare unto them: which thing the Lawmaker foreſeeing, he had forbidden the Iſraelites to marry with thoſe that were not of their own Nation, for fear leſt O conforming themſelves unto foreign Faſhions, they ſhould tranſgreſs the ordinances of their Forefathers: and by doing honour to thoſe gods, ſhould forget the honour due

H unto the true God. But Solomon tranſported with theſe bruitiſh pleaſures, made no account of theſe things, but took him wives of the daughters of Princes and Nobles, to the number of 700, and 300 Concubines, beſides the daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt; by which means he was exceſſively overcome by them, inſomuch as he follow'd their examples, and was forced to give a teſtimony of the good will and extreme affection that he bare them, in ordering his life according to the faſhion of their Countries. As therefore he increaſed in years, and his judgment grew weak, he was in ſuch ſort miſled, that he could not retain in memory the cuſtoms of his Countrey, but more and more neglected the God of his father, and promoted the worſhip of thoſe gods which were introduced by his wives. Before all this, he chanced to ſin, and tranſgreſs againſt the obſervation of I the law, at ſuch time as he made the ſimilitudes of beaſts of braſs to underprop the veſſel called the great Sea, and thoſe of Lions which he cauſed to be ſet unto his Throne: for that action of his ill beſeemed him, who had a moſt excellent example of virtue in the perſon of his father, beſides the glory that he had left him, by being a faithful ſervant of God; whence it came to paſs, that by neglecting to follow his ſteps (notwithſtanding that God had exhorted him thereunto, by appearing unto him at two ſeveral times) he dyed moſt ignominiouſly. There came therefore unto him a Prophet ſent from God, telling him, That his ſins were manifeſt, and notorious in Gods ſight, threatning him that ere long he ſhould repent the wickedneſs he had committed. Yet notwithſtanding, the Realm ſhould not be taken from him during his life, becauſe God had promiſed David that he ſhould be his K ſucceſſor; but after his deceaſe, he would chaſtiſe his ſon, for the iniquity of the father: not ſo as all the people ſhould revolt, but that he would give ten Tribes unto his ſervant, and leave two unto the Grandchild of David, becauſe he had loved God, and by reaſon of the City of Jeruſalem, where it pleaſed him to make his habitation.

V 14, &c. 23. The puniſhment inflicted on Solomon, for honouring ſtrange gods.

When Solomon heard theſe things, he was ſore troubled, becauſe all his felicity began to decline. Nor was it long after this denunciation of the Prophet, but that there roſe up an enemy againſt him, who was called Ader, by Nation an Idumæan, and of the Princely ſtock, who, upon this occaſion, grounded his rebellion and inſurrection. For at ſuch time as Joab, General of Davids Army, had conquer'd Idumæa, and in the ſpace of ſix months defeated all the youth, and thoſe that were capable to bear Arms, he fled unto L Pharaoh King of Egypt, who entertain'd him very courteouſly, and gave him an houſe and lands for his maintenance, and loved him dearly when he came to mans eſtate; ſo that he married him to Taphines his wives ſiſter, on whom he begat a Son, who was brought up with the Kings children: who having intelligence in Egypt of David and Joabs death, addreſs'd himſelf unto Pharaoh, and beſought him to give him leave to repair into his own Countrey.

Ver. 14, ad 22. Ader, enemy to Solomon. Ader fled into Egypt. Ader beſeecheth Pharaoh to diſmiſs him, that he might return into his Countrey.

The King ask'd him what he wanted, or what the cauſe was that mov'd him to be ſo forward to forſake him? Notwithſtanding therefore that he importuned and requeſted him divers times, yet prevailed he not with him. But when Solomons fortunes began to decline, (by reaſon of his iniquities above-mentioned, and the wrath of God provoked M againſt him) Ader, by Gods permiſſion, came into Idumæa, after he had obtained leave of Pharaoh to depart. But being unable to move the people to revolt from Solomon, by reaſon of the ſtrong Gariſons he held; and knowing, that without hazard of his own perſon, he could move no alterations or innovation in that place, he departed from thence, and went into Syria: where confederating himſelf with a certain man called Raas (who was fled from his Maſter Adarezer, King of Sophone, and lived like an Outlaw in that Region) he contracted friendſhip with him, and a great ſort of Outlaws and Thieves that were his followers, and went into Syria, and ſeizing on that Countrey, proclaimed himſelf King thereof. From whence, making excurſions into the lands of the Iſraelites, he ſpoiled and pillaged the ſame, during Solomons life-time. Thus were N the Hebrews enforced to ſuſtain thoſe Outrages at Aders hands.

Ader returneth into Idumæa, and from thence departeth into Syria. Raas and Ader enemies to Solomon.

Moreover, a certain Man called Jeroboam, the ſon of Nebat, by Nation a Jew, rebelled againſt Solomon, and raiſed his hopes above his eſtate, perſuaded thereunto by a Propheſie that concerned him, and incited him unto the action. For being left very young by his Father, and carefully inſtructed by his Mother, as ſoon as Solomon perceived him to be of a noble and couragious ſpirit, he made him Commiſſary over the building of the Walls, at ſuch time as he immured and fortified Jeruſalem. In this office he behaved himſelf ſo well, that the King thought very well thereof, and by way of recompence, made him General over the Tribe of Joſeph. Towards which, whil'ſt he travelled from Jeruſalem, a certain Prophet met him upon the way, (who was of the City of Silo, called O Achias) who approaching near unto him, and ſaluting him, drew him out of the way into a place, where none but themſelves were preſent, and there renting the garment which he wore upon his back in twelve pieces, he commanded Jeroboam to take ten, telling him, Now ſince thou knoweſt the cauſe wherefore God hath alienated the Kingdom from Solomon, be thou juſt, and obſerve the Laws; for if thou behaveſt thy ſelf in ſuch ſort as thou knoweſt David did, a great reward of thy piety, and recompence of thy obſervance attendeth thee, ſo that thou ſhalt become as mighty as David hath been before thee. Jeroboam confirmed in great hopes by theſe words of the Prophet, being by nature haughty, in years young, and beſides that, deſirous of authority, he took no reſt; but being poſſeſſed of the place of B General, and remembring himſelf of that which had been told him by Achias, he preſently began to perſuade the people to revolt from Solomon, and to chooſe him for their King. Solomon hearing news of this his deſign, ſought means to lay hands on him, and to put him to death: but Jeroboam preventing him, fled unto Suſac King of Egypt, with whom he remained until the death of Solomon. And thus for that time eſcaped he puniſhment: and thus was he reſerved to the fortune of a Kingdom.

CHAP. III.

After the death of Solomon, the people revolt from Rehoboam his Son, and proclaim Jeroboam King of the Ten Tribes. C

The death of Solomon. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8. al. 4. 1 Reg. 12. 1, ad 11.

BUT when Solomon was very old, he dyed, after he had Reigned fourſcore years, and lived ninety four, and was buried in Jeruſalem; of all Kings the moſt happy, rich, and prudent, (except that ſin whereunto he was drawn by Women in his old age) of whom, and thoſe calamities that preſently after befell the Hebrews, we have ſufficiently ſpoken. After the death of Solomon, as ſoon as his ſon Rehoboam (whom he begat upon an Ammonitiſh woman, called Noma) ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, the Governors of the people ſent certain meſſengers into Egypt, to recall Jeroboam: who arriving in the City of Sichem, Rehoboam came thither alſo, reſolving in that Aſſembly of the Iſraelites, to take the Kingdom upon himſelf by the peoples conſent. To him therefore the Prin- D ces of the people reſorted with Jeroboam, beſeeching him, That he would remit ſomewhat of their ſervitude, and ſhew himſelf more merciful than his father had been: for that under his government they had been ſorely oppreſſed, aſſuring him that by that means his Kingdom ſhould be the more ſecured, if ſo be he had rather be beloved, than feared. He three days after promiſed them to return an anſwer to their demands, and by that means drew them into ſuſpition, that upon the motion he miſliked of the offers they had propoſed: for they thought it became his years to be affable, and ready to deſerve well; yet remained there ſome hope in them, that they had not preſently ſuffered a repulſe. Mean while, he calling about him his fathers friends, conſulted what anſwer he ſhould give the people: E they that wiſhed his welfare, and knew the nature of the people very well, perſuaded him to ſpeak familiarly unto the people, and remitting a little of his Kingly auſterity, to apply himſelf to the favor and good liking of the multitude: for that by this his affability, he might the more eaſily draw their hearts unto him, becauſe that by a natural inclination, Subjects take delight in thoſe Kings that are courteous, who with a certain decent familiarity, entertain themſelves amongſt them. But Rehoboam rejected this counſel of theirs (which was both good and profitable in all occaſions, but eſpecially upon the firſt entrance into a Kingdom) and that not without Gods providence, ſince contrary to all reaſon he neglected the right courſe, and followed the perverſe: ſo that calling unto him certain young men of his own humor and diſpoſition, he told them what the Elders had counſelled him, and willed them to diſcover their opinion in that matter: F but neither their age, nor Gods permiſſion ſuffered them to know that which was expedient. For which cauſe they counſelled him to anſwer the people, That his little finger was more great than the loins of his father; and that if they had experimented and endured grievances under him, that he would be far more rigorous; and that if his father had chaſtiſed them with the ſtroke of the Rod, that they ſhould expect to be puniſhed by him with a ſeverer chaſtiſement. The King delighted herewith, ſuppoſed the anſwer to be agreeable to the dignity of his Empire. When therefore the people were aſſembled on the third day to hear his reſolution, and all of them were in ſuſpence, expecting and deſirous to hear him ſpeak, from whom they hoped nought elſe but ſweetneſs: Rehoboam contemning the counſel of his friends, propoſed unto himſelf that of the young Men. All which G hapned by the Will of God, to the end that that which Achias had propheſied might be fulfilled.

The people require Rehoboam to mitigate their burthen.

H They touched by theſe his anſwers, no leſs than if they had been wounded with a ſword, were much diſpleaſed, and no leſs moved, than if they had already felt the miſchief that was threatned: ſo that they began all of them to cry with a loud voice, that from that time forward, they had nothing to do with Davids alliance, neither with his ſucceſſion, telling him, that they would only leave the Temple his father had built, unto his charge, and threatning him to abandon him. Furthermore, they were ſo heinouſly incenſed, (that Rehoboam having ſent unto them Adoram, the Superintendent of the Tribes, to pacifie their wrath, and to perſuade them to pardon his youth, if he had ſpoken any thing lightly, and unreſpectively unto them) they could not endure to hear him ſpeak, but ſlew and well-nigh overwhelmed him with ſtones. Which when Rehoboam perceived, (ſuppoſing that it was himſelf, who in the perſon of his Officer was put I to death, and ſtoned by the people) he feared leſt in effect his life, and the fortune of his Kingdom ſhould fall into the like diſaſter. Whereupon he took his Chariot, and fled to Jeruſalem, where the Tribe of Juda, and that of Benjamin (by their common ſuffrages) made him King. But as touching the reſt of the people, from that day forward they revolted from the Succeſſors of David, and proclaimed Jeroboam King of their eſtates. Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon being ſore diſpleaſed herewith, aſſembled the two Tribes, with an intent to muſter One hundred and fourſcore thouſand choſen Men, to make War on Jeroboam and his people, and to inforce them by War to acknowledge him for their Soveraign. But God reſtrained him by the means of a Prophet, who forbade him to make K War, ſaying, That it became not thoſe of the ſame Nation, to contend one againſt another: and the rather, for that this their revolt had hapned by the Will of God, by which means and perſuaſion he diſmiſſed his Army. But firſt of all I will rehearſe that which Jeroboam King of Iſrael did, and afterwards declare the acts of Rehoboam King of the two Tribes, and thus ſhall the courſe of the Hiſtory continue in order.

After that Jeroboam had ſetled his Court in the City of Sichem, he made his ordinary abode in that place, except that ſometimes he ſojourned in the City of Phanuel. Not long after this, the feaſt of Tabernacles being at hand, Jeroboam (ſuppoſing that if he permitted the people to go up and worſhip God in Jeruſalem, and ſolemnize the feaſt in that place, they might either repent themſelves of the revolt, or that by the magnificence of L the Ceremonies uſed in the worſhip of God in the Temple, and ſervice that was celebrated therein, they might be perſuaded to forſake him, and ſubmit themſelves to their firſt King, and by that means he might be drawn into danger of his life) to prevent the danger of ſuch a miſchief, took this courſe: He cauſed two golden Calves to be caſt, and built two ſeveral Temples, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, (which is ſcituate near to the ſource of little Jordan) in which he placed theſe Calves; and afterwards aſſembling the ten Tribes that were under his ſubjection, he ſpake unto them in manner following:

The Court and Palace of Jeroboam.

Ver. 26, 27, 28. Why Jeroboams Calves were made.

My Friends and Countreymen, I know that you are not ignorant how God is in all places, and that there cannot be any place wherein he aſſiſteth not, nor time wherein he heareth and beholdeth M them not, that ſerve him with true affection: For which cauſe I think it not convenient, that you go up unto Jeruſalem, which is a City at enmity with us, neither that you make ſo long a journey to perform your devotion: for it was a man that built that Temple, even as I have conſecrated two golden Calves, the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, to the end that every one of you that inhabit near unto thoſe Cities, may go thither and worſhip God. Neither ſhall you want Prieſts and Levites: for I will elect ſome ſuch among you, to the intent that you may have no more need of the Tribe of Levi, or the Sons of Aaron. Whoſoever therefore amongſt you would be a Prieſt, let him offer Calves and Muttons unto God, after the ſame manner that Aaron did when he was firſt appointed to be a Prieſt.

Jeroboam perſuadeth the people to Idolatry.

By ſuch like Speeches ſeduced he the people, and cauſed them to fall from their Fore- N fathers Religion, and tranſgreſs the Ordinances of their Countrey, and this was the beginning of all thoſe miſchiefs that afterwards fell upon the Hebrews: by which means being overcome in War, they fell into captivity, and were made ſubject to ſtrangers, (whereof we will treat further hereafter.) Now when the feaſt of Tabernacles (which hapned in the ſeventh month) was at hand, he himſelf intended to celebrate in Bethel after the ſame manner, as the two other Tribes had feaſted in Jeruſalem, and erected an Altar before the Calf, and was himſelf the High Prieſt, aſcending up to the Altar, being aſſiſted by the Prieſts.

The neglect of Gods ſervice, is the cauſe of all evil.

Now at ſuch time as he was about to ſacrifice, and to offer up burnt-offerings in the ſight of the people, there came a Prophet and ſtood by him, called Jadon, (ſent from O Jeruſalem by the commandment of God) who ſtanding up in the midſt of the people, and in the hearing of the King, turned himſelf towards the Altar, and ſpake after this manner: Thou Altar, thou Altar, thus ſaith the Lord, there ſhall a man riſe of the Tribe of David,

Jeroboams withered hand reſtored.

Helio & Ruſfinus, cap. 9.

vid, called Joſias, he ſhall kill upon thee the falſe Prophets of his time, and ſhall burn the bones of the deceivers and ſeducers upon thee: And to the intent that each man may believe that this Prophecy is true, it ſhall be confirmed by a Prodigy. This Altar ſhall ſuddenly break, and the fat of the Sacrifices that are laid thereon, ſhall be poured on the ground. Jeroboam diſpleaſed with theſe words of the Prophet, ſtretched out his hand, commanding them to lay hold on him. But the hand that he ſtretched out, became inſtantly wither'd, ſo that he could no more draw it back again to himſelf, but held it hanging down, aſtoniſhed and mortified. On the other ſide the Altar cleft in twain, and all that was thereon fell down (according as the Prophet had foretold.) The King perceiving that the man had a true and divine ſpirit of Prophecy, beſought him to pray unto God, that his hand might be reſtored to him again in its full ſtrength and vigor; and he prayed, and his hand was reſtored; wherewith Jeroboam being well-pleaſed, invited the Prophet to dine with him. But Jadon anſwer'd him, and ſaid, That he neither might enter into his houſe, nor taſte any bread or water within the City, becauſe God had prohibited him: furthermore he told him, That it was not lawful for him to return the ſame way that he came. But the King admiring at the continency of the man, began the more ſeriouſly to ſuſpect his eſtate, and (conjecturing by thoſe things which he had both ſeen and heard) he divined the aſſured diſaſter of his eſtate and fortunes. There dwelt in that City a certain falſe Prophet, whom Jeroboam held in great honour, (in that he ſoothed him up in whatſoever was beſt pleaſing to his ears.) This man lay at that time ſick upon his Bed, being feeble through age; and when he was informed by his ſon that there was a Prophet come from Jeruſalem, and what wonders he had wrought, and how Jeroboam by his prayers recovered again his withered hand; he fearing leſt the King ſhould make more account of this ſtranger, than of himſelf, commanded his ſons preſently to ſaddle his Aſs, and to have him in a readineſs againſt his departure. Which when they had performed, he mounted thereon, and went after the Prophet, whom he overtook, where he reſted himſelf under a thick ſhadowy Oak; and upon the firſt encounter, ſaluted him, and afterwards expoſtulated, why he had not viſited him, neither accepted of that hoſpitality which he willingly would have afforded him. Jadon anſwer'd him, That God had forbidden him, and charged him not to taſte any kind of ſuſtenance in any mans houſe that dwelt within the City. Truly, ſaid the other, with me thou mighteſt eat, for I alſo am a Prophet, and honour the ſame God that thou doeſt: and now alſo come I unto thee by his commandment, to conduct thee back again unto my houſe, and to entertain thee with a friendly dinner. Theſe words of the falſe Prophet made Jadon credulous, ſo that he turned back again with him. But as they ſate at their Banquet, and were making merry together, God appeared unto Jadon, and ſaid unto him, That ſince he had broken his commandment, he ſhould ſuffer puniſhment for the ſame: and withall expreſſed unto him the manner, which was, That in his return homewards, he ſhould be torn in pieces by a Lyon; and that he ſhould not be buried in the monument of his fathers. This thing hapned in my opinion by the Will of God, to the intent that Jeroboam ſhould not reſpect Jadons words, who had been found a lyar. As therefore Jadon returned back to Jeruſalem, a Lyon met him on the way, and tore him in pieces from his Aſs, and ſlew him, yet offered he no violence to the Aſs that bare him, which he preſerved with the body of the Prophet, ſtanding faſt by the ſame, until ſuch time as certain paſſengers beholding the ſpectacle, brought news thereof into the Town unto the falſe Prophet, who ſent his ſons to bring back the body: which by their aſſiſtance he honourably buried, charging them, that after his death, they ſhould bury his body by him, aſſuring them, that all that which he had propheſied againſt that City, againſt the Altar, the Prieſts, and falſe Prophets, was very true. And as touching himſelf, he commanded that after his deceaſe, they ſhould bury him by him, becauſe that being buried with him, there might no difference be made betwixt their bones, and his Tomb might be honoured. When therefore he had interred the Prophet, and given his ſon theſe things in charge (being otherways a moſt wicked and impious man) he addreſſed himſelf to Jeroboam, and ſaid unto him: Why art thou troubled at the words of this mad man? The King told him all that which had hapned about the Altar, and his hand, and aſſured him, that he accounted him a true and divine Prophet, and one ſent by God. But the falſe Prophet began moſt maliciouſly to weaken his belief, and diſguiſe the truth of that which hapned by his perſuaſive words. For he told him that what had hapned to his hand, was only occaſioned through wearineſs, and the pains he had taken in bearing the Sacrifices; and after that he had a little reſted, that it came into his own natural ſtate again: and that the Altar being newly built, and divers great Sacrifices laid thereupon, it cleft in twain, and fell down through the weight of what was laid on it. Conſequently he declared unto him the death of him that had foretold theſe ſigns that were to come, and how he had been ſlain by a Lyon: for which cauſe he perſuaded him to think that he in no ſort was a Prophet, nor had the ſpirit of Propheſie.

A By ſuch like allegations he made the King believe that which he ſaid; and having wholly withdrawn his thoughts from God and good works, and the obſervation of Gods laws, he drew him to all wickedneſs and impiety: by which act of his he diſpleaſed God, and offended his laws, and ſought daily after no other thing, than to invent ſome new and curſed wickedneſs that was far more heinous than all that which before time he had attempted. This is all that at this time we have to write concerning Jeroboam.

2 Chro. 11,13. The godly Iſraelites return to Rehoboam. Ver. 18,19.20. Rehoboams Wives and Children.

Touching Rehoboam, Solomons ſon, (who was King of the two Tribes, as we have before declared) he built theſe great and ſtrong Cities, Bethleem, Itama, Thecos, Bethſor, Socoth, Odolam, Epan, Mareſa, Zipha, Adoraim, Lachis, Saraim, Elon, and Hebron, within the Confines of Juda. He built alſo other great Cities in the Countrey of the Benjamites, B which he walled, and placed Gariſons and Governors in every one of them, and great ſtore of Corn, Wine and Oyl: and generally in every City he made a great ſtore-houſe with all ſorts of proviſion, and victuals, with a great number of targets and launces. To him the Prieſts and Levites joined themſelves, who were diſperſed thorow Iſrael, who came and dwelt in Jeruſalem. For they could not endure to be obliged to adore thoſe Calves that Jeroboam had erected; and during the term of three years, they increaſed the Kingdom of Rehoboam: who being married to one of his own Line, had three children, and was afterwards married alſo to Maacha the daughter of Thamar daughter to Abſalon, who was of his Parentage likewiſe, of whom he begat his ſon called Abiah. He had alſo divers other children by other women; but above all the reſt, he loved Maacha C moſt intirely. He had eighteen wives married unto him according to the law, and thirty concubines; he had eight and twenty ſons, and threeſcore daughters, and declared for his ſucceſſor in the Kingdom, Abiah the ſon of Maacha, and committed all his Treaſures and ſtrong Forts unto his hands. But Men moſt uſually are corrupted by the flatteries of fortune, as appeareth by this King. For Rehoboam ſeeing his Kingdom thus increaſed, bent himſelf to all unjuſt and impious actions, and contemned the ſervice of God: the people alſo conformed themſelves to his impieties. For the life of the ſubject is oftentimes perverted, by reaſon of the corrupt and diſſolute life of their Princes; and thoſe that are inferiors, beholding the riot of their ſuperiors, will eaſily be withdrawn from all modeſty, and follow thoſe vices they profeſs, as if they had been their profeſ- D ſed virtues: for ſhould they do the contrary, they would ſeem to miſlike the actions of their Princes: And thus it hapned under the Government of Rehoboam, where the Subjects addicted themſelves to all manner of impiety: for they would not make profeſſion of honeſty, for fear of offending their Prince, in appearing to be more virtuous than he.

E BUT God ſent Suſac King of Egypt to take vengeance for that wickedneſs, which was committed againſt his Majeſty by Rehoboam, (whoſe actions Herodotus wrongfully aſcribeth to Seſoſtris.) For this Suſac in the fifth year of Rehoboam's Reign, aſſembled a huge Army of many thouſands, and brought them out againſt Rehoboam: wherein it is reported, that he had twelve hundred Chariots, threeſcore thouſand horſemen, and four hundred thouſand footmen. The greater part of theſe were Lybians and Ethiopians: breaking therefore into the Hebrews Countrey with this power, without ſtroke, he ſeized the ſtrongeſt places of the Kingdom of Rehoboam, and fortified them, and at laſt came and encamped before Jeruſalem. But Rehoboam and his Aſſociates, ſeeing themſelves begirt on every ſide by Suſac's Army, at laſt had recourſe unto prayer: yet could F he not move God to favor him with victory. For the Prophet Samæas threatned and told him, That God would abandon both him and his, in like manner as they had forſaken him and his ſervice. Which when they heard, they ſuddenly loſt their courage, and ſeeing no means to eſcape, they all of them began to confeſs, that God had juſtly forſaken them, becauſe they had offended againſt him, and perverted all his Laws. But God ſeeing them thus diſpoſed, and making confeſſion of their ſins, ſaid unto the Prophet, That he would not utterly deſtroy them: yet notwithſtanding that he would deliver them into the hands of the Egyptians, to the end that they might learn whether it were more difficult to ſerve God, or men. When therefore King Suſac had without bloodſhed or reſiſtance taken the City, and was received into the ſame by Rehoboam, he kept not thoſe Covenants that were made be- G twixt them, but ſpoiled the Temple, and took away with him thoſe Treaſures that were dedicated unto God, and the ſervice of the King, taking from thence innumerable thouſands of gold and ſilver, not leaving any thing behind him. Of this expedition, Herodotus of Halicarnaſſus maketh mention, (who differeth only in the name of the King) and ſaith that he aſſailed divers Nations, and ſubdued Paleſtina and Syria, and took many men priſoners without any reſiſtance; whereby it is manifeſt that he meaneth no leſs, than that our Nation hath been overcome by the Egyptians. For he ſaith, that in their gates, who yielded themſelves up unto him without making oppoſition, as an eternal Reproach of their Cowardize and Luxury, he erected Pillars which were figured with the ſecret parts of a woman. For King Rehoboam was the only Prince that ever yielded up the City without oppoſition. It is ſaid that the Ethiopians have learnt of the B Egyptians the uſe of circumciſion of the Prepuce. For the Phœnicians and Syrians that are in Paleſtine, confeſs that they have learnt it of the Egyptians. Jeroboams impiety.

Jeroboams ſon falleth ſick, his mother is ſent to Achias the Prophet.

After having related the end of Rehoboam, we muſt give an account likewiſe of that of Jeroboam. He obſerving no mean or end of his impiety, employed himſelf continually in making of Altars and high places, and preſumed to ordain Prieſts of the meaneſt of the people. But God with-held not long to heap the puniſhment of thoſe his impieties, on the head of him, and of all his poſterity. Whereas therefore his ſon Obimes was ſick, about that time, he commanded his Wife to lay aſide her Royal garment, and to apparel her ſelf like a common Woman, and afterwards to go to Achias the Prophet, aſſuring her that he was admirable for his knowledge in foretelling things to come, and had D foretold him that he ſhould be King: wherefore he adviſed her to go to him after the manner of a ſtranger, and enquire of him if her ſon ſhould eſcape that ſickneſs. Whereupon ſhe diſguiſed herſelf according as her husband had commanded her, and came unto the City of Silo where Achias dwelt; and as ſhe was upon entring his houſe, (notwithſtanding he had loſt his ſight through age) God appeared unto him, and told him that Jeroboams Wife came unto him, and all that he ſhould anſwer to her demands. At ſuch time therefore as ſhe entered into his houſe, after the guiſe of a common and ſtrange Woman, Achias cryed with a loud voice;

Enter, thou Wife of Jeroboam, wherefore hideſt thou thy ſelf? Thou canſt not hide thy ſelf from God, who had certified me of thy coming, and hath informed me what anſwer I ſhall give E unto thee. He therefore ſaid unto her, that ſhe ſhould return unto her husband, and certifie him of Gods anſwer to this effect: Of little and nothing that thou wert, I have made thee great; and having diſmembred the Kingdom from Davids poſterity, I have given it unto thee: But thou haſt forgotten me; and having forſaken my ſervice, haſt molten down new gods, whom thou honoureſt: wherefore will I exterminate thee, and aboliſh all thy poſterity, and caſt them off for a prey unto the Dogs, and the Fowls of the Air. For I will conſtitute a King over my people, that ſhall leave no one of Jeroboams Race alive. The people alſo ſhall have part of this puniſhment, and ſhall be deprived of this their fruitful Countrey, and be ſcattered amongſt the Regions on the other ſide of Euphrates, becauſe they have followed the impieties of their King, and adoring thoſe gods that were forged by him, have omitted to offer ſacrifice unto me. And F as concerning thy ſelf (O Woman) haſte thee, and certifie thy husband of theſe things; for thou ſhalt find thy ſon dead: for no ſooner ſhalt thou enter into the City, but he ſhall finiſh his dayes. He ſhall be buried with the lamentation of the whole people in general. For he only was good of all the Race of Jeroboam.

Ver. 17.

When Achias had finiſhed his Propheſie, the Woman ſtarted back, ſore troubled and diſmayed, through the danger of her ſon, and went lamenting onward on her way, to find out the King, not conſidering that the more haſte ſhe made, the more ſhe haſtened the death of her ſon, who was not to expire till ſhe arrived, and (according to the prediction of the Prophet) ſhe was not to expect to ſee him any more alive. When as therefore ſhe was arrived, ſhe found her ſon dead, as the Prophet had foretold her, and recited G the reſt unto Jeroboam.

Ver. 1. ad 9. Abias levied an Army againſt Jeroboam.

2 Chron. 13. 1, ad 4.

Ver. 5, ad 12. Abias oration to the Hebrews, wherein he upbraideth them of their ſuperſtition, and forſaking of their Religion.

BUT Jeroboam nothing moved therewith, levied a great Army, with an intent to make War againſt Abias, the ſon of Rehoboam, who had obtained his Fathers Kingdom over the two Tribes. For he deſpiſed him, becauſe he was young. Notwithſtanding the young King, who was no whit diſmay'd, (although he was inform'd of Jeroboams coming) with greater wiſdom than was common to his years, and beyond all expectation I of his forward Adverſary, levied an Army out of the two Tribes, with which he encountred Jeroboam at the Mountain of Samaria; where incamping his Hoſt near unto him, he provided all things in a readineſs that were requiſite for the Battel, and had with him four hundred thouſand fighting Men, but Jeroboam had twice as many. Now when the Armies were ranged, and expected orders to charge, Abias ſtood up in a certain high place from whence he might be ſeen and heard, and making a ſign with his hand, he required that Jeroboam and the people would firſt of all hear him peaceably; which granted, and each one attending in ſilence, he brake out into theſe words: There is none of you but knoweth, that God hath promiſed the Kingdom to David, and his poſterity for ever; I therefore greatly admire how you have revolted from my Father, to ſubmit your ſelves to Jeroboam K his ſervant, whom at this preſent you accompany, to war againſt thoſe whom God had ordained to Reign, and to take the Kingdom from them; the greater part whereof Jeroboam uſurpeth unjuſtly even at this day, and which, as I ſuppoſe, he ſhall not enjoy long. For God ſhall certainly puniſh him for thoſe Crimes which he hath committed, and which he continues daily to commit, and to the imitation of which he endeavoreth to ſeduce you that follow him. You have received no injury at my Fathers hands; but by reaſon that he was miſled by the ſiniſter counſels of certain wicked perſons, and ſpake unto you certain words which ſeemed harſh in your ears, you have forſaken him in your diſpleaſure: but, in effect, you have ſeparated your ſelves from God and his Commandments. Truly you ſhould have pardoned a young man untrained and untaught in Oratory, not onely for the rude words which he uſed, but although his youth and L ignorance ſhould have moved him to commit ſome churliſh and indiſcreet action and error, yet ſhould you have endured the ſame. For the obligations which you had received from my Grandfather Solomon, *ought to have prevail'd with you, to paſs by the defects of his ſon my father.
But you have had no regard of all this, neither then nor at this preſent, but led forth a great Army againſt us. But whereupon ground you the hope of your victory? Is it on your Calves of gold? Is it on your Altars on the mountains, which are witneſſes of your impiety and irreligion?
Is it your great number that ſurpaſſeth ours by far, that maketh you confident? Truly, the force of many thouſands is of no value, where the Army fighteth in an unjuſt quarrel. For in juſtice only and piety towards God, conſiſteth the moſt aſſured hope of obtaining victory over a mans enemies; which muſt needs be on our ſide, who obſerve at all times the ordinances of our M God, whom mens hands have not faſhioned of corruptible matter, nor the ſubtlety of a cunning King could forge to deceive a Commonalty, but ſuch an one, whoſe work is the beginning and ending of all things. I therefore adviſe you, that preſently you repent your ſelves, and that taking a better way, you deſiſt from your War, and acknowledge the Laws of your Forefathers, and thoſe Ordinances which have advanced you to ſo great felicity.*

Ver. 13.

Thus ſpake Abias to the people. But whil'ſt he yet continued his diſcourſe, Jeroboam ſent certain of his Soldiers by by-wayes to incloſe Abias within two ſtraits, before his followers could diſcover them. Now when Abias was thus incloſed in the midſt of his enemies, his Army began to be diſcomforted, and to loſe their courage: but he encouraged them, and exhorted them to put their truſt in God, who could not be incloſed by N his enemies: ſo that altogether having called upon God to aſſiſt them, and after that the Prieſts had ſounded the Trumpet, they thruſt in amongſt their enemies with a great ſhout, and God ſo blinded the underſtanding, and abated the force of Jeroboams Soldiers, that they fled, and thoſe on Abias ſide obtained the victory. Never was there War recorded by the Hiſtorians either amongſt the Greeks or Barbarians, that was purſued with ſo great a ſlaughter as the Army of Jeroboam: whereby it appeared, that this wonderful and admirable victory came from God. For they diſcomfited five hundred thouſand of their enemies, and took their moſt defenced places by force, and ſpoiled them. Bethel and lived, Jeroboam was never after able to raiſe any power ſince the loſs he received. Abias

the Kingdom, whoſe Mother was called Maacha: under his Government the Countrey H of Iſrael enjoyed a firm peace for the ſpace of ten years. This is that which we have obſerved of Abias, ſon of Rehoboam, the ſon of Solomon: Jeroboam the King of the ten Tribes dyed likewiſe, after he had reigned twenty two years, and Nadab his ſon ſucceeded him, at ſuch time as Aſa had already reigned two years. The ſon of Jeroboam governed two years, reſembling his father in impiety and wickedneſs. During theſe two years, he made War againſt Gaban, a City of the Philiſtines, and encamped thereabout to ſurprize it by force: but being betrayed by the treachery of a certain friend of his called Baaſa, the ſon of Machil, he dyed. This Baaſa taking poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, exterminated all the poſterity of Jeroboam: and it came to paſs, that they of Jeroboams Race that dyed in the City, were torn in pieces, and devoured by Dogs; and they that I were in the fields, were made a prey unto Birds, according as God had foretold by his Prophet. By this means the houſe of Jeroboam ſuffered a deſerved puniſhment for their impiety and wickedneſs.

He had an Army of three hundred thouſand men of the Tribe K of Juda, armed with Bucklers and Javelins, and two hundred and fifty thouſand of the Tribe of Benjamin, bearing Bucklers and Bowes. After he had reigned ten years, Zaram King of Ethiopia came out againſt him, with a great Army of nine hundred thouſand footmen, and one hundred thouſand horſemen, with three hundred chariots, and deſtroyed all the Land as far as Mareſa, a City of Juda: in which place Aſa met him, and ſet his Army in aray againſt him, in the valley of Saphath, not far from the City. Where ſeeing the great number of the Ethiopians, he beſought God that he would give him the victory over his enemies: becauſe he had not come forth againſt ſo formidable a power, but in confidence of his aſſiſtance, who had the power to make a few men ſuperior unto many, and the feeble to overcome the mighty. When Aſa had obtained at Gods hands ſuch a victory, and ſo great riches, he returned back again to Jeruſalem: and when he drew near unto the City, the Prophet Azarias came out to meet them, who ſtayed him, and ſpake after this manner: That ſith they had obtained from God ſo notable a victory, they ought to behave themſelves like virtuous men, and M ſuch as feared God, conforming themſelves unto his will in all things; aſſuring them that if they perſiſted in the ſame, God would give them victory over their enemies, and all the happineſs of this life: but if they forſook the ſervice of God, they ſhould fall into ſo great extremity, that neither true Prophet or Prieſt ſhould be found amongſt them, that ſhould inſtruct them in righteouſneſs; that their Cities ſhould be overthrown, and their Nation ſhould be ſcattered over the face of the whole earth, that they ſhould live like Wanderers and Vagabonds. In the mean while therefore, while they had time, he counſelled them to live uprightly, wiſhing them that they would not deprive themſelves of that favor which God bare unto them. When the King and all the people heard theſe words, they were very joyful, and every one was careful to ſerve God. A Prophecy againſt Baſa.

Now will I return to Baſa King of Iſrael, who (having ſlain Nadab the ſon of Jeroboam) uſurped the Kingdom. He made his abode in the City of Therſa, and reigned four and twenty years, ſhewing himſelf more wicked, than either Jeroboam or his ſon had been. He miſerably oppreſſed his Subjects, and by his blaſphemies diſhonoured the Name of God, who ſent the Prophet Gimon unto him, to foretell him, that his whole race ſhould periſh, and that his houſe ſhould be perſecuted with as many miſeries as himſelf had inflicted on Jeroboams poſterity: becauſe that having received the government O from God he ſhewed himſelf ungrateful unto him for his goodneſs, and governed his people impiouſly and unjuſtly: whereas juſtice and piety are both profitable unto thoſe that practiſe them, and well-pleaſing unto God. Moreover, in that he had conformed him-

H himſelf in his life, to the diſſolute courſe that Jeroboam uſed, and had given himſelf over to follow the ſame vices, he might deſervedly expect to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment. Although Baaſa heard all thoſe evils (that ſhould ſhortly fall on him and his poſterity, by reaſon of his wickedneſs) yet he redeemed not the time, nor endeavoured to obtain pardon of God, by repenting himſelf of his ſins: but he continued ſtill to engage himſelf further than before in all ſorts of wickedneſs, and became worſe and worſe, to the utter ruine and confuſion both of him and his houſhold. In the end he aſſembled an Army, and aſſailed Ramoth once more, which was a great City, ſome four Leagues diſtant from Jeruſalem; which he took, placed a Gariſon therein, and fortifi'd it, with a reſolution, from thence to make his inroads into Aſa's Kingdom. But Aſa fearing the invaſion I of his Enemy, and conſidering that the Soldiers who were left in Ramath, did grievouſly pillage the adjacent Countries, ſent Ambaſſadors to the King of Damaſcus with gold and ſilver, to induce him to become an Aſſociate in the War, and to renew that amity between them, which was begun betwixt their Fathers. The King graciouſly received thoſe treaſures that were ſent him, and made a league with him, and brake the truce which he had made with Baaſa: ſo that he ſent the Governors of his Dominions againſt thoſe Cities that were under Baaſa's ſubjection, with a commandment that they ſhould deſtroy them.

Baaſa ſurprized Ramath, and fortifi'd it.

Aſa inciteth thoſe of Damaſcus to invade Baaſa;

Of theſe they burnt ſome, and ranſackt others, amongſt which were Gelam, Dan, and Abelma. Which when the King of Iſrael underſtood, he gave over the fortifying of K Ramath, and with all expedition turn'd to yield thoſe of his ſubjects his aſſiſtance, who were aſſaulted by the Enemy. But Aſa in the mean while built two ſtrong Towns, Gabath and Maſpha, of the materials which Baaſa had prepar'd to build withall. Baaſa afterwards (prevented by death) had no more opportunity to make War againſt Aſa. He was buried in the City of Arſane, and his ſon Ela ſucceeded him in his Kingdom: who, after he had reigned two years, was traiterouſly ſlain by Zamri, a Captain of half his Horſemen. For whil'ſt Ela banquetted with Oſa, who was the ſteward of his houſe, Zamri wrought ſo effectually, that he perſuaded ſome of his horſemen to aſſault Ela, who at that time was alone, and deſtitute of his Guards, becauſe all his Soldiers were at the ſiege of Gabathan, a City of the Philiſtines.

CHAP. VII.

Baaſa's Off-ſpring being extinct, Zamri reigned in Iſrael; and after him Amri, and his ſon Achab.

AFter that Ela was ſlain, Zamri took the kingdom upon him, and wholly rooted out Baaſa's poſterity (according as the Prophet Gimon had foretold.) For after the ſame manner was his Family utterly overthrown for their impiety, as Jeroboams progeny was extinguiſh'd for their iniquity (as we have before declar'd.) For the Army which beſieged Gabathan, hearing news of the Kings death, and that Zamri had murther'd him, M and ſeized the kingdom, they made Amri General of the Army, and anointed him for their King: who raiſing the ſiege before Gabathan, came before the Royal City of Therſa, which he beſieged, and took by force. Zamri ſeeing the City deſtitute of defence, had retired himſelf into the moſt ſecret place of the Palace; where ſetting it on fire, he burnt both himſelf and it, after he had reigned ſeven days. Suddenly after this, the Iſraelites fell at variance amongſt themſelves, becauſe ſome of them thought to prefer Thaman to the kingdom, and others were wholly addicted to Amri; but they of Amri's ſide had the better: and being of the better ſort, ſlew Thaman, and made Amri Sovereign over the people. The thirteenth year of Aſa, Amri began his Reign, and was King for twelve years ſpace; ſix years govern'd he in Therſa, and ſix in Mareon, (which the Greeks N call Samaria) himſelf impoſed this name of Samaria, from the name of him whom he purchaſed the Mountain, on which he built this City. He differ'd in nothing from the other Kings his predeceſſors, but in that he was worſer than any of them; for there was nothing which he left unattempted, that by daily impieties he might alienate the people from God. For which cauſe God being diſpleas'd, exterminated him and his poſterity from the face of the Earth. This Amri dyed in Samaria, and Achab his Son was his Succeſſor.

Hereby a Man may eaſily perceive, what care the Divine Majeſty hath of humane affairs, and how he loveth the virtuous, and utterly rooteth out the vicious. For the Kings of Iſrael, through their impiety, in a ſhort and ſucceſſive courſe, the one after the other, O were cut off, and confounded with all their Families. But Aſa (King of Jeruſalem, and the two Tribes) living happily in the favor of God, for his piety and juſtice, attained to a reverend and old age: and after he had reigned one and forty years, he dyed a good death;

death: and after his death, Jehoſhaphat his ſon (whom he begat on his wife Abida) ſucceeded him; who, in all things that concern'd piety or fortitude, ſeem'd to emulate and equal his Grandfather David, according as it ſhall be declar'd hereafter. But Achab, King of Iſrael, made his abode in Samaria, and govern'd the Kingdom for the ſpace of 22 years, without any alteration of thoſe ordinances which his progenitors, Kings of Iſrael, had eſtabliſhed; but that he exceeded them daily in wickedneſs. For he imitated all their impieties, (but eſpecially the Apoſtaſie of Jeroboam) for he adored thoſe Calves that were erected by him; and beſides that, he added far worſe impieties than the former. He took to wife Jezabel the daughter of Ithobal King of the Tyrians and Sidonians, of whom he learnt to adore the gods of her Nation: for ſhe was a buſie and audacious woman, and ſo inſolent, that ſhe feared not to build a Temple in honour of Bell, the god of the Tyrians, and to plant a Grove furniſh'd with all kind of Trees, and to ordain Prieſts and falſe Prophets alſo, in honour of that god. The King alſo took delight to have theſe Men oftentimes about him, exceeding all other Kings before him in madneſs and malice. To him came a certain Prophet named Elias, ſent by Almighty God, that was born in Thesbon in Galaad, telling him that he fore-propheſied, That neither dew nor rain ſhould fall on the Earth a long time, until that himſelf, who was prepar'd to depart from him, ſhould appear again unto him: and binding the ſame with an oath, (for the better confirmation thereof) he retir'd himſelf to the Southward, where he liv'd by a certain River, from whence he fetcht his drink: for his meat was daily brought him by Ravens.

Ver. 4, 5. Crows feed Elias.

Ver. 9, ad 16. The widow of Sareptha entertaing Elias, neither flowre nor oyl fail.

Now when the River, through want of rain, was grown dry, God commanded him to repair unto Sareptha, (a City not far from Sidon and Tyre, and ſcituate in the midſt between them both) where he ſhould find a Widow-woman, who would furniſh him with food. As ſoon therefore as he drew near unto the gate, he ſaw a woman that lived by her labour, gathering of ſticks, and God gave him to underſtand that it was ſhe to whom he was ſent. Whereupon he came unto her and ſaluted her, praying her that ſhe would bring him ſome water to cool his thirſt; and as ſhe was ready to depart, he called her back again, and willed her to bring him ſome bread alſo. Whereupon ſhe ſware unto him, that ſhe had nothing in her houſe but an handful of flowre, and a little oyl, and that ſhe was come forth to gather ſticks, to the end ſhe might bake the ſame, and make bread for her ſelf and her ſon; and when they had eaten the ſame, they muſt needs periſh through famine, becauſe they had not any thing more left. Go, ſaid the Prophet, and be of good courage, and conceive better hopes; and when thou haſt prepared meat for me, bring it: for I tell thee, that thy flowre ſhall not fail nor thy pot of oyl be empty until God ſend rain upon the earth. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, ſhe approach'd unto him, and performed that which he commanded, and ſhe herſelf had ſufficient to feed upon, and ſhe gave the reſt unto her ſon, and to the Prophet: ſo that they wanted nothing, ſo long as the drought continued.

Menander maketh mention of this great drought, in the acts of Ithobal King of the Tyrians, ſpeaking after this manner: In this time there was a ſeaſon without rain, from the Month of October, until October in the next year after; whereupon the Prince cauſed prayers and ſupplications to be made, which were follow'd with great ſtore of Thunder. He built the City of Botris in Phœnicia, and Auzate in Lybia. Doubtleſs he expreſſed hereby the drought that hapned in Achab's time: for about that time, Ithobal reigned over the Tyrians, as Menander teſtifieth in his Hiſtory. The woman (of whom we have ſpoken heretofore, that entertained the Prophet) ſeeing her ſon fallen ſick, and lying ſenſleſs, as if he had been already dead, or yielding up the ghoſt, wept, and brake out into ſo great a paſſion, that ſhe forbore not to ſay, that the cauſe of her misfortune was, in that the Prophet was come into her houſe, and had diſcover'd her ſins; and that he had been the cauſe, that God for her puniſhment, had taken away her onely ſon. But he comforted her, and willed her to be of good courage, and commanded her to bring the child unto him, aſſuring her that he would reſtore him to life.

1 Kings 17. 17. ad finem. Elias reſtoreth the widows ſon to life.

Now when ſhe had brought him, he took the child, and carried him into his lodging, and laid him on his bed, and cryed unto God, ſaying, That ſince the loſs of her onely ſon ſeem'd to be but an unequal recompence unto her that had ſo charitably receiv'd him, he therefore beſought him, that he would command the ſoul to return into the body, and reſtore life unto the Infant. Whereupon, God having compaſſion on the mother, and being willing to gratifie the Prophet, and to the intent that no man might ſuppoſe that he came unto her to prejudice her, he reſtored the child to life, beyond all expectation. For which, the mother gave thanks unto the Prophet, ſaying, That by this means, ſhe was thorowly perſuaded, that God had ſpoken unto him. Not long after, he ſought out Achab, according as God had commanded him, to let him know that he ſhould have rain. At that time the famine reigned

The year of the World, 3040. before Chriſt's Nativity, 924.

H reigned over the whole Countrey, and there was great want of neceſſary victuals; ſo that Men did not only faint for want of bread, but the Earth alſo for want of rain, could not bring forth that which was requiſite for the ſuſtenance of horſes and other cattel. The King therefore calling Obadiah unto him, (who was the Maſter of his Herds) he commanded him that he ſhould each way ſeek out for fountains and brooks, willing him, that if he found out any graſs, he ſhould mow the ſame, and give it to his cattel for their ſuſtenance. And whereas by his command the Prophet Elias was ſought in divers places, and could not be found, he appointed Obadiah alſo to follow him. So taking both of them ſeveral ways, the King followed one, and the Maſter of the cattel another.

1 Kings 18. 1, 2.

Elias is ſent by God to propheſie rain to Achab.

Achab ſeeketh for Elias.

Obadiah concealeth and ſuſtaineth an 100 Prophets.

I This Obadiah was a godly and virtuous Man, who, when the Prophets were put to death, hid one hundred of them in Caves, and ſuſtain'd them with bread and water. After this Man departed from the King, Elias met him, and he ask'd Elias what he was? which when he had told him, he humbled himſelf on his face before him. Elias commanded him to go to the King, and to let him know, that he was nigh at hand. Obadiah ask'd him, Wherein he had offended him, that he ſhould deſire to put him upon an action that might occaſion the loſs of his life? For there was not any ſtreight, whither he ſent not ſome of his men to find out Elias, with charge, that if they found him, they ſhould put him to death. Now it may be (ſaid he) that whil'ſt I repair unto the King, the Spirit of God ſhall carry thee away; the King not finding thee here, and fruſtrate of his deſire, will revenge himſelf on me. K Neverthele ſs you may, if you pleaſe, ſave my life; and I conjure thee by the kindneſs which I have ſhewn to an hundred Prophets, ſuch as thou art, whom I have deliver'd from the fury of Jezabel, and taken care to preſerve in Caves, until this day. Notwithſtanding all theſe words, Elias commanded him to go unto the King, and to caſt off all fear, ſwearing unto him by an oath, how that that day he would make himſelf known unto Achab.

When Obadiah had told the King that Elias was at hand, Achab went out to meet him, and being full of indignation, ſaid unto him, Is it thou that heapeſt ſo much miſchief on the Hebrews heads? Art thou the man that art the cauſe of this ſterility? To whom Elias replied, That it was he and his race that were the occaſions of theſe miſchiefs, becauſe they had brought ſtrange gods into their Countrey, whom they adored; and had forſaken the true God, L who was and is onely to be worſhipped. He therefore willed him preſently to aſſemble all the people on Mount Carmel, and bring with him his Wife and her Prophets, whoſe number he reckoned up: the Prophets likewiſe of the woods, who were in number four hundred. When therefore all of them, being ſummoned by the King, were gathered together in that place, Elias ſtood up in the midſt of them, and ſaid, How long will ye continue in this uncertainty, whom ye ought to follow? For if you think that the Hebrews God is the true and onely God, why follow you him not, and why keep you not his Commandments? But if you think that the honour belongeth not to him, but to foreign gods, follow them. When Elias perceiv'd that the people replied nothing hereunto, he proceeded: For an undeniable proof whereby ye may be ſatisfied which is the moſt powerful, either that God which I worſhip, or thoſe falſe ones which M ye are perſuaded to follow; and which is the true Religion, that which I profeſs, or that which is profeſſed by theſe 400 Prophets, I will take an Oxe and kill it, and lay it upon the wood, without putting any fire thereto to conſume the ſacrifice; and they alſo ſhall do the like, and call upon their gods, and beſeech them to ſend down fire to conſume their ſacrifice: which if they ſhall do, and confirm the ſame by a miracle, then ſhall we know that they are true gods.

Ver. 17. Achab accuſeth Elias of impiety.

Ver. 21. Elias reproveth the ſuperſtition of the people.

This propoſal of his was generally approved. Whereupon, Elias commanded the falſe Prophets firſt of all to chooſe an Oxe, and to kill it, and afterwards to call upon their gods; and when it manifeſtly appear'd, that their prayer was of no force, Elias began to mock them, ſaying, Why call you not out upon your gods with a loud voyce? for it may be they are on ſome voyage, or elſe haply they ſleep. Whil'ſt thus they had invocated from N the morning till mid-day (cutting themſelves with knives and lances, according to the cuſtom of their Countrey) Elias that was to make his ſacrifice, commanded the falſe Prophets to ſtand aſide, and the people to draw near unto him, and obſerve, for fear leſt ſecretly he ſhould convey fire under the wood. When the people approached, he took ☞ twelve ſtones, according to the number of the twelve Tribes of Iſrael, and made an Altar, and digged a deep trench round about it; and afterwards heaping wood upon the Altar, and laying his ſacrifice thereon, he commanded them to fill four tuns with fountain water, and to pour it upon the Altar, that the trench might receive and drink up the water. Which done, he began to pray, and call upon God, beſeeching him, that it might pleaſe him to manifeſt his power unto his people, who had ſo long run aſtray: no ſooner O had he finiſhed his prayer, but fire fell from Heaven upon the Altar, in the ſight of all the people, and conſumed all the Sacrifice; ſo that the water was dried up. Which when the Iſraelites beheld, they fell down on their faces upon the earth, adoring one onely God:

God: confeſſing him to be the moſt mighty and onely true God, and that all other were A but vain and imaginary names of Idols, which were without holineſs or power; and laying hands themſelves upon their falſe Prophets, they ſlew them by the commandment of Elias. He willed the King alſo to depart, and take his refection, and to take care for nothing, becauſe he ſhould very ſhortly ſee that God would ſend him rain; and thus departed Achab from him. But Elias went up to the top of Mount Carmel, and ſate him down on the ground, leaning his head upon his knees: whil'ſt he thus ſate, he commanded his ſervant to get up upon a certain Rock, and to look toward the Sea, and to tell him if he ſaw any clouds ariſe in any part (for till that time the Air had been always clear;) His ſervant having often gone up to the top of the Rock, and told that he ſaw nothing, at length going up the ſeventh time, in deſcending, he brought him this news, that he ſaw B ſome black appearance in the Air, not much unlike to a mans footſtep. When Elias underſtood this, he ſent unto Achab, wiſhing him to retire himſelf within the City before the rain fell; who had no ſooner recover'd the City of Jezrael, but that the Air was preſently cover'd with thick clouds, and a vehement wind intermixed with rain, fell upon the earth, and the Prophet ſeized by the Spirit of God, ran with the Kings chariot as far as Jezrael a City of Aſſer. When Jezebel, Achab's Wife, had notice what miracles Elias had perform'd, and how he had ſlain her Prophets, ſhe was diſpleaſed, and ſent meſſengers unto him, threatning him in like ſort to revenge herſelf on him, as he had ſlain her Prophets. Which Elias fearing, fled into the City of Berſabe, which is upon the borders of the Tribe of Juda, bounding upon Idumæa: in which place he left his ſervant, and retired C himſelf into the Deſart: where, whil'ſt he pray'd God that he would take him out of the World, he fell aſleep under a certain Tree, and after he was awaked, he aroſe, and found bread and water ready prepared by him. When he had eaten, and was refreſhed, he went unto Mount Sinai, (where it is ſaid that Moſes received the Law from God) where finding out an hollow Cave, he entred into it, and remained therein. And being demanded by a certain voice which ſpake unto him, he knew not from whence, Wherefore he remained in that place, and forſook the City? He anſwer'd, Becauſe he had ſlain the Prophets of the falſe gods, and becauſe he had perſuaded the people that there was but one onely God, who ought to be honoured by all men; and that for this cauſe he was ſought for by the Kings wife, that he might be put to death. The voice replied again, and commanded him to ſhew D himſelf openly, aſſuring him, that he ſhould underſtand that which it behoved him to perform.

Hereupon as ſoon as it was day, he forſook the Cave, and perceiv'd the earth to tremble under his feet: and after all things were appeaſed, the voice which proceeded he knew not from whence, willed him, That he ſhould in no wayes be diſcomforted with that which he ſaw: for that no one of his enemies ſhould have power to hurt him, charging him to return unto his houſe, to the intent to proclaim Jehu the ſon of Nimſi King of the people, and Azael of Damaſcus King of the Syrians, aſſuring him that in his place, Elizeus of the City of Abela ſhould be Prophet; and that the wicked people ſhould be deſtroyed, the one by Azael, and the other by Jehu. When Elias heard theſe things, he return'd into the Countrey of the E Hebrews, and met Elizeus the ſon of Saphat at the Cart, and with him divers others, driving before them twelve couple of Oxen: he came near him, and caſt upon him his garment, and he inſtantly began thereupon to prophetize, ſo that forſaking his Oxen, he followed Elias. Yet required he, that before his departure, he might take leave of his Parents; which when he had perform'd, he committed them unto God, and follow'd Elias, attending on him, during all his life, like his diſciple and ſervant. This iſſue had the affairs of this ſo excellent a Prophet. But a certain Citizen, called Naboth, of the City of Azar, had a Vineyard near unto the lands of Achab, who requir'd him to ſell him the ſame, at what price he thought convenient, to the intent he might annex it to his own lands, and make them one poſſeſſion; wiſhing him, that if he would not ſell it him F for ſilver, to chooſe in exchange thereof, any one field of his which he liked beſt. Naboth anſwer'd him, That he would not do it, but that he intended to gather the fruit of his own land himſelf, which he had received as an inheritance from his father. The King no leſs troubled with the repulſe, than if he had loſt his own inheritance, would neither waſh, nor receive any ſuſtenance. Whereupon Jezabel his wife, inquir'd after the cauſe of his diſcontent, and how it came to paſs, that he neither waſht, nor eat: he told her of Naboths rude behavior, and how having offer'd all juſt and reaſonable compoſition, he could not obtain what he requeſted. Hereupon Jezabel willed him to be of good cheer, adviſed him to continue his ordinary entertainment, becauſe ſhe herſelf would take upon her to revenge him on Naboth. Whereupon ſhe preſently ſent Letters in Achabs name to the Go- G vernors of the Countrey, whereby ſhe enjoined them to celebrate a Faſt, and to aſſemble the people, charging them that in that place Naboth ſhould have a ſeat prepared for him, H him, by reaſon of his birth and quality; willing them afterwards, that ſuborning three falſe Witneſſes to depoſe againſt him, that he had blaſphemed God and the King, they ſhould by this means cauſe him to be ſtoned and put to death by the people. All which was performed according as the Queen had written, and Naboth (accuſed by falſe witneſs for ſcandalizing God and the King) was ſtoned by the people, and put to death. When Jezabel had tydings hereof, ſhe repaired to the Kings preſence, and told him, That he ſhould enjoy Naboths Vineyard, and disburſe nothing for it.

But God diſpleaſed with this her wickedneſs, ſent the Prophet Elias purpoſely to meet with Achab in Naboths ground, and to tell him, That he unjuſtly poſſeſſed the lawful inheritance of another, whom he had put to death. As ſoon as the King perceived that he came I unto him, ſuppoſing it to be unſeemly for a King to be reproved, he firſt of all confeſſed his fault, and offer'd him to make reſtitution according as he ſhould think fit. Then did the Prophet foretell, That in the ſame place where Naboths Carcaſs was conſumed by Dogs, that both his and his Queens blood ſhould be ſhed, and that all his Race ſhould be deſtroyed; for that they durſt commit ſuch an impiety, and ſo wickedly murder (againſt all Law) ſo good and innocent a man. Theſe words made ſo great an impreſſion upon Achab, that he repented him of the offence he had committed: ſo that apparelling himſelf in ſackcloth, and walking barefoot, he taſted not any meat, but confeſſed his ſins, with hopes to appeaſe Gods wrath. Whereupon God certified him by the Prophet, That during his life-time, the puniſhment of his Race ſhould be deferred, becauſe he had repented him of his miſdeeds: but that K the threats and menaces ſhould take effect in his ſons time.

Adad King of Damaſcus and Syria, fighteth two ſeveral Battels with Achab, and is overthrown by him.

WHileſt Achabs affairs were after this manner diſpoſed, the ſon of Adad (that reigned over the Syrians, and thoſe of Damaſcus) aſſembled the Forces of his whole Countrey, and aſſociated with him two and thirty other Kings, with whom he came and made War againſt Achab. Who being far inferior to him in power, came not into the L open field to bid him battel, but cloſing up his Soldiers in his ſtrongeſt Cities, he himſelf retired into Samaria, (which was begirt with a very ſtrong wall, and very hard to be taken.) For which cauſe the Syrian (taking his Army with him) came to Samaria, and encamping before it, intended to batter the City. But firſt of all he ſent a Herald to Achab, to require him to give audience to his Ambaſſadors which he would ſend unto him, by whom he ſhould be certified what his reſolution was. As ſoon as the King of Iſrael had granted them free acceſs, the Ambaſſadors came, and (according to the Kings directions) required that Achabs goods, his children and wife ſhould be at Adads command: which if he would yield to, and ſuffer him to take ſo many as he pleaſed, he would raiſe the ſiege, and batter the City no more. Achab gave the Ambaſſadors order M to certifie the King of Syria, that both himſelf, and all whatſoever was his, was at his command. Upon which anſwer, the King ſent a ſecond meſſage unto Achab, enjoining him the next day to admit ſuch of his ſervants as he ſhould ſend unto him, to ſearch his Royal Palace, and the houſes of his friends and kinſmen, and take from thence that which they liked beſt.

1 Kings 20. 1, ad 1. Adab's War againſt Achab.

The Syrians Embaſſage to Achab.

Achab amazed at this ſecond Embaſſage of the King of Syria, aſſembled his People, and let them know, that he was ready to deliver up into the Enemies hands his wives and children, for their ſafety and repoſe, and to abandon all that likewiſe which was in his poſſeſſion; (for the Syrian had demanded no leſs at his hands in his firſt Embaſſage:) But that now he required that his Servants might be admitted to ranſack all their houN ſes, to the end they may leave nothing therein that was of any value, making it hereby appear to the World, that he had no intent to make Peace, ſince that after the Syrian was ſenſible that Achabs tenderneſs for his Subjects ſecurity, had prevail'd ſo far with him, as to grant him whatſoever belonged peculiarly to himſelf, he ſought nevertheleſs an occaſion of a breach, by demanding liberty to ſeize upon their Proprieties; notwithſtanding that he would do whatſoever they ſhould think good of. To this the People anſwer'd, That they could not endure that any of his demands ſhould be liſtened unto, or reſpected; but that the King ſhould prepare for War. Whereupon he called for the Ambaſſadors, and diſmiſſed them with this anſwer, That they ſhould report unto their Maſter, that Achab agreed unto thoſe things which were required, (becauſe he deſired the happineſs of his Subjects:) but O touching his ſecond demand, that he would no wayes condeſcend thereunto: and thus ſent he them away. When Adad heard this anſwer, he was moved, and ſent unto Achab the third time, threatning him, That his Soldiers ſhould make a bulwark higher than the walls (be ſo much truſted in) yea, though only each of them ſhould bring but an handful of earth with A them; (which boaſt he uſed to terrifie him, and to expreſs thereby how great a multitude of Men he had to oppoſe againſt him.) But Achab anſwered, That he ought not to glory in his Army, but in thoſe actions that ſhould determine the War. When the Ambaſſadors were returned back, they found the King at Dinner with two and thirty Kings his Allies, to whom they made report of Achabs anſwer. Hereupon Adad gave commandment to begirt the City with Paliſadoes, and to raiſe bulwarks of earth, and to ſtreighten the ſiege. Whil'ſt theſe things were in hand, Achab was grievouſly troubled, and all the People with him: but at length he grew confident, and caſt off all his fear, through the arrival of a certain Prophet, who ſaid unto him, That God promiſed to deliver all thoſe thouſands of Soldiers and his Enemies, which he beheld, into his hands. The ſame Prophet B being afterwards asked, By whoſe means this victory might be gained? He ſaid, That it ſhould be by the Sons of the Governors, whom the King himſelf ſhould lead forth. Achab therefore calling unto him the Governors Sons, found that their number amounted to 232; and having notice that the Syrians intended nought elſe but pleaſure and banquetting, he opened the City-gates, and ſent theſe young Men out againſt them. Now when the Centinels of the adverſe part had diſcovered them, they certified Adad thereof, who ſent out certain Soldiers againſt them, commanding them, That if they were come out in warlike ſort to bid the Battel, they ſhould bring them unto him faſt bound; and if they came in peace, they ſhould do the like. Now Achab had within the City ranged another Army, and kept them in a readineſs. When therefore the young men had charged the Syrian guard, and ſlain C a great number of them, and had purſued the reſt even unto their own Camp, Achab ſpying his preſent victory and advantage, cauſed his whole Army to ſally forth; who giving an unexpected charge upon the enemies, diſcomfited the Syrians, (who little expected ſuch a ſtratagem from the Hebrews) and aſſailed them diſarmed and drunken: ſo that they left both armor and weapons behind them, and fled from their Camp; and their King likewiſe was ſo hotly purſued, that he ſcarcely had opportunity to ſave himſelf by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe. Achab made a long chaſe in following the Syrians, and ſlaughtering them that fled; he ſpoiled their Camp likewiſe, and carried thence great riches, and an huge quantity of gold and ſilver. He took Adabs Chariots and Horſes alſo, and with them returned back into the City. D

Ver. 23, ad 27. Adad's ſecond expedition againſt the Iſraelites.

But whereas by the advice of the ſaid Prophet, he was perſuaded to prepare and keep an Army in readineſs againſt the next year, (for that the Syrians were reſolved to aſſault him again) the King omitted no preparation that concerned the War. For Adad (being eſcaped from the fight with thoſe few Forces that remained after the battel) conſulted with his friends, how he might war againſt the Iſraelites. Who adviſed him from thenceforth, never more to fight with them in mountainous places, for that their God was powerful upon the Mountains, and for that cauſe they had been overcome by them: but if he fought with them in the Plain, both he and his ſhould be aſſured to have the upper hand.
Moreover they counſelled him, that he ſhould diſmiſs thoſe Kings that he had confederated with him, to the end that each of them might return into his own Countrey, and that E in their ſtead he ſhould retain their Forces, over which he ſhould ordain Chieftains; beſides, to ſupply their places that were loſt) they adviſed him to levy Horſemen and Chariots thorow all his Countrey. Adab ſuppoſing that they had diſcreetly counſelled him in this matter, ordered his Army according as they had adviſed. And as ſoon as the Spring was come, he aſſembled his Army, and led them forth againſt the Iſraelites; and coming near unto the City of Aphec, he encamped in a plain field. But Achab with his Forces marching out to meet him, pitched his Tents near unto him, although he were far inferiour both in force and number. To him the Prophet appeared again, telling him, That God would once more give him the victory, to make it known, that his power was not only in the Mountains (as the Syrians perſuaded themſelves) but in the Plains alſo. Thus continued F both the Armies, and encamped the one againſt the other, for the ſpace of ſix dayes.
On the ſeventh, when the Enemy forſook their Trenches early in the morning, and placed themſelves in battel-array, Achab drew out his Army, and faced them and preſently charged them: where after a long and dangerous fight between them, the Enemies were put to flight, and many of them ſlain in the chaſe. For ſome of them were intangled with their own Chariots, others ſlew thoſe of their own party, and ſome few of them found the means to flie unto their City of Aphec, who periſhed likewiſe to the number of Seven and twenty thouſand (being ſlain by the walls that fell upon them) beſides One hundred thouſand men that periſhed in the fight. But Adad, attended by ſome of his principal Officers, went and hid himſelf in a Cave under the ground; and they representing G unto him, that the Kings of Iſrael were merciful, and that there was hope of pardon to be had (if after the manner of Suppliants they ſent unto him) Adad permitted them. Whereupon they incontinently preſented themſelves to Achab cloathed in

After this Treaty confirmed by oath, Achab gave him many worthy Preſents, and ſent him back into his kingdom. Thus ended the War betwixt Adad and the King of the Iſraelites. After this, a certain Prophet called Micheas, came unto another Iſraelite, commanding him to wound him upon the head, aſſuring him, That God was ſo pleaſed, and had ſo commanded him. When this Iſraelite would in no ſort condeſcend hereunto, he propheſied unto him, That ſince he had diſobeyed Gods commandment, K he ſhould meet with a Lyon, which ſhould rent him in pieces. Which coming to paſs, according as it was foretold, the Prophet addreſſed himſelf again unto another, commanding him to do the like: and when he had wounded him in the head, he bound up the wound, and came unto the King, telling him, That he had been in the Wars, and had received a Priſoner in charge from his Captains hands, and that (his Priſoner being fled from him) he feared leſt he that had committed him to his charge, ſhould for that cauſe take his life from him; the rather, for that he threatned no leſs. Achab anſwer'd him, That he was juſtly condemned. Whereupon Micheas diſcover'd his head, and made it known who he was. And to this intent uſed the Prophet this artifice, that his words might be of greater force and value. For he told the King, That God would chaſtiſe him, becauſe he had permitted the blaſphemer L Adad to depart unpuniſhed; aſſuring him, That God would cauſe him to be ſlain by Adad, and ſuffer the people of Iſrael to be ſlaughtered by the Syrian Army. The King diſpleaſed with the liberty and free ſpeech of the Prophet, commanded him to be caſt into Priſon; and being vehemently affrighted with this his Prediction, he departed home unto his houſe.

Hitherto have we ſpoken of Achab, but now I muſt return unto Jehoſhaphat King of Jeruſalem; who having enlarged his kingdom, and planted Gariſons in thoſe Cities that were ſubject unto him, (and in thoſe likewiſe which his Grandfather Abiah had poſſeſſed in the Tribe of Ephraim, at ſuch time as Jeroboam reigned over the ten Tribes) the King had perpetual aſſiſtance and favour at Gods hands, in that he was a juſt and virtuous Prince, ſtudying day and night for nothing more, than how he might pleaſe and honour God. The Kings his Neighbors round about him, honour'd him with Preſents: ſo that his riches and reputation were very great.

N In the third year of his Reign, he aſſembled the Governors and Prieſts of his Countrey, enjoining them to ride their Circuit about the Provinces, and to teach the Inhabitants of every City the Law of Moſes, training them up in the obſervance thereof, and in the ſtudy of piety. Which all the Citizens embraced and entertained ſo willingly, that they ſeemed to emulate and ſtrive one with the other, which of them ſhould exceed the reſt in the ſervice of God. The Nations likewiſe that dwelt round about him, loved Jehoſhaphat, and were at peace with him. The Philiſtines alſo payed thoſe Tributes which were impoſed on them. And the Arabians furniſh'd him every year with ſix hundred and threeſcore Lambs, and the like number of Horſes. He fortified alſo other great Cities of importance, and made preparation of Munition of War and Arms againſt the O Enemy. He muſtered in the Tribe of Juda Three hundred thouſand Men, over whom he placed Edraus General, and Two hundred thouſand under the conduct of Johanan, who beſides theſe had Two hundred thouſand Archers on foot of the Tribe of Benjamin.

HEreupon Achab called for the Prophets, (who were in number four hundred) and commanded them to enquire of God, Whether he would give him the victory in that War which he undertook againſt Adad? And whether he ſhould recover the City which he intended to beſiege? Who anſwered and counſelled him to hazard the Battel: For he ſhould overcome the Syrian, and ſhould take him Priſoner as he had done before. Jehoſhaphat underſtanding by their words that they were falſe Prophets, asked Achab, If he had not any other Prophet of God, who might more exactly certifie him of that which ſhould follow? Achab anſwered, That he had one as yet remaining, but that he hated him, becauſe he propheſied nought elſe but miſhap and miſery unto him, and had foretold him, That if he ſhould fight againſt the Syrians, he ſhould be overcome and ſlain; and for that cauſe he held him at that time in D Priſon, ſignifying unto him, that his name was Micheas the ſon of Imlah. Jehoſhaphat deſired that he might be brought into his preſence, which was accordingly performed by one of his Eunuchs; who by the way certified Micheas, That all the other Prophets had propheſied to the King victory. But Micheas told him, That it was not lawful for him to lye againſt God, but that it concerned him to ſpeak that which God ſhould inform him of, concerning the King. As ſoon as he came before Achab, and was adjured to ſpeak the truth, he ſaid, That God had ſhewed him the Iſraelites put to flight, and diſperſed by the Syrians, that purſued them no otherwiſe than ſheep without their ſhepherd. All which ſignifieth no leſs, (ſaid he) but that the reſt of the people returning home in ſafety, Achab only ſhould be ſlain in the battel.
When Micheas had ſpoken after this manner, Achab turning himſelf towards Jehoſhaphat, E ſaid unto him, I told you before, how this fellow was affected towards me. But Micheas conſtantly avowed, That he propheſied nothing but that which God had commanded him to ſpeak, aſſuring Achab that he was ſollicited by the falſe Prophets unto War, under hope of victory, whereas he ſhould aſſuredly periſh in the Battel. Theſe words of his made Achab much diſcomforted. But Sedechias, one of the falſe Prophets, ſtepped forth, and exhorted him to ſet light by Micheas's words, becauſe he ſpake untruly. And for confirmation of this, he appealed to Elias, (who was a far more skilful Prophet in foretelling things to come, than Micheas was) yet that the ſame Elias had foretold, that the Dogs ſhould lick Achabs blood in the City of Jezrael in the field of Naboth, becauſe Naboth had been ſtoned to death at the inſtance of Achab. Whereby it appeared manifeſtly, that ſince he contradicted a Prophet ſo F excellent as he was, he lyed, in ſaying that the King ſhould dye within three dayes. Moreover, (ſaid he) it ſhall appear whether he be truly ſent from God or no, if as ſoon as he ſhall receive a buffet from me, he cauſe my hand to wither, according as Jadon made Jeroboams hand ſhrink, at ſuch time as he thought to apprehend him. For I think (ſaid he) O King, that thou art aſſuredly informed hereof: which ſaid, he ſtruck him; and becauſe no inconveniency fell upon him, by reaſon of that his audacious attempt, Achab aſſured himſelf, and recovered his courage, and ſet forth againſt the Aſſyrian Army. For as it is to be ſuppoſed, the Will of God was ſuch, that it cauſed the falſe Prophets to triumph over the true: which was the cauſe that the falſe Prophets were truſted more than the true, to the intent that Gods preordained Will might be fulfilled. G But Sedechias made him iron horns, and ſaid unto Achab, that God by them ſignified unto him, that he ſhould lay waſte all Syria; but Micheas propheſied to the contrary, that within

H within very few days Sedechias ſhould walk from Cave to Cave to hide himſelf, and avoid the puniſhment of his falſhood. Achab diſpleaſed hereat, commanded that he ſhould be led thence, and kept Priſoner with Achmon the Governor of the City, allowing him nothing but bread and water for his ſuſtenance. Thus marched theſe two Kings with their Armies againſt Ramath which is in Galaad: which when the King of Syria underſtood, he drew his Army into the field, and came out to meet them, and encamped near unto Ramath. Now it was concluded betwixt theſe two confederate Kings, that Achab ſhould enter the battel in a private habit, and Jehoſhaphat ſhould be inveſted with the Royal ornaments, and ſupply Achabs place, to the intent that Micheas prediction might be made fruſtrate. But notwithſtanding this diſguiſe, Gods juſtice prevented him: for Adad King I of Syria commanded his Army, that they ſhould put no one of the Enemy to the ſword, but only the King of Iſrael.

Achab and Jehoſaphat War againſt the Syrians.

As ſoon as the battel was begun, the Syrians perceiving Jehoſhaphat in the front of the Army, and conjecturing that it was Achab, they made head all together againſt him, and having invironed and preſſed him very nearly, they perceived that it was not he: for which cauſe they retired back again. But although they had fought from the morning until the evening, and had the upper hand; yet ſlew they no man (becauſe they ſought after no other but Achab to put him to the ſword) whom notwithſtanding they could by no means meet withall. At length, one of Adads ſervants called Aman, ſhot at random amongſt the Enemies, and hurt Achab in the breaſt, and ſhot him thorow the lungs.
K This hurt of his concealed he from his Soldiers, for fear leſt they ſhould be diſcomforted.
For which cauſe, he commanded his ſervant to drive his Chariot out of the battel, for that he felt himſelf mortally wounded: and although he were in much pain, yet ſate he in his Chariot until Sun-ſet, at which time he gave up the ghoſt. When night came, the Syrian Army withdrew themſelves into their Camp, and receiving tydings by an Herald, that Achab was dead, every one retired home unto his houſe: but Achabs body was conveyed to Samaria, and interred in that place. As for his Chariot, it was waſhed in the fountain of Jezrael, becauſe it was bloody, by reaſon of the Kings hurt, whereby the truth of Elias Prediction was ratified and confirmed; for the Dogs lickt his blood, and from that time forward, the common Women continually waſhed themſelves in that L fountain: he dyed alſo in Ramath (according as Micheas had propheſied.) Whereas therefore all things fell unto Achab, according as two Prophets had foretold him, it appeareth that we ought to honour and magnifie the Majeſty of God, and to reverence his Propheſies, and to aſcribe always more credit unto them, than to the vain and plauſible ſpeech of flatterers; and no leſs to reſpect them, than things of infinite profit, ſince by them we are divinely admoniſhed what we ought to take heed of. It behoveth us alſo to conſider what force the Decree of God is of, by examining thoſe things which befell Achab. For it is impoſſible to avoid what God has fore-ordain'd, notwithſtanding that Men flatter themſelves with vain hopes, which inveigle them ſo far, that finally they are overtaken in the ſnares thereof. For this careleſs inconſideration was fatal to King Achab, M in that he believed not his death which was foretold him; but being deceived by the flattering perſuaſions of falſe Prophets, ran headlong upon his own danger and ruine. After him ſucceeded his ſon Ochozias.

Joram, Achabs Son, overcometh the Moabites in battel.

2 Chron. 19. 2, v. 2. Jehu the Prophet reprehended Jehoſaphat for helping Achab. Jehoſaphat reneweth the true ſervice of God. v. 5. Jehoſaphat placed Judges and Magiſtrates in every City.

AS ſoon as King Jehoſaphat was returned back again to Jeruſalem (from the War wherein he had aſſiſted Achab againſt Adad the King of Syria, as we have before related) the Prophet Iehu (in his return) came forth and met him, and reproved him, becauſe he had given Achab (who had been an impious man) his aſſiſtance, aſſuring him that God was diſpleaſed with that his confederacy; yet notwithſtanding that he of his goodneſs had delivered him from his Enemies, although he had provoked him to anger. After this admonition, Jehoſaphat began to offer ſacrifices, and thankſgivings, and peace offerings unto God: Which done, he rode in progreſs about thoſe Countries that were under his dominion, giving order that the people ſhould be inſtructed in thoſe ordinances which were delivered from God by the hands of Moſes, aud exhorted his Subjects to the practice of piety. He placed Judges likewiſe in every City, commanding them to execute juſtice without reſpect of perſons. He charged them likewiſe, that they ſhould not be corrupted with rewards, or ſeduced by dignity, riches, or Nobility; but that they ſhould do juſtice indifferently to all men, knowing that God ſeeth all things, how ſecretly ſoever they be carried or contrived. Having in this ſort ordered every thing in each City of the two Tribes, he returned again to Jeruſalem, where he likewiſe choſe Judges from amongſt the Prieſts and Levites, and the Elders among the people; exhorting them in all things to give upright and juſt judgement. And if they of other Cities had any cauſes of greater conſequence (which ſhould be referred to their final determination) he charged them induſtriouſly to decide them: for that it was very convenient that the moſt uncorrupt ſentences ſhould be delivered in that City, where God had his Temple, and the King made his ordinary abode. Over all theſe he placed his two friends, Amaſias the Prieſt, and Zabadias, of the Tribe of Juda. After this manner did the King order his affairs.

2 Chron. 20. 1, 2, The Moabites and Ammonits War againſt Jehoſaphat.

About this time the Moabites and Ammonites (with their confederates, a great number of Arabians) aſſaulted and aſſembled themſelves againſt him, and incamped themſelves near unto Engaddi (a City ſituate near unto the Lake Aſphaltites, and diſtant from Jeruſalem three hundred furlongs) in which place flouriſhed thoſe goodly and wholeſome

H ſome Palme-trees, whence diſtilleth the pure and perfect Balme. When Jehoſaphat had intelligence that the Enemies had paſt the Lake, and were already far entred into his Countrey, he was afraid, and aſſembled the people of Jeruſalem in the Temple, and ſtanding up, and turning his face toward the Propitiatory, he beſought and requeſted God that he would give him power to overcome his Enemies. For ſuch had been the form of their ſupplication, who in times paſt built the Temple: namely, that it might pleaſe him to fight for that City, and oppoſe himſelf againſt thoſe that durſt attempt or aſſault that place, to diſpoſſeſs them of that Countrey which he himſelf had given them in poſſeſſion; and in pronouncing this prayer he wept; and all the people likewiſe, both men, women, and children, made their requeſt unto God. Preſently upon this, a certain Prophet I called Jaziel aroſe up in the midſt of the Congregation, and cryed out, and aſſured the people and the King, that God had heard their prayers, and promiſed them to fight for them againſt their enemies, enjoyning them the next day to ſally out in Armes, and to make head againſt their adverſaries, whom they ſhould encounter in the mountain ſituate betwixt Jeruſalem and Engaddi, in a place called the hillock of Sis (which place in Hebrew, ſignifieth Eminency) willing them not to fight againſt them, but only to ſtay words, the King and all the people proſtrated themſelves upon their faces, giving thanks unto God; in the mean while the Levites ſung Hymnes, with inſtruments and voyces.

About the begining of the day, the King departed into the deſart that is under the City unto God, as if their Countrey were already delivered from their enemies.

This advice of the Kings pleaſed them all; ſo that they performed whatſoever he that ſuppoſing themſelves to be enemies one againſt the other, they ſlew one another in ſuch ſort, that of ſo great an hoaſt, there was not one that eſcaped. But Jehoſaphat looking down into the vally (wherein the enemies had pitcht their tents) and ſeeing it full of dead men, rejoyced greatly at the unexpected ſuccours that God had ſent him, who L had given them the victory, not by the dint of their own ſwords, but by his providence and power only. He therefore permitted his Army to pillage the enemies Camp, and to ſpoil the dead; and ſo great was the multitude of them that were ſlain, that they could ſcarcely take the ſpoils of them in three dayes ſpace. On the fourth day, the people aſſembled together in a valley, where they bleſſed God for the ſuccours he had ſent them, by reaſon whereof the place was called the valley of Benediction. From thence the King led back his Army into Jeruſalem, and for divers dayes he ſpent the time in offering ſacrifices and making feaſts. After this diſcomfiture of his enemies was publiſhed amongſt foreign Nations they were all of them afraid, ſuppoſing that God did manifeſtly expreſs his power, and extend his favour towards him. And from that time forward, M Jehoſaphat lived in great glory; He likewiſe was a friend to the King of Iſrael that reigned at that time, who was Achabs Son, with whom he adventured in a voyage by Sea, intending to traffique with certain Merchants of Tarſis, but he received great loſs: for his and for this cauſe he had never more mind to excerciſe Navigation. Hitherto have we

But as touching Ochozias, Achab's Son, who reigned over Iſrael, and reſided at Samaria, he was a wicked man, and reſembled his father and mother every way in his impieties, and was nothing inferiour to Jeroboam in wickedneſs, who firſt fell from God, and made the Iſraelites revolt from him. The tenth year of his Reign, the King of the N Moabites rebelled againſt him, and denied to pay him thoſe tributes which he was wont to pay unto Achab his Father. But it came to paſs that as Ochozias aſcended the ſtairs of his Palace, he fell down from the top thereof, and being indiſpoſed by the fall, he ſent to Accaron unto the god called Myiodes, or the Flie, to enquire whether he ſhould recover of that ſickneſs or no. But the God of the Hebrews appeared to Elias the Prophet, and commanded him to go and meet thoſe Meſſengers that were ſent by Ochozias, and to ask them if the people of the Iſraelites had not a God, that the King ſent to forreign

That he ſhould not eſcape that ſickneſs. Elias did that which God had commanded; and the

This Captain that was ſent, perceiving Elias ſitting on the top of a Mountain, commanded him to come down and repair unto the King, who had ſent for him; which if he performed not preſently, he threatned him to make him do it by force. Elias anſwered him, To the end thou mayeſt know by thine own experience that I am a true Prophet, I will pray that fire may fall from Heaven, and conſume both thee and thy Soldiers. And incontinently after Elias had prayed, lightning fell down from heaven, and conſumed both the Captain and his Soldiers. When the King had underſtood likewiſe how his ſecond meſſenger had ſped, he ſent a third; but he being a diſcreet man, when he came to the place where Elias was, he ſaluted him very courteouſly, and ſaid unto him, That contrary to his own will, and to no other purpoſe but to fulfill the Kings pleaſure, he was come unto him; and that they that were ſent with him, came not thither voluntarily, but by the ſame command: He therefore required him to have compaſſion both of him and his Soldiers, and to vouchſafe to C come down, and to come after them to the King. Elias being moved by his diſcreet and courteous demeanor, came down and followed him. As ſoon as he came into the Kings preſence, he propheſied, and told him that God ſaid, That ſince he had deſpiſed him, and ſo lightly accounted of him, as if he had been no God, or elſe ſuch an one as had no power to foretell him any truth touching his ſickneſs; but that he had ſent to the gods of Accaron, to enquire after the ſucceſs of his ſickneſs: know (ſaid he) that thou ſhalt dye. And not long after (according to the Prophecy) he dyed, as Elias had foretold him, and his brother Joram ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, becauſe he departed without iſſue.

Ver. 11,13. Joram asketh aid againſt the Moabites.

This Joram was a wicked man alſo, and as impious as his father: for abandoning the ſervice of the true God, he ſet up ſtrange gods. In all things elſe he was a man fit for D government. In his time Elias was no more ſeen amongſt men, and until this day no man knoweth what his end was. But he left a Diſciple behind him called Elizeus (as we have heretofore declared.) It is written in Holy Writ touching Elias, and Enoch who was before the Deluge, that they diſappeared: for no man hath known the manner of their deaths. After that Joram had taken poſſeſſion of the kingdom, he reſolved to make war upon Miſa the King of the Moabites, (who paid Achab his father before him the tribute of two hundred thouſand ſheep bearing wooll.) When he had aſſembled his Forces, he ſent unto Jehoſhaphat, requiring him, That ſince he had been his fathers friend, he would likewiſe ſecond him, and ſend him aid in his War intended againſt the Moabites, who had then newly revolted from his government. Jehoſhaphat not only promiſed him to afford E him ſuccors, but moreover he aſſured him, That he would draw the King of Idumæa (who depended on him) into their aſſociation. When Joram underſtood theſe things by thoſe whom he had ſent unto Jehoſhaphat, he took his Army with him, and repaired to Jeruſalem, where he was magnificently received and entertained by the King of that City: where, after they had concluded to march thorow the Deſart of Idumæa, and that way to charge the Enemy, (in that they expected nothing leſs than to be endangered on that ſide) theſe three Kings departed together from Jeruſalem, namely, the King of Jeruſalem, the King of Samaria, and the King of Idumæa. When they had marched ſeven dayes journey, they found a great ſcarcity of water amongſt them, both to water their Horſes, and to refreſh their whole Army, by reaſon that their Guides had led them aſtray out of F the High-way: ſo that they were in great want, and eſpecially Joram, who, by reaſon of the neceſſity wherewith he was preſſed, cryed unto God, expoſtulating with him for what offence of his he would deliver up three ſuch Kings into the hands of the King of Moab. But Jehoſhaphat, who was a virtuous man, encouraged him, and ſent into the Army, to know whether there were any Prophet of God that had followed them to the battel, to the intent (ſaid he) that we may underſtand from God what we ought to do: and whereas one of the ſervants of Joram ſaid, that he had ſeen Elizeus the Son of Saphat, the Diſciple of Elias, all the three Kings (by the perſuaſion of Jehoſhaphat) reſorted unto him. When they drew near unto the Prophets Tent (which he had pitched apart from the reſt of the company) they asked him, what ſhould become of the Army, and Joram eſpecially? G To whom Elizeus anſwered, That he had no reaſon to ſollicite him in this ſort, but to repair unto his fathers and mothers Prophets, who would certifie him the truth. Notwithſtanding,

H Joram intreated him, that he would propheſie, and preſerve the Army, and his life: but Elizeus ſware by the living God, That he would anſwer him nothing, except for Jehoſhaphats ſake, who was an upright man, and one that feared God. Afterwards calling unto them a certain Man that could cunningly play upon Inſtruments (for ſo had the Prophet commanded) whil'ſt he ſung, Elizeus was fill'd with the Spirit of God, and enjoined the Kings to make certain Trenches in the Channel of the River: For (ſaid he) you ſhall ſee the River full of water, without either wind, cloud, or rain; ſo that both the whole Army and all their Cattel ſhall be ſaved, and ſufficiently ſuſtained: and God will not only beſtow theſe benefits on you, but will give you the upper hand of your Enemies alſo; and you ſhall ſurprize the faireſt and ſtrongeſt Cities of the Moabites; and you ſhall cut down their Trees, I ruinate their Countrey, and fill up their Fountains and Rivers. When the Prophet had ſpoken thus, the next day before Sun-riſe, the River flowed abundantly with water: for three days journey off, God had ſuffered a very violent rain to fall in Idumæa, ſo that both the Soldiers and their Horſes were ſufficiently refreſhed and watered. When the Moabites were informed that the three Kings came out againſt them, and took their way thorow the Deſart, their King aſſembled his Army, and commanded them to keep the paſſages of the Mountains, to the end they might hinder the Enemy from entering their Countrey unawares. But beholding about the Sun-riſe, that the water of the River was blood-red, (for at that time it aroſe in the Countrey of Moab, and at this hour the water is red) they conceived a falſe opinion, that the three Kings being preſſed by thirſt, had K ſlain one another, and that the River flowed with their blood. Being in this ſort ſeduced with this imagination, they beſought the King to give them leave to gather their Enemies ſpoils: which when they had obtained, they altogether inconſiderately marched forth, as if to a Prey already prepar'd for them, and came unto the Kings Camps, with hope to find no Man to reſiſt them. But their hope deceived them; for their Enemies environed them round about, and ſome of them were cut in pieces, the reſt turned their backs, and fled towards their own Countrey; and the three Kings entering into the Territories of the Moabites, deſtroyed their Cities, pillaged the Countrey, broke down their Incloſures, filling them with ſtones and mud taken out of the River; cut down their faireſt Trees, ſtopped up the ſources of their Waters, and levelled their Walls with the L ground. The King of the Moabites himſelf, ſeeing himſelf purſued and beſieged, and that his City was in danger to be taken by force, ſallied out very valiantly with 700 Men, hoping by the ſwiftneſs of his Horſe, to break thorow the Iſraelites Camp on that ſide where he thought it was leaſt guarded. Which when he had attempted, and could not execute; becauſe he charged on that ſide which was beſt defended, he returned back again into the City, and committed a deſperate action: for he took his eldeſt ſon, who ought in right to ſucceed him in the kingdom, and ſet him on the wall of the City, and in the ſight of all his Enemies, offer'd him for a burnt-ſacrifice unto God. The Kings beholding this woful ſpectacle, were moved with compaſſion, and overcome with humanity, left the ſiege, and returned back again to their Countries. After that Jehoſhaphat M was returned into Jeruſalem, he enjoyed a peaceable Government, but lived not long after, but dyed when he was 60 years old, in the 25th year of his Reign, and was magnificently buried in Jeruſalem, according as the Succeſſor to Davids virtues and his kingdom ought to be interred.

CHAP. II.

Jehoſhaphat, King of Juda, left behind him divers children, the eldeſt of whom he appointed his Succeſſor in the kingdom, who was called Joram (as his Uncle was, who N was his Mothers Brother, and Achabs Son, lately King of Iſrael.) The King of the ten Tribes turning back unto Samaria, kept with him the Prophet Elizeus, whoſe actions I will here recite, becauſe they are notable, and deſerve to be regiſtred in writing, according as we have gathered them out of the Holy Scripture. The widow of Obadiah, (who was ſometime ſteward of Achabs houſe) came unto him, and told him, That he was not ignorant that in that perſecution wherein Jezabel ſought to murther the Prophets, her Husband ſaved one hundred of them, for whoſe private maintenance he had borrowed much money of other men; and that now being dead, his Creditors ſtrove to draw both her and her children into bondage: For which cauſe ſhe beſought him, in conſideration of this act, to have compaſſion on her, and to yield her ſome ſuccor. Hereupon Elizeus ask'd her, If ſhe had any thing O in her houſe? ſhe anſwer'd him, That ſhe had nothing but a very little oyl left her in an earthen Pot. Whereupon the Prophet commanded her to depart, and to borrow divers empty veſſels of her Neighbors: that done, he willed her to lock up her doors, and to pour

A oyl into the veſſels, becauſe it was Gods pleaſure to fill them all. The Woman did according as he had commanded her, and all the veſſels were found full, ſo as none of them were empty: whereof when ſhe had certified the Prophet, he adviſed her to go and ſell her oyl, and pay her Debts; and when all was paid, he aſſured her, that there would be ſome remainder, that might ſerve to ſuſtain both her and her children.

2 Kings 6. 9, ad 12. Elizeus adviſeth Joram to avoid Adads ambuſh, who lay in wait to kill him.

By this means Elizeus diſcharged the Widow of her Debts, and that trouble which her Creditors intended againſt her. He admoniſhed Joram likewiſe, by certain Meſſengers, that he ſhould take heed of a certain place wherein the Syrians lay in ambuſh, intending to ſlay him: by means of which admonition, the King went not out on hunting. But Adad being ſore diſpleaſed, becauſe his ambuſhment was diſcovered began to ſuſpect his own followers: whereupon calling unto him his houſhold ſervants, he maliciouſly B termed them Traytors; and furthermore threatned them with death, for that they had diſcovered a matter, which was onely committed to their truſt, unto his enemy. Whereupon one of the aſſiſtants told him, That he ought not to conceive that falſe opinion of them, neither ſuſpect that they had diſcovered his intended ambuſh to cut off his enemy: but rather that he ought to conceive, that the Prophet Elizeus had diſcovered all that which was intended againſt him. Whereupon he ſent out his Soldiers with an expreſs charge, to know in what City Elizeus made his ordinary abode; who returning back, brought him news that he remained in Dothaim: For which cauſe, Adad ſent a great number of Horſemen and Chariots to Dothaim, to lay hold on Elizeus, who begirt the City by Night, and laid watch round about the walls, that no Man might eſcape them. Early in the morning, C when the Prophets ſervant had notice hereof, and was advertiſed that the enemies ſought to ſurprize Elizeus, he fearfully haſted, and diſcovered their intent to his Maſter, who encouraged him, and commanded him not to be afraid, becauſe he was aſſured of Gods help: whereupon he prayed to God, that at that preſent he would ſhew his power and aſſiſtance both toward the relief of his neceſſity, and the confirmation and encouragement of his ſervant. At that time God hearing his prayer, repreſented to the Prophets ſervant a great number of Chariots and Horſemen that invironed Elizeus; ſo that he laid his fear aſide, and was aſſured, when he perceived theſe ſuccors. That done, Elizeus beſought God again, That he would blind his enemies eyes, and cauſe a thick cloud to fall upon them, to the end they might not diſcover him. Which done, he preſently thruſt himD ſelf amongſt the thickeſt of his enemies, demanding of them, Whom they came to ſeek for? They anſwer'd him, That they ſought for the Prophet Elizeus: he promis'd them to deliver him into their hands, if ſo be they would come with him into the City where he was. They being blinded in eyes, and depraved in their underſtanding, followed the Prophet willingly, who marched before them. When therefore Elizeus had brought them into Samaria, he willed King Joram to lock the gates, and to inviron the Syrians with his Soldiers. This done, he prayed God that he would open the eyes of the Syrians; and they being delivered from their blindneſs, perceived that they were in the midſt of their enemies. Whereat being ſore aſtoniſhed, and uncertain whence this divine and unexpected act had befallen them, King Joram asked the Prophet, Whether he ſhould kill them E with darts? But Elizeus forbade him to do ſo: For (ſaid he) it is a juſt and convenient matter, that they who are taken in War, ſhould loſe their life; but that they had done no evil unto his Countrey, but by Gods providence came thither, without their own knowledge: for which cauſe, he counſelled him to give them Preſents, and refreſh them, and afterwards to ſuffer them to depart without any injury.

Joram giving ear to the Prophets words, entertained the Syrians magnificently, and with great humanity, and ſent them back unto Adad their King; to whom, upon their arrival, they declared all that which had hapned unto them. Adad aſtoniſhed at this unexpected event, and wondering at the power of the God of the Iſraelites, and admiring F the Prophet whom God ſo wonderouſly aſſiſted, he concluded from that time forward, never more to attempt the King of Iſrael in ſecret, becauſe he feared Elizeus; but concluded to make open War againſt him, hoping to have the upper hand of his enemies, by means of the great number and force of his Army: ſo that he iſſued out with a mighty power againſt Joram, who ſuppoſing himſelf to be overmatched by the Syrian Army, locked himſelf up within Samaria, putting his truſt and confidence in the fortification and ſtrength of the walls thereof. Adad hoping to take the City, if not by force, at leaſtwiſe by famine, and default of things neceſſary, drew near unto Samaria to beſiege it. But Joram was ſo deſtitute of convenient ſupplies, that by reaſon of the incredible want of victuals, an Aſſes head was ſold in Samaria for 80 pieces of ſilver, and a meaſure of Pigeons dung at five pieces of ſilver, which they uſed inſtead of Salt: neither G was there any thing that more troubled the King, than that he feared leſt ſome one conſtrained by famine, ſhould deliver or betray the City unto the enemy. For which cauſe, he for fear leſt any one ſhould lie hidden within: and with all care and diligence he gave order, That if any one had ſuch a ſiniſter intent, the means to execute the ſame ſhould be taken from him. And whereas a certain Woman cryed out unto him, Have mercy upon me, O King; he incenſed with wrath, and ſuppoſing that ſhe asked him ſome meat, began to rail on her, telling her, That he had neither Grange nor Wine-preſs, whereby he might any ways

The Woman anſwer'd him, That ſhe had no need thereof, and that ſhe was not troubled for

Woman: whereupon he commanded her to expreſs and declare what ſhe required. Hereupon I ſhe ſaid, That ſhe had made an agreement with another Woman her Neighbor and Friend, that ſince the famine and ſcarcity was ſuch, as they could find no redreſs for the ſame, that they ſhould kill their children, (for each of them had one) and in this ſort ſhould nouriſh one another.
As for my ſelf (ſaid ſhe) I have firſt of all ſtrangled mine, and we have both of us yeſterday eaten thereof: but now ſhe will not do the like, but breaketh the accord betwixt us, and concealeth her child. Joram was grievouſly tormented to hear theſe words, and rent his garments, and cryed out with a loud voyce, and afterwards wholly enraged againſt the Prophet, he deviſed in his heart to put him to death, becauſe he prayed not unto God to grant him means to eſcape thoſe evils that invironed them round about: ſo that he ſent a Man preſently to cut off his head; who prepared himſelf with all expedition to K the ſlaughter. But Elizeus was not ignorant of this reſolution of the Kings: for ſitting at home with his Diſciples in his houſe, he told them, That Joram the murtherers ſon ſent a Man to take away his head: but (ſaid he) when he that hath the matter in charge ſhall come hither, ſuffer him not to enter, but make him attend and ſtay at the gate; for the King will follow him, and will reſort to me in his own perſon, having altered his reſolution: and they, according as they were commanded, ſhut him out of the doors whom the King had ſent. Joram repenting himſelf of that diſpleaſure which he had conceived againſt the Prophet, and fearing leſt he that had the commiſſion to murther him, ſhould ſpeedily execute the ſame, haſted himſelf all that he might to hinder the ſlaughter, and ſave Elizeus.
When therefore he came into his preſence, he accuſed him, For that he had not L beſought God to deliver them from thoſe many evils which they ſuffered; conſidering that he himſelf was an eye-witneſs, they were miſerably conſumed by them. Elizeus promiſed him the next day, (about the ſame hour that the King came unto him) That he ſhould have ſo great abundance of victuals, that two meaſures of barley ſhould be ſold in the market for a ſhekel, and a meaſure of flowre for a ſhekel.

By theſe words of his, the King, with all his attendants, were wonderfully comforted, and made no difficulty to believe the Prophet, becauſe that before-time they had been aſcertained by their experience of the truth of his Propheſies; and the expectation of this day, was the cauſe that the neceſſity and miſery of the preſent was more patiently endur'd.
But a certain friend of the Kings, and the Governor of the third part of his Army (on M whoſe ſhoulder the King at that time hapned familiarly to lean) ſpake unto him after this manner: Prophet, thou telleſt us incredible matters: for as it is impoſſible that God ſhould rain down heaps of barley and flowre from Heaven, ſo cannot that which thou ſpeakeſt come to paſs.
To whom the Prophet replied, Thou thy ſelf (ſaid he) ſhalt ſee the iſſue hereof, but ſhalt not

1 King. 7. 1, 2, 17, 18, 19.

It was a cuſtom in Samaria, that they that were defiled with a leproſie, ſhould live without the City-walls, for fear leſt their converſation might infect others: and at that time alſo there were ſome who for this cauſe had their dwelling without the gate. Theſe, for that (by reaſon of the extreme famine that reigned within the City) they received N no relief or ſuſtenance out of it, and whether they had licence to return into the City, or whether they contained themſelves in their houſes, they knew that they ſhould aſſuredly periſh by famine, reſolved amongſt themſelves to ſubmit themſelves to the enemies mercy, to the end that if they ſpared them, they might live; and if it hapned otherwiſe, that they might dye with leſs torture. Now having agreed upon this amongſt themſelves, they repaired by Night unto the Enemies Camp. At that time God began to terrifie and trouble the Syrians, and to fill their ears with a noiſe of Chariots and Arms, as if an Army had violently charged them. Whereupon they grew ſuſpicious, and were ſo moved, that they forſook their Tents, and ran unto Adad, and told him, That

doned their Camp, their Horſes, Beaſts of carriage, and riches, and betook them to flight, A with diſorder and confuſion. Thoſe Lepers that were retired from Samaria into the Enemies Camp, (and of whom we have heretofore made ſome mention) being near unto the Camp, perceived that there was great ſilence in the ſame, and no leſs abundance of all things: for which cauſe approaching the ſame, and entering into a Tent, they found no body therein: whereupon they fell to eating and drinking, and that done, to bear away a quantity of the rayment and gold which they took and hid without the Camp. Afterward reſorting to another Tent, they bare away likewiſe that which was therein, and did the like by four others, without any oppoſition: and conjecturing thereby that the Enemies were retired, they began to accuſe themſelves, becauſe they had not given notice thereof to Joram, and the Inhabitants of Samaria. For which cauſe B drawing near unto the Walls of the City, they cryed out unto the Watch, giving them to underſtand in what ſtate they had found the Enemies Camp, who told it to Joram's guard, ſo that at laſt it came unto his ears. Whereupon he preſently ſent for his Friends and Captains, and told them, That the departure of the Syrians, made him ſuſpect ſome ſtratagem or ambuſh: for they (ſaid he) having loſt their hope to ſurprize us by Famine, are retired, under an intent, that when we ſhall iſſue forth, and fall a ſpoiling of their Camp, they may come upon us, and kill us; and afterwards take our City, without any ſtroke ſtruck. For which cauſe (ſaid he) I adviſe you to keep good guard within the City, and let this retreat of our Enemies make us the more conſiderate.

Some of his Council approved of this advice of his, and allowed his foreſight, adviſing him to ſend out two Scouts on Horſeback to ſearch every quarter betwixt that and C Jordan, to the end, that if they ſhould be taken and ſlain by the Enemies ambuſh, their fall might give warning to the whole Army to ſtand upon their guard, (for fear leſt they ſhould be ſurprized in like manner) concluding that the loſs of two Horſemen would not be very great, ſince perhaps they might otherwiſe have been cut off by famine. This advice was allowed by the King, and aſſented to by the reſt: ſo that preſently there were two Spies ſent out, who rode along without encountering any Enemy; but they met with great quantity of victuals, and arms, caſt away and abandoned by the Syrians, to the intent they might flie away with greater expedition. Which when the King underſtood, he ſuffered the People to iſſue out, and ſpoil the Camp; who took therein D things of no ſmall value, much gold and ſilver, and troops of all ſorts of Cattel: and beſides that, they found ſo great a quantity of wheat and barley, that they could not hope or imagine the like. Thus were they delivered from all their precedent afflictions: for there was ſo great quantity of Corn, that two meaſures of barley were ſold but for one ſicle, and a meaſure of wheat-flower for a ſicle, according as Elizeus had propheſied. Now the meaſure which we call Sat, containeth an Italian buſhel and an half. But the Captain of the third part of the Army, was he onely that enjoyed no part of this benefit; for being appointed by the King to have the keeping of the gate, and to reſtrain the multitude from headlong preſſing out, for fear leſt thruſting one another, ſome of them ſhould be trodden under foot, and ſlain, he himſelf was trodden upon, and ſlain, (accor- E ding as the Prophet had foretold) for that he onely amongſt the reſt would not give credit to that which he had ſaid, touching the great abundance of victuals that they ſhould enjoy.

When Adad King of the Syrians was ſafely returned to Damaſcus, and knew that God had ſuffered ſuch a confuſion and fear to fall both on him and his Army, and that it had not hapned by reaſon that the Enemy ſallied out upon him; he was much diſcouraged, to ſee that God was ſo diſpleaſed with him, and through anguiſh and agony of mind, fell ſick: and for that (at that very time) Elizeus was come unto Damaſcus, Adad being informed thereof, ſent Azael (who was one of his moſt truſty ſervants) unto him, to preſent him, and conſult with him concerning his ſickneſs, whether he ſhould recover or F no. Hereupon Azael loaded 40 Camels with the faireſt and moſt honourable Preſents, that either Damaſcus, or the Princes Royal Court afforded; and repairing to Elizeus, ſaluted him very courteouſly, telling him, That he was ſent unto him by King Adad, to preſent him, and to ask counſel of him touching his malady, Whether he ſhould recover? The Prophet told him, That he ſhould certainly dye; but adviſed him not to carry the King any tydings thereof. Azael hearing thereof, was much grieved; and Elizeus himſelf began to weep, ſo that the tears fell from his eyes abundantly, in that he foreſaw how many evils the People ſhould ſuffer after the deceaſe of Adad. And when Azael demanded him the cauſe, wherefore he was ſo diſcomforted? I weep (ſaid he) for the compaſſion that I have of G the People of Iſrael, by reaſon of thoſe calamities which they ſhall endure by thy means. For thou ſhalt kill the better ſort of them, and ſhalt burn their ſtrongeſt Cities: thou ſhalt murther their Infants, and daſh them againſt the ſtones, and ſhalt open the Womens wombs that are with child.

Azael

The year of the World, 3207. before Chriſt's Nativity, 757.

H Azael anſwered, What force is there in me to execute theſe things? Elizeus ſaid unto him, That God had certified him that he ſhould be King of Syria. When Azael was returned back unto Adad, he ſignified nothing unto him but glad tydings, touching his ſickneſs: but the next day he caſt a wet cloth upon him, and ſtrangled him, and ſeized the kingdom into his own hands. This Prince was a man fit for government, and well-beloved among the Syrians, and common People of Damaſcus, who even until this day honour Adad and Azael his Succeſſor as gods, by reaſon of their benefits, and thoſe Temples which were built by them, which adorn the City of Damaſcus. For every day do they celebrate feaſts in memory of theſe Kings, and honour of them, by reaſon of their antiquity, not knowing that they were modern, and ſuch as reigned not paſt 1100 years ſince. But Joram, I King of Iſrael, hearing of the death of Adad, began to give over his fear, and caſt off that ſuſpition which he had conceived of him, rejoycing that yet at laſt he might have liberty to live in peace. The other Joram, King of Jeruſalem, (for he likewiſe was ſo called, as we have heretofore declared) by murthering of his brethren and his fathers friends, who were Governors, obtained the Kingdom, and became ſo wicked and impious, as he differed in nothing from the Kings of Iſrael who tranſgreſſed the firſt laws and ordinances of the Hebrews, and perverted the ſervice of God. For Athalia, Achabs daughter, (his Wife) taught him to execute divers miſchiefs, and, amongſt the reſt, to adore ſtrange gods. This notwithſtanding, God would not altogether aboliſh his race, by reaſon of his promiſe made unto David: yet he omitted not daily to introduce new K impieties, and corrupt the ancient laws of his forefathers. Mean-while it came to paſs, that the Idumæans revolted, and ſlew their King, who had been before-time ſubject unto Jehoſhaphat, Jorams father, and in his place eſtabliſhed another to their own liking. For which cauſe, Joram invaded Idumæa by Night with his Horſes and Chariots, and ſpoiled the Countrey round about his Kingdom, without paſſing any further: yet profited he nothing in ſo doing; for all of them revolted from him, and, amongſt the reſt, the Inhabitants of the Countrey of Labia. But ſo great was the fury of this Man, that he conſtrained the People to aſcend the high mountains, and adore ſtrange gods. Yet whilſt he behav'd himſelf in this manner, and utterly rooted out of his thoughts the laws of his forefathers, there was a Letter brought unto him from the Prophet Elias, which certified L him that God would do juſtice upon him, becauſe he had forſaken the wayes of his forefathers, and followed the impieties of the Kings of Iſrael, conſtraining the Tribe of Juda, and the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, to forſake the ſervice of their God, to ſerve Idols, as Achab had conſtrained the Iſraelites to do: Furthermore, becauſe he had murthered his brethren, and ſlain upright and virtuous men. The Prophet likewiſe certifi'd him by Letters, what puniſhment he ſhould ſuffer; namely, the ruine of his People, the death of his Wives and Children, and laſtly his own death: which ſhould happen unto him by a ſickneſs in his belly, wherewith he ſhould be ſo tormented, that his intrails ſtrangly rotting within him, ſhould drop out, and that he himſelf ſhould ſee his miſery, which ſhould be ſuch, as neither might be recover'd by medicine, or ſhould ever leave him, until M he had finiſhed his days. Theſe things did Elias denounce unto him by his Letters.

was ſtrucken with a long ſickneſs, according as the Prophet had foretold him; and God handled his body ignominiouſly; ſuppoſing, that being cut off in that ſort by Gods they that did otherwiſe, declared that they held him not for their King.

thither with a multitude of attendants, and told Joram that a Troop of Horſemen were at hand. Whereupon a Scout was ſent out to diſcover who they were; who drawing near unto Jehu, asked him what News there was in the Army? telling him, that the King was deſirous to know the ſame. Jehu willed him to take no care thereof, but to follow after him. The Centinel perceiving this, certified Joram, that the Meſſenger Jehu reigneth over Iſrael, and keepeth his Court in Samaria; and after him, his Progeny, to the fourth generation.

The year of the World, 3060. before Chriſt's Nativity, 940.

AT ſuch time as Jehu arrived at Jezrael, Jezabel being on the top of a Tower in her Princely Robes, cried out; O truſty Servant (ſaid ſhe) that hath ſlain his Maſter! He looking upward, asked her what ſhe was, commanding her to come down unto him: at length he charged her Eunuchs to caſt her down from the top of the Tower: in her fall, ſhe beſprinkled the walls with her blood, and as ſoon as ſhe came to ground I her body was trampled under the horſes feet, untill ſhe died. That done, Jehu repaired to the Palace with his friends, and repoſed himſelf there, commanding his ſervants that they ſhould bury Jezabel; (in reſpect of the Royal Race from whence ſhe was deſcended) but they to whom the charge of the obſequies were committed, found no part of her body, but her hands and head, for all the reſt was devoured by dogs. Jehu certified hereof, wondred at the prophecy of Elias, who had foretold that Jezabel ſhould die in that ſort in Jezrael.

v. 10. 30, 31. A famous example of Gods Judgement.

Now Achabs ſeventy Sons being brought up in Samaria, Jehu ſent two Letters, the one unto the Maſters of the infants, the other to the Governours of the City, giving them to underſtand, that they ſhould chooſe one of the moſt vertuous amongſt Achabs children, K to reign as King over them, becauſe they had a multitude of ſtrong Chariots, horſes, Armor, men, and ſtrong Cities; to the end, that in ſo doing, they might take revenge on thoſe that ſlew their Lord and Maſter. (This did he under a colour to ſound how the Samaritans were affected towards him.) When the Governors and Tutors had received theſe Letters, they were afraid, and made account that they could prevail nothing againſt him, who had prevailed already againſt two mighty Kings. For which cauſe they wrote back unto him, acknowledging him for their Sovereign; and offering themſelves in all duty, to be under his ſubjection. Whereupon Jehu ſent back unto them again commanding them, that (to expreſs their obedience) they ſhould ſend him the heads of Achabs children, divided from their ſhoulders. Which command of his they L failed not to execute, but preſently packed up the heads in panniers, and ſent them unto him to Jezrael. As ſoon as they were brought thither, tidings thereof were carried to Jehu, as he ſate at ſupper with his friends, who commanded that they ſhould be laid in two heaps, at the City gates, on either ſide thereof. Which done, he iſſued out as ſoon as it was day, to ſee them; and beholding them, he began to tell thoſe, that accompanied him, that he had voluntarily Armed himſelf againſt his Maſter, and ſlew him: but as touching thoſe whom they ſaw there, he had no wayes layd hands on them. His only intent was, that all men ſhould know, that all that which hapned unto Achabs race, was done by the ordinance of God, and that his houſe was deſtroyed according as Elias had foretold. And after he had ſlain and diſpatched both theſe and all thoſe that were M found to be of Acabs race amongſt the Iſraelites, he went unto Samaria: and meeting by the way with Ochozias houſhold Servants (who was King of Jeruſalem) he asked them, whither they went? who anſwered him, that they went to ſalute Joram and their King Ochozias, (for they knew not as yet that they were both of them ſlain.) Hereupon Jehu commanded his Servants to lay hands on them, and put them to the ſword, notwithſtanding, they were forty two in number. After them, he met with a virtuous man called Ionadab, (who in times paſt had been his ancient friend) who embracing him, praiſed his forwardneſs, in that he had performed all things according to the Will of God, in aboliſhing Achabs houſe. Jehu cauſed him to come up to him, into his Chariot, and accompany him to Samaria, telling him, that he ſhould ſee that he would ſpare no wicked man, N but would puniſh all the falſe Prophets, and tellers of lyes, and abuſers of the people, who had made them forſake the true ſervice of God, and adore ſtrange gods: becauſe that which is moſt acceptable to a good man is to behold the puniſhment of the wicked. Jonadab perſwaded by theſe words, mounted up into his Chariot, and went with him to Samaria; and after Jehu had ſought out Achabs kindred, he put them to death: and intending that no one of his falſe Prophets and Prieſts ſhould eſcape his hands, he aſſembled them together by a ſubtil policy. For gathering the people together, he proteſted that he would have twice as many gods as Acab had: willing that all the Prieſts that belonged unto them, ſhould preſent themſelves, for that he intended to celebrate moſt magnificent ſacrifices to Acabs gods; proteſting that whatſoever Prieſt ſhould be abſent, he ſhould loſe his O head. Now this god whom Acab honored, was called Baal. Having in this ſort aſſigned a day wherein he would offer ſacrifice, he ſent thorow all the Countrey of Iſrael charging all Baals Prieſts to repair unto him, and commanding that each of them

As ſoon as they were apparelled, he reſorted A to his lodging, accompanied with his friend Jonadab, and commanded that a ſearch ſhould be made amongſt them, to eſpie whether any one of a contrary quality or condition were mixed with them; for that he intended that no ſtranger ſhould be amongſt the Prieſts. When therefore he underſtood that none but the Prieſts were in that aſſembly, even at ſuch time as they began to offer ſacrifice, he cauſed them to be incloſed by fourſcore Soldiers (whom he eſteemed to be moſt truſty) commanding them to kill the falſe Prophets, and to puniſh them according to the cuſtom of their forefathers, which had already too long been neglected; dreadfully threatning all thoſe, who ſhould any wayes omit to root out the name and memory of theſe wretches out of the world. They therefore ſlew all thoſe Prieſts, and guarded the Kings Palace; and in ſo doing, cleared B Samaria of forrain gods. This Baal was the god of the Tyrians (for whom Achab built a Temple in Samaria, intending thereby to content Jthobaal the King of the Tyrians and Sidonians) to whom he aſſigned Prieſts, and honoured him with all ſorts of ſacrifice. After this Idol was exterminated, Jehu ſuffered the Iſraelites to adore golden calves. When this execution was performed in puniſhing the wicked, God (to whom this action of his was acceptable) told Jehu, by his Prophet, that his children ſhould enjoy the Kingdom of Iſrael to the fourth generation. This was Jehu's ſtate.

Athalia reigned five years in Jeruſalem: and after ſhe was ſlain by the High Prieſt, Joas is proclaimed King. C Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 7. 2 King. 12. 1, 2, 3. Athalia rooteth out all the royal blood, only Joas Ochozias Son is ſaved.

ATHALIA, Achabs daughter, hearing news of the death of her Brother Joram, and her Son Ochozias, together with the utter ruine of all the Royal poſterity, bethought her ſelf to extinguiſh Davids memory, and in ſuch ſort to root it out, that no one of that line ſhould remain alive to enjoy the Kingdom hereafter: which when ſhe had concluded in her heart, ſhe began to put in execution. Yet notwithſtanding, one of Ochozias Sons eſcaped her bloody hands, by this means. Ochozias had a ſiſter by his fathers ſide, whoſe name was Joſabetha, who was married to Joiada the High Prieſt; who entring into the Kings Palace, and finding Joas at that time but one year of age, hidden with his D nurſe among the dead, ſhe took both him and his nurſe, and locked them up in a cloſet within the Temple, where Joiada her husband and ſhe did ſecretly preſerve them for the ſpace of five years, during which time Athalia reigned in Jeruſalem over the two Tribes.

v. 4, ad 12. Joas by Joiada's means, who was the High Prieſt, is created King.

About the ſeventh year, Joiada conferred with five Centurions, and perſwaded them to oppoſe themſelves with mutual conſent againſt Athalias proceedings, and to ſecure the Kingdom for little Joas. Whereupon giving and receiving promiſes of ſecrecy the one unto the other, they confidently addreſſed themſelves to execute their intended purpoſes, after this manner. They whom the High Prieſt had choſen to execute this fact, went thorow all the Countrey, and gathered the Prieſts and Levites together, with all the Governours of the Tribes, and afterwards returned and brought them to Jeruſalem E to the High Prieſt, who made them take an oath, that they would keep ſecret that which he ſhould inform them of, as a thing that required ſecrecy, and men of courage and reſolution to perform the ſame. As ſoon as he had aſſured them by oath, he brought forth the little child whom he had till that time preſerved, and ſaid unto them: Behold your King, who is of that race, which (as you know) was choſen by God to reign over you for ever: I therefore think it fit that the third part of your Guard ſhall keep him within the Temple, and that the fourth make their watch round about the ſame. Another company ſhall have the guard of the great gate that leadeth to the Palace: as for the reſt of the people let them remain diſarmed within the Temple, and ſuffer no armed men to enter thereinto, except the Prieſt only. He appointed alſo another company F of Prieſts and Levites to be about the King, with Javelins and drawn ſwords, charging them that whoſoever durſt be ſo bold to enter the Temple armed, they ſhould preſently put him to the ſword, and laying all fear aſide, to attend the ſafety and guard of the Kings perſon. They being obedient to that which the High Prieſt had commanded them in effect expreſſed their readineſs: whereupon Joiada opening the Arſenal, (which in times paſt was prepared by David) diſtributed amongſt the Centurions, Levites and Prieſts, all the javelins, quivers, and all other ſort of Arms that were therein, and diſpoſed all them that were armed, round about the people, joyned hand in hand to hinder any one from entering in amongſt them that were not of that faction. Afterwards bringing out the infant Joas into the midſt of the company, they ſet the Royal Crown on his G head; and Joiada, after he had anointed him with oyl proclaimed him King: whereupon all the people rejoyced, and clapping their hands, cried out, God ſave the King.

Athalia

H Athalia hearing this noiſe and applauſe, beyond all hope, was greatly troubled, and with thoſe ſoldiers which ſhe had about her, ſhe haſtily iſſued out of the Palace; and coming to the Temple, the Prieſts admitted her: as for the reſt of the men of War that followed her, they that by the High Prieſts ordinance begirt the Temple, would not ſuffer them to enter with her. Now when Athalia ſaw the child ſtanding before the Tabernacle with the Royal Crown on his head, ſhe rent her garments, and ſtorming through deſpite, ſhe cried out and commanded that the Traitor ſhould be ſlain, that had thus betrayed her, and ſought to diſpoſſeſs her of her Kingdom. But Joiada called the Centurions and commanded them to carry Athalia out to the brook Cedron, and there to kill her (becauſe he would not permit that the Temple ſhould be defiled with her curſed I blood.) Moreover he charged them, that if any one ſhould attempt to reſcue her, they ſhould kill them likewiſe. Hereupon, they (that were appointed to execute this his command) took her, and led her without the gates of the Kings Mules, and there ſlew her. After that Athalia was in this manner executed, Joiada aſſembled the people, and the men of War in the Temple, binding them all by an Oath, to yield the King their faithful ſervice, and to procure the proſperity of the Kingdom. Secondly, he made the King ſwear in like manner, that he would maintain the ſervice of God, and in no manner diſanul Moſes Laws. That done, they ran unto Baals Temple (which Athalia and her husband Joram had built to the diſhonour of God, and their fore-fathers, and for the honour of Achab) and levelled it with the ground, and put to death their High K Prieſt called Mathan. The charge and guard of the Temple, Joiada committed to the Prieſts and Levites, according to the other eſtabliſht by David, with commandment twice a day to offer their ordinary burnt offerings, and to make perfumes, according to the Law. He appointed alſo certain of the Levites to be porters to guard the Temple, to the intent that no unclean thing ſhould enter the ſame uneſpied: and after he had ordained theſe things, with the Centurions and Governors, and with all the people, he took Joas and led him out of the Temple, and attended him to the Palace, and having placed him on the Royal Throne, all the people cried, God ſave the King, and banquetted and feaſted for divers dayes. Thus after the death of Athalia, the City was at quiet. Joas was ſeven years old at ſuch time as he was made King, his mother was highly affected the ſervice of God all his life time: and when he grew to mans eſtate, he married two Wives which the High Prieſt gave him, by whom he had Sons and Daughters. This is all that I have thought good to declare as concerning Joas, both how he eſcaped Athalias treaſons, and obtained the Kingdom.

which he foretold unto Azael, at ſuch time as he prophecied unto him, that he ſhould

Ioachas being in this extremity, had his recourſe to God in prayer and ſupplication,

About this time Elizeus the Prophet was very old, and fell ſick: the King of Iſrael came to viſit him, and finding him in the extremity, and paſt hope of recovery, he began to weep and lament, calling him his Father, and his armour, becauſe that during his life, he had never occaſion to uſe the ſword againſt the Enemy; but that by means of his predictions he had alwayes the upper hand of them without fighting: that now he departed this life, and left him diſarmed to the mercy of the Syrians, and other his enemies; ſo that he was not ſecure of liberty, nor life, but that he rather wiſhed to die with him than live in thoſe dangers.

Amaſias King of Jeruſalem.

2 King 14 1, 2.

The tenth year of the reign of Joas King of Iſrael, Amaſias reigned over the Tribe of Juda in Jeruſalem: his mother was called Judah, and was a Citizen of Jeruſalem. He was very careful to maintaine juſtice (notwithſtanding he was very young.) And having taken upon him the Government of the Kingdom, he reſolved with himſelf, that he ought firſt of all to revenge the death of his father Joas, who was traiterouſly ſlain by his friends: he therefore laid hands on them, and put them M all to the ſword (yet extended he not his diſpleaſure to their children, but conformed his actions according to the Laws of Moſes; which ſaith, that it is not lawful to puniſh their children for their Fathers offences.) He afterwards levied an Army of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, and choſe ſuch as were in the flower of their years, and about twenty years of age: the number of which amounted to three hundred thouſand men, whom he divided into Centuries. He ſent alſo to the King of Iſrael, and hired an hundred thouſand of his armed men for an hundred talents of Silver, becauſe he intended to make War upon the Amalechites, Idumæans and Gabelites. Now whileſt he made this preparation, and was in a readineſs to undertake this exploit, a certain Prophet counſeled him to diſmiſs the Iſraelites that he had with him, becauſe they were wicked men, N ſignifying unto him from God, that if he were followed by them in that War, he ſhould be overcome: and on the other ſide, that he ſhould have the upper hand over his Enemies if he fought with a few men, according to Gods direction. Hereupon the King was moved (becauſe he had already paid the Iſraelites their wages) but the Prophet ceaſed not to exhort him to do that which was pleaſing in Gods ſight, who would give him ſilver in abundance. Hereupon he diſmiſſed them, telling them that he freely gave them their pay; and he with the forces of his owne Kingdom marched out againſt thoſe Nations, and fought with them, and overcame them, and ſlew ten thouſand of them, and took no leſs number of Priſoners (whom he afterwards cauſed to be led to a high Rock that bounded upon Arabia, and from thence caſt them down headlong) and O from all theſe Nations he recovered a great booty, and brought home much riches.

to be injured by him, as if he had diſmiſſed them for want of courage, For which A cauſe they invaded his Country, and ſpoiled it as far as Bethſemer, and carried away a great quantity of Cattel, and ſlew three thouſand men. But the victory and ſucceſs made Amaſias proud, ſo that he began to forget God, who was the Author thereof, and gave honour to thoſe gods which he brought from the Countrey of the Amalechites. Whereupon a Prophet came unto him and ſaid, that he wondred that he ſhould eſteem them for gods, who had ſo little availed them who honoured them, and had delivered them into his hands, ſo that divers of them were put to death, and divers led away Priſoners, which they themſelves had brought unto Jeruſalem, according to the cuſtom of War. Theſe words moved the King unto diſpleaſure, ſo that he commanded B the Prophet to keep ſilence, threatning him to puniſh him, if he entermedled with his affairs any more. Who anſwered him, that he would no farther urge him, yet withall he fore-prophecied unto him, that God would not ſuffer this his innovation to reſt unpuniſhed. Anon after Amaſias (not able to keep a moderation amidſt his affluence and proſperity but waxing more inſolent againſt almighty God, by whom he poſſeſſed the bleſſings he enjoyed) in the height of his pride wrote to Joas King of Iſrael, commanding him to yield him homage according as in times paſt the Iſraelites were ſubject to David and Solomon; threatning him, that if he refuſed to do him ſervice, he would enforce him to decide the controverſy by Arms: to whom the Iſraelite replied thus King Joas to King Amaſias. There was in the mountain of Libanus a Cypres Tree of great height, to whom a little thiſtle wrote, demanding of him his Daughter in marriage for his Son. But C during this treaty, there came a certain wild beaſt, that trod down the thiſtle. Let this example admoniſh and diſwade thee from attempting of too mighty matters, neither grow proud of thy laſt victory, againſt the Amalechites, leſt through thy preſumption, thou expoſe both thy Wife and fortune to the uncertain hazard of War. When Amaſias had peruſed this anſwer of his, he was more inraged: (God alſo as it ſeemed pricked him forward, to the intent to chaſtiſe thoſe iniquities that were committed by him.) When therefore he had drawn his Army into the field, and both the Armies were upon the point to joyn Battel, a ſudden fear and diſcouragement ſeized him (ſuch as God in his diſpleaſure is accuſtomed to inflict) which made Amaſias Army turn their backs: ſo that (by the apprehenſion they had conceived) they were ſcattered before they came to handy ſtrokes; and D Amaſias being left alone, was taken priſoner. Joas threatned that except he perſuaded the inhabitants of Jeruſalem to open their gates, and to receive both him and his Army into the City, he would put him to death. For which cauſe Amaſias (conſtrained by neceſſity and fear of death,) wrought ſo far that his enemies were received into Jeruſalem, who made a breach of three hundred Cubits in their wall; thorow which Amaſias was led captive into Jeruſalem. In this manner Joas was made maſter of the City, who afterwards carried away the Treaſures of the Temple, and took away the Gold and Silver that Amaſias had in his Palace: and having in this ſort ranſomed him from captivity, he returned back again into Samaria. This hapned in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amaſias, who afterwards fled into the City of Lachis to avoid the conſpiracy E of his domeſtick friends, by whom notwithſtanding he was ſurpriſed, and ſlain: his body was royally intombed in Jeruſalem. Thus died Amaſias, for introducing innovations in contempt of God; he lived fifty four years, and reigned twenty and nine: and his Son Ozias ſucceeded him in the Kingdom.

BUt in the fifteenth year of the reign of Amaſias, Jeroboam, Joas Son, began to reign over the Iſraelites in Samaria, and enjoyed the Kingdom for the ſpace of F fourty years. This King diſhonoured God, and offended him grievouſly by worſhipping of Idols, and divers abſurd and ſtrange actions, by which he heaped many miſeries on the Iſraelites heads. To him there came a certain Prophet called Ionas, who prophecied unto him, that he ſhould make War againſt the Syrians, and that he ſhould overcome them, and enlarge his Kingdom to the Northward, as far as the City of Amatha; and to the Southward as far as the Lake Aſphaltites (for theſe in times paſt were the limits of the Countrey of Canaan, according as Joſhua had ſet the bounds thereof.) Jeroboam, encouraged by his prophecy led forth his Army againſt the Syrians, and ſpoiled all their Countrey (according to the prophecy of Ionas.) When the Prieſts beheld the Kings face covered with a leproſie, they told him what inconvenience had hapned unto him, and enjoined him to depart out of the Town, according to the cuſtom of Men that were polluted. Whereupon he (wholly confuſed at ſo grievous an accident, and having no more courage to ſpeak) obeyed the commandment that was given him, enduring a lamentable puniſhment for his pride, and for that he committed ſuch impiety againſt God. He therefore C remained without the City for a certain time, and led a private life, and his ſon Jotham ſucceeded him in the kingdom. Finally, he dyed through grief and diſcontent, after he had accompliſhed 68 years, whereof he reigned 52, and was buried in his Garden.

Zachary, Jeroboams ſon, having reigned ſix Months over the Iſraelites, was ſlain by Treaſon complotted againſt him by a familiar friend of his called Sellum, the ſon of Jabes, who poſſeſſing the kingdom after him, enjoyed not the ſame above 30 dayes. For the General Manahem, being at that time in the City of Tharſa, and underſtanding of that which had hapned to Zachary, departed thence with all his Force, and came to Samaria, and in a battel which he fought, he ſlew Sellum: And afterwards obtaining the Crown, he went from thence towards the City of Tapſa, the Inhabitants whereof locked and barred D their gates againſt him, and would not receive him: in revenge whereof, he ſpoiled all the Countrey round about, and took the City by force, and (being highly incenſed againſt the Tapſians for their inſolence) he put them all to the Sword, not ſparing their little children (which was an incredible and barbarous cruelty.) Manahem reigned in the manner for the ſpace of ten years, continuing a moſt cruel and unbridled tyranny over this people. Afterwards being aſſailed by Phul King of the Syrians, he went not out againſt him, neither practiſed to reſiſt him, but procured his peace for the ſum of 1000 talents of ſilver, which by way of compoſition he paid unto him. The people furniſhed Manahem with this ſum, by way of contribution, paying fifty drachms apiece.

After his death, he was buried in Samaria, leaving behind him a Son to ſucceed him in E the kingdom, whoſe name was Phaceias, who imitating his Fathers cruelty, enjoy'd the Soveraignty but two years: for he was ſlain at a feaſt in the midſt of his friends, by a Treaſon practiſed againſt him by Phaceias the ſon of Romelias, who enjoyed the kingdom for the ſpace of 20 years, addicting himſelf to all impiety and wickedneſs. But Teglaphalaſſer King of Aſſyria, led forth his Army againſt the Iſraelites, and ſpoiled all the Countrey of Galaad, and that beyond Jordan and Galilee, Cidida and Aſor alſo, and made all the Inhabitants thereof Priſoners, and tranſlated the kingdom to himſelf. This is that which we have thought good to write, touching the King of Aſſyria.

Naum 2.8,9, 10. ad finem.

Jotham the ſon of Ozias, reigned in Jeruſalem over the Tribe of Juda: he was the ſon of a daughter of Jeruſalem called Jereſa. There was no virtue wanting in this King, for F he was devout towards God, juſt towards Men, and careful to repair the City: for he willingly employed himſelf in reſtoring that which had need of reparation and ornament. He built Galleries and Porches about the Temple, and repaired the walls that were fallen down: he erected huge and impregnable Towers: in a word, he reſtored all that which was deficient in his kingdom. He made War upon the Ammonites; and overcoming them in battel, he made all their Nation tributary, and conſtrained them to pay him yearly 100 Talents, and 10000 Cores of Wheat, and as many of Barley: and his kingdom in ſuch ſort encreaſed, as he was redoubted abroad, and happy at home. Now about the ſame time there lived a certain Prophet called Naum, who propheſied the overthrow of the Aſſyrians, and of the City of Ninivie, and ſpake to this effect: G All the people thereof ſhall be troubled, and put to flight, and ſhall ſay the one unto the other, Stay and abide, take gold and ſilver, and there ſhall be none that will receive it. For they ſhall have more

H care to ſave their bodies, than their goods: for there ſhall be a great debate amongſt them with lamentation: their members ſhall loſe their vigor, and their faces ſhall be pale through fear: whither ſhall the Lyons retreat? or where ſhall the mother of the Lyons whelp reſt her ſelf? Ninivie (God ſaith unto thee) I will deſtroy thee, neither ſhall the Lyons that iſſue from thee, govern the world any more. To this effect did he propheſie, and ſpake many other things to this intent, which it is not material to repeat. For I have omitted it purpoſely, becauſe I would not be troubleſom to the Readers. But all thoſe things which he foretold touching Ninivie, came to paſs 115 years after.

CHAP. XII.

I Raſin King of Damaſcus, maketh War againſt Jeruſalem: Achaz ſendeth for the King of Aſſyria to aſſiſt him.

AFter that Jothan had lived One and forty years, and reigned ſixteen, he dyed, and was buried in the Sepulchre of the Kings; after him, the Kingdom fell to Achaz his Son, who was a contemner of God, and a Tranſgreſſor of the Ordinances of his Forefathers, and conformed himſelf to the Cuſtoms of the Kings of Iſrael; for he erected Altars in the City of Jeruſalem, and ſacrificed unto Idols, offering up his own Son unto them (after the manner of the Canaanites) and committed divers ſuch like offences. During theſe impious Idolatries of his, Raſin King of Syria and Damaſcus, and Phaceias K King of Iſrael, made War againſt him (for theſe two were Confederates:) leading therefore both their Armies againſt Jeruſalem, they beſieged it a long time, yet without any ſucceſs, by reaſon the Walls were very ſtrong. But the King of Syria having ſeized the City of Elath, near unto the Red Sea, and ſlain all the Inhabitants thereof, planted Syrians therein, putting all the Gariſon likewiſe to the Sword, and all the Jews round about, and carried away with him a great booty unto Damaſcus, and afterwards returned home with his Army. The King of Jeruſalem underſtanding that the Syrians were retired, and ſuppoſing himſelf to be ſufficient to fight againſt the King of Iſrael, led forth his Forces againſt him, and was overcome in battel (becauſe that God was incenſed againſt him for his impieties, which were without number.) For in that battel, the Iſraelites ſlew L about Sixſcore thouſand Men; amongſt whom, was Zacharias the ſon of Achiaz, whom the General of the Army of the Iſraelites, called Amias, ſlew, with Ericam the Governor of the whole Realm, and took Elcan the General of the Tribe of Juda priſoner alſo. They led away likewiſe a great number of Women and Children, with a great booty, and afterwards returned to Samaria. At that time there was a certain Prophet living in Samaria, whoſe name was Obel, who coming out to meet the Army, cryed with a loud voice unto the people, That the victory which they had obtained, was not through their own valor, but by reaſon of the wrath of God conceived againſt Achaz King of Juda. He further reproved them, for that not contenting themſelves with the good ſucceſs of that victory, they had ſo far preſumed, as to make them of Juda and Benjamin Priſoners, who M were of their own alliance: he therefore counſelled them to ſend them back unto their houſes, without any injury offered unto them, threatning them, that if they omitted it, they might be aſſured that God would puniſh them.

After this admonition, the Iſraelites aſſembled themſelves together to conſult upon this matter, at which time Barachias, one of the principal Governors of the State, and three others with him, alledged, That it was not lawful for the Citizens to lead their Priſoners into the City, for fear (as they ſaid) that God ſhould utterly extinguiſh them all. For thoſe ſins (ſaid they) which we have already committed, and againſt which the Prophets have exclaimed, are cauſe enough to incenſe God; ſo that we have no cauſe to add new Impieties to the precedent. When the Soldiers heard theſe words, they permitted them to execute N all that which they held convenient to be done. For which cauſe they took the Priſoners, and diſcharged them, and entertained them courteouſly, and gave them money to furniſh them in their journey, and ſent them home without offence: and beſides that, theſe four perſons conducted them onward of their journey as far as Jericho; and when they drew near unto Jeruſalem, they returned back to Samaria.

He wrought much miſchief likewiſe in the Countrey of Iſrael, and led away a great number of Priſoners from thence. After that the Syrians had been ſubdued and weakned after this manner, Achaz took all the gold and ſilver that was in the Kings treaſury, and in the Temple of God, and carried it unto Damaſcus, and gave it to the King of Aſſyria, according to the promiſe which he had made him; and after much rejoycing, he returned back again to Jeruſalem. Ver. 20. Achaz death.

This King was ſo ſenſleſs and ignorant of his own profit, that although he was vanquiſhed in War by the Syrians, yet ceaſed he not to adore their gods, but perſiſted to honour them, as if he expected the victory by their means. And although he were overcome the ſecond time, yet he continued to worſhip the Aſſyrian gods; chooſing rather to reverence any, than the true God, whom his Forefathers worſhipped: yea, ſo far grew he in contempt, and neglect of all true piety, that at length he ſhut up the Temple-gates, and prohibited the ordinary Sacrifices, having before that, taken all the precious Preſents out of the ſame. After he had in this ſort committed theſe outrages againſt God, he died, when he was 36 years old, and after he had reigned 16 years, and left his ſon Ezechias to ſucceed him in the kingdom. At that very time died Phaceias King of the Iſraelites, C by means of a certain conſpiracy, which Oſeas his intended friend wrought againſt him: who held the kingdom for the ſpace of nine years, ſhewing himſelf to be wicked, and a contemner of God. Againſt him Salmanaſar King of Aſſyria raiſed a War, and overcame him, becauſe God was not favourable unto him, neither aſſiſtant to his enterprizes: he was therefore ſubdued, and conſtrained to pay a certain tribute impoſed upon him.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 14. 2 Kings 18. 1, &c. 2 Chron. 29. 1, &c.

The fourth year of the Reign of Oſeas, Ezechias the ſon of Achaz, and Abia a Citizen of Jeruſalem, reigned over the two Tribes. He was a man of a virtuous diſpoſition, and one that loved juſtice and piety; for as ſoon as he came unto the kingdom, he reſolved with himſelf firſt of all, that there was nothing more neceſſary and advantagious, than the eſtabliſhment of the ſervice of God. When therefore he had aſſembled the People, the Prieſts, and the Levites, he began to diſcourſe with them in theſe or ſuch like words: D There is no one of you but knoweth, that for my fathers offences, and for your irreverence and diſregard to the ſervice of God, ye are fallen into many calamities, becauſe through your extreme madneſs, you have ſuffered your ſelves to be perſuaded to adore thoſe, whom he eſteemed to be no gods. Since therefore you have learnt (to your own miſery) how pernicious a thing impiety is, I exhort you, that you purifie both your ſelves, your Prieſts, and your Levites, from your former pollutions, that yet at length you may aſſemble together, and open the Temple, and cleanſe the ſame with ordinary Sacrifices, to the end it may be reſtored to the ancient honour which heretofore it enjoyed: for by this means God will be favourable unto us, when his wrath ſhall be appeaſed that was kindled againſt us. As ſoon as the King had ſpoken after this manner, the Prieſts opened the Temple, and after they had gathered the ſacred veſſels, and caſt all E uncleanneſs out of it, they offered Sacrifices upon the Altar, according to the cuſtom. Afterwards the King ſent to all the Provinces under his dominion, and gathered together the People of Jeruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread (which had been intermitted a long time, through the impiety of the Kings Predeceſſors.) He ſent alſo unto the Iſraelites, exhorting them to forſake the cuſtoms which of a long time they had wickedly obſerved, and to return to the true and ancient manner of ſerving God, certifying them, that he would permit them to repair to Jeruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread, promiſing them that he himſelf would ſolemnize the ſame with them alſo; proteſting that he did this, not in reſpect of his own profit, but through the deſire he had to promote their felicity, who ſhould be happy, if they obeyed this his counſel. F

Ezechias Ambaſſadors that were ſent to the Iſraelites to exhort them to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread are ſlain by them.

2 Chron. 29. The Word of God is never without fruit.

When Ezechias Ambaſſadors came unto the Iſraelites, and had delivered unto them the meſſage that they had in charge: ſo far were they from complying with them, that they mocked them, and eſteemed them to be mad, and ſpit upon thoſe Prophets that exhorted them to piety; and foretold them the evils they ſhould ſuffer, if they ſerved not the true God: and finally they laid hold on them, and put them to the ſword. And not contenting themſelves with this preſumption, they attempted yet far worſer things, and never gave over, until that God (for a puniſhment of their impiety) ſubjected them to their enemies, as ſhall appear hereafter: But divers of the Tribes of Manaſſes, Zabulon, and Iſſachar, (reſpecting the good counſels of the Prophets) ſubmitted themſelves to the ſervice of God, and repaired all together to Jeruſalem, to King Ezechias, to honour G God. As ſoon as they were arrived there, Ezechias went up into the Temple, accompanied with the Governors and all the People, and offered there ſeven Bulls, ſeven Rams, and the heads of the Sacrifice, they deliver'd them to the Prieſt, according as it appertained to them, and they ſacrificed, and made burnt-offerings of them. The Levites alſo (aſſiſting round about with Inſtruments of Muſick) ſung Hymns and Songs unto God, according as they had been taught by the ordinance of David. The other Prieſts had Trumpets, which they uſed in conſort to the tune of their Hymns. Which done, the King and all the People caſt themſelves proſtrate upon the ground, and adored God; and afterwards ſacrificed ſeven Oxen, an 100 Sheep, and 200 Lambs. The King likewiſe beſtowed 600 Oxen, and 3000 ſheep, upon the People, to feaſt withall. And when the Prieſts had joyfully perform'd all things (according to the cuſtom contain'd in the Law) I the King ſate down and eat with the People, and gave thanks unto God. And when the feaſt of unleavened bread was come, they eat the Paſſeover, and during the ſeven other dayes, they offer'd up their other Sacrifices. The King gave, in way of gratuity, unto the People (beſides that which had been offer'd) 2000 Oxen, and 7000 Sheep. The Governors did the like, and gave the People a 1000 Bulls, and 1400 Sheep: and thus was the feaſt ſolemnized, which had not been ſo magnificently and devoutly celebrated ſince Solomon's time. When the ſolemnity of this feaſt was paſt, they journeyed, and went thorow the Countrey, and purifi'd it. They purged the City likewiſe of all Idols, and the King ordained that the daily Sacrifices ſhould be made according to the Law, upon his charge. He enacted alſo, That the People ſhould pay the Tenths to the Prieſts and Le- K vites, with the firſt-fruits; to the intent they might wholly intend piety, and never eſtrange themſelves from the ſervice of God. By which means it came to paſs, that the People brought all kind of fruit to the Prieſts and Levites: which the King put up in certain ſtore-houſes, which he had built, to be diſtributed to every one of them, their Wives and Children, and by this means they returned again to their former purity in Religion.

After the King had diſpoſed all things in this ſort, he made War upon the Philiſtines, and overcame them, and ſeized all their Cities (between Gaza and Geth.) About this time the King of Aſſyria ſent unto him, and threatned him, That if he would not pay thoſe Tri- butes which his father before him had paid unto him, he would deſtroy all his Countrey. Nevertheleſs Ezechias ſet light by his threats, aſſuring himſelf in that piety and zeal he bore thoſe things that were to ſucceed.

by which means he was beſieged therein for three years ſpace, and finally Samaria was taken by force, in the ninth year of Oſeas, and the ſeventh of Ezechias's Reign. At which time all the Kingdom of Iſrael was deſtroy'd, and all the People tranſported into the Countries of Media and Perſia; and, amongſt the reſt, King Oſeas was taken Priſoner.
The King of Aſſyria cauſed certain Nations of a Countrey called Chut, ſo ſtiled, from Nations, they brought with them each of them the god whom they honour'd in their Nation, to the number of five gods, whom they ſerved after the manner of their Countrey.

Whereupon the true God was diſpleas'd, and provok'd againſt them, for a Plague fell amongſt them, that conſumed them in ſuch ſort, that they could find no remedy, until they were told that they ought to adore the God of the Hebrews, and that therein conſiſted C to obſerve both: by which means the Plague ceaſed. And now even unto this day continue they in the ſame Religion, and are called by the Hebrews, Chutheans, and Samaritans by the Greeks. Theſe, as often as they find the Jews in proſperity, call them their 2 King. 18,19. The deſtruction of Judea.

L IN the Fourteenth year of the Reign of Ezechias King of the two Tribes, Senacherib, King of Aſſyria, drew forth a huge Army againſt him, and ſurprized all the Cities of Juda and Benjamin by ſtrong hand. To him Ezechias ſent Ambaſſadors, promiſing him obedience, and ſuch a Tribute as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe.
When Senacherib had heard the Ambaſſadors, he reſolved on Peace, and accepted Ezechias offer, promiſing that he would depart, as ſoon as he ſhould have received Three hundred Talents of ſilver, and Thirty Talents of gold; ſwearing unto the Ambaſſadors, That upon theſe conditions he would depart away, without committing any outrage.
Ezechias giving credit to theſe words of his, emptied the Treaſuries, and ſent the prefixed ſum to Senacherib, hoping to be delivered from his enemy, and the hazard wherein his Countrey ſtood. But the Aſſyrians having received the money, ſet light by their promiſes, M ſo that Senacherib went in perſon to make War againſt the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and left Rapſaces his General in Judæa with a great power, accompanied with two of his chief Minions and Courtiers, with commiſſion to ſpoil Jeruſalem. The names of theſe two were Tharata and Anacheris. As ſoon as they were encamped near unto the Walls, they ſent unto Ezechias, and commanded him to come and ſpeak with them: but he through fear which he had conceived, went not unto them, but ſent three of his moſt familiar friends, Eliacim the Superintendent of his Realm, Sobna, and Joachas, that had the commiſſion of his Regiſters.

Theſe three preſented themſelves before the Chieftains of the Aſſyrian Army, whom when Rapſaces beheld, he commanded them to return unto their Maſter, and to tell him, N That the great King Senacherib was deſirous to know, upon what hope he ſlighteth his Summons, and refuſeth to admit his Army into the City? Is it perhaps, becauſe he hopeth the Egyptians will have the upper hand of the Kings Army? If that be his hope, doubtleſs he is deceived, ſhewing himſelf to be like unto a man that ſtayeth himſelf upon a broken reed; by which he is not only not ſupported, but in his fall hath his hand pierced therewith. He likewiſe wiſhed him to conceive, that this his expedition was not without the Will of God, who, as in times paſt, hath 2 Kings 19. 1,2. Ezechias in adverſity hath recourſe to God, he is comforted by Eſay.

When both the Ambaſſadors and the People had heard what the Aſſyrian had ſpoken, they reported the ſame to Ezechias, who incontinently caſt his royal garments off, and cloathed himſelf in ſackcloth, diſcovering his trouble and ſorrow in his countenance; and caſting himſelf proſtrate upon the earth, after the manner of their Countrey, he beſought God to be aſſiſtant unto him, ſince all other hope was vain. He ſent alſo certain of his friends, and ſome Prieſts, unto the Prophet Eſay, requiring him to pray unto God, That ſince Sacrifice was offered unto him for publick ſecurity, it might pleaſe him to fruſtrate the enemies hopes, and to have pity and compaſſion on his people. When the Prophet had performed what was required, he received an anſwer from God, by which he aſſured the King, and all that were about him, foretelling them, that the enemies ſhould be overcome without ſtroke ſtrucken, and ſhould retire with ſhame, and not with that advantage which they promis'd to themſelves at preſent, becauſe God had already determined how they ſhould be overthrown. He foretold alſo, that Senacherib himſelf (the King of Aſſyria) ſhould fail of his enterprize in Egypt, and that upon his return to his own Court, he ſhould be ſlain. At that very time the Aſſyrian wrote Letters to Ezechias, in which he called him fool and mad-man, to think that he could ſecure himſelf from being his ſlave, yea, his in eſpecial, who had conquered divers and far greater Nations: threatning him with utter ruine at ſuch time as he ſhould ſurprize the City, if he opened not the gates of Jeruſalem willingly, to entertain his Army. When Ezechias had read theſe Letters, he ſet light by them, by reaſon of the confidence he had in God: and having opened them, he ſpread them in the Temple. And whil'ſt he renewed his prayers unto God for the ſalvation of the City and his Subjects, Eſay the Prophet told him, That his prayer was heard: that hereafter likewiſe they ſhould manure their lands in peace and ſecurity, and ſhould enjoy their poſſeſſions without fear. Not long after, the King of Aſſyria having but cold ſucceſs in his expedition againſt Egypt, turned back again without doing any thing, for this cauſe that enſueth. He had loſt much time in the ſiege of Peluſium: and at ſuch time as he had already raiſed certain Bulwarks as high as the Wall, ſo that he wanted nothing but to give the aſſault; News was brought him that Thargiſes, King of Ethiopia, brought an Army to reſcue the Egyptians, with an intent to take his way thorow the Deſart, and ſuddenly to charge the Aſſyrian Army. Senacherib troubled with theſe tydings, ſpeedily departed thence with his Army. But Herodotus ſaith, That he made War with Vulcans Prieſts, (for ſo he ſtileth this King of Egypt, becauſe he was a Prieſt of that falſe god) and moreover addeth, That beſieging Peluſium, for this cauſe he gave over the ſiege: The King of Egypt called to his God for aſſiſtance, by whoſe power the Arabians *ſuffered much miſery. CHAP. II.

Ezechias having for a time remained in peace, dieth: and leaveth his ſon Manaſſes to ſucceed him.

The year of the World, 3241. before Chriſt's Nativity, 733.

KIng Ezechias (being in this ſort beyond all hope delivered from his fears) offered thankſgiving and ſacrifices unto God, with all the people: acknowledging that there was no other cauſe that had ſlain part of his enemies, and put the reſt to mortal fear, nor delivered Jeruſalem from thraldom, but only Gods ſuccour and aſſiſtance. And whileſt he altogether intended and was occupied about the ſervice of God, he fell ſick I of a grievous diſeaſe, ſo as the Phyſicians deſpaired of his health, and his friends expected nothing but his death. But that which occaſioned the greateſt trouble, was, that he had no children, and ſaw that he was now to depart the world, and to leave his houſe without a ſucceſſor, and his kingdom deſolate. In this affliction he beſought God, That it would pleaſe him to lengthen his life a little time, until he had children to ſucceed him; and that he would vouchſafe that his ſoul might not be taken from him, before he were the father of a ſon. Hereupon God taking compaſſion of him, (and the rather, becauſe he was not grieved for that the pleaſures of his kingdom were taken from him; but for that he ſought for a lawful heir to ſucceed him) he ſent the Prophet Eſay unto him, to aſſure him, that after three days he ſhould be recovered of his ſickneſs; and that after he had lived K ſome fifteen years more, he ſhould depart out of this life, and leave a lawful heir behind him. When the Prophet (according as he was commanded) had brought theſe tydings to the King, he doubted both the unexpected meſſenger, and the mightineſs of his diſeaſe: for which cauſe, he required ſome prodigious ſign at Eſaias's hands, to the intent that he might certainly believe, that he was ſent as a meſſenger from God unto him: for the truth of thoſe things which either exceed our hope, or reaſon, are wont to be confirmed by theſe means. Whereupon Eſay asked him what ſign he required, and it ſhould be given him. He anſwered, that he deſired to ſee the ſhadow of the Sun go back ten degrees upon his Quadrant. On this occaſion the Prophet beſought God, that it would pleaſe him to confirm the King by this miracle: who ſeeing that which he deſired, was L ſuddenly delivered from his ſickneſs, and went up into the Temple to worſhip and praiſe God. At that time it hapned, that the Monarchy of the Aſſyrians was deſtroyed by the Medes, (whereof I will ſpeak in another place.) Not long after, Balad King of Babylon ſent an Ambaſſador to Ezekias with Preſents, calling him his ally and friend: who receiving his meſſengers, he feaſted them, and ſhewed them his treaſures, his arſenal, and all other magnificence that he had of gold and precious ſtones: and after he had given them Preſents for Balad, he diſmiſſed them. Whereupon the Prophet Eſay came unto him, asking him from whence thoſe Ambaſſadors came? To whom Ezechias anſwered, That they were of Babylon, and came unto him from their King; telling the Prophet how he had ſhewed them all that which he had, to the end that having ſeen and obſerved his M riches and power, they might afterwards certifie the King thereof. Whereunto the Prophet replied, ſaying, Know thou, that within a little time thy riches ſhall be tranſported into Babylon, and thy children ſhall be made Eunuchs, and (being no more men) ſhall be ſlaves unto the King of Babylon. All which God gave him to underſtand before it hapned.
Ezechias was troubled to hear theſe tydings, ſaying, That he deſired that his people might not fall into thoſe miſeries: but ſince it was impoſſible to change the Decree of God, he required that he might have peace during his life-time. Of this Balad King of Babylon, Beroſus maketh mention. This Prophet truly divine and admirable for the verity of his Propheſies, is accounted to have ſpoken nothing that was untrue, but to have left in writing all that which he propheſied: the truth whereof hath afterwards, in effect, appeared to poN N ſterity. Neither did he alone perform thus much; but beſides him, twelve others have done the like: and all that which is hapned unto us, either good or evil, hath fallen out truly according to their Prophecies. But hereafter we will ſpeak of every one of them.
Now when Ezechias had lived his prefixed time, (according as we have before related) and governed his kingdom in peace, he died when he was 54 years old, and in the 29 year of his Reign.

the Iſraelites, who were deſtroyed, becauſe of their heinous ſins committed againſt God. He was ſo impudent, as he ſpared not to pollute the very Temple of God, the City, and the whole Countrey: and being no longer to be reſtrain'd by any fear of the juſt vengeance of God, he barbarouſly put to death many good and virtuous Men, and ſpared not the very Prophets; ſo that Jeruſalem was overflown with blood. For which cauſe God being provoked unto wrath by his heinous offences, ſent divers Prophets, the one after the other, both to the King and the people, by whom he threatned to inflict the ſame calamities upon them, which (for contempt of Religion) the Iſraelites their Brethren had a little before ſuffered. But they not giving heed to their Predictions, (whoſe admonitions had they reſpected, they might have prevented their imminent evils) at length experimented the truth thereof. For whereas they perſevered in their accuſtomed and diſſolute manners, God ſtirred up the King of Chaldæa and Babylon againſt them; who ſending their Armies into Judæa, and ſpoiling the whole Region, at length ſurprized and led away Manaſſes Priſoner, and made him liable to what puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe them to inflict. Then this miſerable Prince (taught by his own experience) acknowledged his ſin, and humbly beſought God to have compaſſion on him. His prayer was heard; and after ſome ſpace of time, the Babylonian ſending him home, reſtored him to his former government. As ſoon as he was returned back to Jeruſalem, he made it appear, by the change of his life, that his repentance was ſincere, and endeavoured nothing more, than to aboliſh the memory of his former actions, and employed his whole care to eſtabliſh the ſervice of God. He purged the Temple alſo, and cleanſed the City; and from that time forward, he addicted himſelf wholly to think how he might give God thanks, for that he had thus delivered him from ruine, and how he might paſs all the remnant of his life in his favour. He taught the People likewiſe to do the like, telling them what miſeries they had endured within a few years, becauſe they had demeaned themſelves impiouſly. He repaired the Altar alſo, and according to Moſes Preſcript, offered thereon ſolemn Sacrifices: and after that he had provided thoſe things that concerned the ſervice of God, he took care likewiſe for the ſecurity of the City of Jeruſalem, and repaired the old and ruined walls, and built ſome anew, for the enlarging of the City; he erected high Towers likewiſe, furniſhing the ſame with munition, and victual ſufficient for a City of defence. And ſo much was he changed during the reſt of his life, that he was held moſt happy; and after that he began to ſerve God, he invited many to the imitation of his virtues. After he had lived 67 years, he dyed in the 55*th* year of his Reign, and was buried in his garden. His kingdom came into the hands of his ſon Amon, the ſon of Emalſema, of the City of Jabath; who imitating the Impieties to which his father addicted himſelf in his youth, was ſlain in his own houſe, by a conſpiracy plotted by his own houſhold-ſervants, after he had lived 24 years, and reigned two. After his death, the people ſlew his murtherers, and he was buried with his father, and the kingdom was given to his ſon Joſias, who was eight years old.

CHAP. IV.

The Hiſtory of Joſias.

Joſias King of Juda. 2 Chron. 34. 8. Joſias reſtoreth the true ſervice of God.

THE Mother of Joſias, King of Juda, was of the City of Boſceth, and was called Jeda: This Prince was by nature ſo excellently diſpoſed to all virtue, that during the whole courſe of his life, he propoſed to himſelf no other example but that of his Predeceſſor King David. When he grew to be twelve years old, he gave a manifeſt proof of his piety and juſtice: for he drew the people to a conformable courſe of life, and to the deteſtation and aboliſhing of Idols, that were no gods, and to the ſervice of the onely and true God of their forefathers. And conſidering the actions of his Predeceſſors, he began to rectifie them in that wherein they were deficient, with no leſs circumſpection, than if he had been an old man; and that which he found to be adviſedly done by them, he did promote and imitate. And beſides this wiſdom, which was innate to him, he made uſe alſo of the advice and counſel of the Elders: for following the laws, (both in reſpect of publick policy, as alſo in religion) he walked uprightly, in that by obſerving them, he could not err.

2 Kings 22. v. 4, 24. Joſias rooteth out Idolatry.

He made a particular inquiry both in Jeruſalem, and the Countrey round about, for thoſe places where they had ſet up the worſhip of falſe gods, and overthrew their altars; and all thoſe gifts that had been offered to them by his Predeceſſors, were defaced: and in this manner cauſed he the people to return to the ſervice of God, and to forſake the honour they did unto Idols. He offered likewiſe the ordinary ſacrifices and burnt-offerings upon the altar, and eſtabliſhed Judges and Magiſtrates to determine publick debates, and to do each man right; charging them to have no leſs reſpect of equity, than they had of their own lives. He ſent alſo thorow all the Countrey, commanding that all thoſe that would be Contributers, either in gold or ſilver, H ſilver, towards the reparation of the Temple, ſhould bring in their benevolence, according to their abilities. And when all the money was gathered together, he appointed Superintendents, both over the Temple, as alſo over the charges that were defrayed in the reparation thereof: namely, Amaſias, who was Governor of the City, and Saphan the Secretary, and Joata, who was over the Regiſters, with the High-Prieſt Elcia: who with all expedition and diligence provided workmen, and all that which was requiſite for the building, and began the work. This ſudden and ſpeedy reparation of the Temple, gave a manifeſt teſtimony of the Kings piety: who, when he had attained to the 18*th* year of his age, ſent Elcia the High-Prieſt, and cauſed him to melt down the remainder of the money that was given towards the building of the Temple, and to make veſſels, cups and I ewers for the ſervice of the Altar. He commanded alſo, that all the gold and ſilver that was in the Treaſury, ſhould be brought forth, and employed after the like manner, in cups and other veſſels. Now whil'ſt the High-Prieſt ſearch'd the Treaſury, he found the ſacred Books of Moſes in the Temple, which he brought and deliver'd to the Scribe Saphan; who, after he had peruſed the ſame, preſented them unto the King, giving him to underſtand, that all that which he had commanded, was accompliſhed: beſides that, he read the Books unto him, which when the King heard, he rent his cloaths, and called Elcia the High-Prieſt unto him, and the Scribe Saphan, with certain other of his inward friends, and ſent them unto the Propheteſs Olda, the wife of Sallum, a man in high dignity, and famous for his Nobility: commanding them, That when they came unto her, they K ſhould endeavor to appeaſe Gods wrath, and labour to recover his favor, becauſe it was to be feared, that by reaſon that their anceſtors had tranſgreſſed the Laws of Moſes, they ſhould be in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of their Countrey, and abandoned by all men, ſhould at length periſh miſerably.

When the Propheteſs had heard the Kings commandment, ſhe willed thoſe that were ſent unto her, to return unto the King, and to certifie him from her, That God had given ſentence againſt them, which might not be revoked by any prayers whatſoever; namely, that ſince they had tranſgreſſed the Law of Moſes, the people ſhould periſh, and ſhould be caſt out of their Countrey, and deprived of all their goods, becauſe they had not repented of the violation of his moſt holy Laws; notwithſtanding the Prophets had exhorted them to repentance, and had fore- L told the puniſhment of their impieties, which ſhould happen unto them to the end that they might believe that God is God, and that he fails not in any thing that he hath foretold by his Prophets. Furthermore ſhe ſaid, That he forbore as yet to ſend theſe afflictions upon them for Joſias ſake, who was a virtuous man, but that after his deceaſe, God would pour out his wrath upon the people. This Prophecy of the Woman they ſignifi'd unto the King, who ſent into all parts, and aſſembled the People in Jeruſalem, commanding the Prieſts and Levites, and generally all men, without diſtinction of age or perſon, to be preſent in that Convention. Now when they were aſſembled, he firſt of all cauſed the ſacred books to be read, and afterwards ſtanding aloft upon his Throne, he cauſed all the people to ſwear and promiſe, that they ſhould ſerve God, and keep Moſes Laws. Whereupon all of them did willingly M approve of whatſoever he ſaid (promiſing to do that whereunto they were exhorted.) And therewithall offering up Sacrifices unto God, they beſought him to ſhew himſelf favourable and merciful towards them. The King likewiſe commanded the High-Prieſt, that if there were any veſſels in the Temple which were made by his Predeceſſors, in honour of Idols, and ſtrange gods, he ſhould caſt them out; and after that a great number were found therein, all of them were gather'd together and burnt, and the aſhes afterwards were ſcatter'd abroad. And as touching the Prieſts (that appertained to Idols that were not of the Race of Aaron) he put them to death. When theſe things were thus executed in Jeruſalem, he came afterwards to the plain Countrey; and all that which Jeroboam had erected there in honour of Idols, he utterly defaced it, and the bones of the falſe Prophets were burnt upon the Altar that Jeroboam had built. After this, King Joſias applied himſelf to the Iſraelites, (who had avoided the captivity and ſervitude of the Aſſyrians) and perſuaded them to forſake their impieties, and the ſervices they had performed to ſtrange gods, and to honour the ſovereign and true God of their fathers, and to cleave unto him. He made a ſearch alſo thorow every houſe, borough and city, fearing leſt as yet there ſhould be an Idol hidden. He likewiſe ſought out the Chariots that were made by his anceſtors, in honour of the Sun, O and all that which was adored, whatſoever it were, and utterly aboliſhed the ſame. After he had in this ſort purged the Countrey, he aſſembled all the people in Jeruſalem, where he celebrated the Feaſt of unleavened bread, which we call Eaſter. Towards the performance

Now when he drew near unto the City of Mende, (which was under Joſias ſubjection) King Joſias denied him paſſage, and would not ſuffer his Army to march thorow his Countrey. For which cauſe Nechao ſent an Herald unto him, to let him underſtand, That it was not againſt him that he made War, but that he bent his courſe towards Euphrates: for which cauſe C he wiſhed him in no ſort to hinder his intended journey, leſt thereby he ſhould be conſtrained to make War upon him. But Joſias regarded not this demand of his, but reſolved himſelf to hinder his paſſage thorow his Countrey: And I am perſuaded that his evil Genius put him upon making this reſiſtance, to the end that he might have ſome occaſion to do ſomething againſt Nechao. For whil'ſt he ſet in order his Army, and rode from one Band to another, being mounted upon his Chariot, he was ſtrucken with an Arrow that was ſhot by a certain Egyptian, which put a ſtop to his proceedings: For feeling himſelf oppreſſed with pain, by reaſon of his wound, he commanded his Army to retire, and returned himſelf to Jeruſalem, where he dyed of his wound, and was buried with his Fathers with great magnificence, after he had lived 39 years, and reigned 31. For him D the people mourned with great heavineſs, lamenting for many days. The Prophet Jeremy alſo made an Elegy upon him in verſe, which is as yet extant even in theſe days. This Prophet foretold in writing thoſe evils which ſhould afterwards happen unto the City, and the Captivity wherewith we are intangled at this preſent, and the ſurpriſal of Babylon. Neither hath he alone foretold the ſame, but the Prophet Ezekiel hath likewiſe done the like, who firſt left two Books written of the ſame Argument. He changed his name likewiſe, and call'd him Joachim: he impos'd a Tribute alſo on Judea, of 100 Talents of ſilver, and a Talent of gold, which Joachim paid; and as touching Joaz, he led him into Egypt, where he finiſhed his days, after he had been King three months, and ten days. Nabuchodonoſors Army cometh into Syria.

2 Kings 25. per totum. 2 Chron. 36. 6, 7, ad 21. Nabuchodonoſor, King of Babylon, warreth againſt the Egyptians.

IN the fourth year of the Reign of Joachim, a certain man called Nabuchodonoſor, poſſeſſed the Kingdom of Babylon, who at that time went out with a great Army againſt Carchabeſa, (a City ſcituate near unto Euphrates) reſolving with himſelf to fight againſt Nechao King of Egypt, under whoſe power all Syria was ſubject. Nechao underſtanding G of the Babylonians intent, and how great his Army was, made very little account thereof, but with a huge Army advanced towards Euphrates, with an intent to repulſe Nabuchodonoſor.

H chodonoſor. But he was overcome in battel, and loſt divers thouſands of his men. Whereupon, the Babylonian (paſſing Euphrates) ſeized all Syria, as far as Peluſium, (Judea only excepted.) The fourth year that Nabuchodonoſor reigned over theſe conquered Countries, and in the eighth year of the Reign of Joachim over the Hebrews, the Babylonian led forth his Army againſt the Jews with a mighty power, threatning them to uſe all hoſtility, except Joachim would pay him Tribute. Joachim fearing his threats, bought his peace with ſilver, and payed for three years ſpace the Tributes that were impoſed on him. But in the third year (underſtanding that the Egyptian was up in Arms againſt the Babylonian) he denied the payment of the Tribute, notwithſtanding he was fruſtrated of his hope, for the Egyptians were not ſo hardy as to make War. All which the I Prophet Jeremy daily foretold him, ſignifying unto him, That he built his hope in vain upon the Egyptians; and that it would fall out, that the City ſhould be overthrown by the King of Babylon, and Joachim himſelf ſhould be delivered Priſoner into his hands. But becauſe there was no means for them to eſcape this juſtice, all that which he ſaid, was nothing available. For notwithſtanding the People and Governors heard thereof, yet made they no reckoning of the ſame, but were diſpleaſed with thoſe counſels which he propoſed unto them, accuſing Jeremy, as if he took pleaſure to utter and publiſh ominous and adverſe Preſages againſt the King; they likewiſe called him in queſtion before the Kings Council, and requir'd that he might be condemn'd. Whereupon ſome of them gave ſentence againſt him: But others took a more diſcreet courſe, and perſuaded them to cauſe K the Prophet to depart out of the Kings houſe, forbidding his Adverſaries to do him any miſchief: ſince that he had not only foretold the future calamities of the City, but that many before him had done the like, as Micheas, and divers others; and yet that no one of them had ſuffer'd any evil by the Kings of their time, but that contrariwiſe Micheas had been honour'd as a Prophet ſent from God. By theſe words they appeaſed the People, and deliver'd Jeremy from the death intended againſt him. This man wrote all his Propheſies, and read them to the People in their Faſts, when they were aſſembled in the Temple in the ninth month of the fifth year of the Reign of Joachim, which book he had compoſed touching that which ſhould happen unto the City, the Temple, and the People. When the Governors heard the ſame, they took the book from him, and commanded L that both he and his Secretary Baruch ſhould withdraw themſelves out of the ſight of men: and they took the book, and preſented it unto the King; who, in the preſence of his Friends, commanded his Secretary to read the ſame: and after he had heard the contents thereof, he waxed wroth, and renting it in pieces, caſt it into the fire, intending that it ſhould never be ſeen. He ſent out likewiſe a ſtrict Commiſſion to ſeek out Jeremy, and his Secretary Baruch, and to lead them out to be puniſhed. But they were already fled, that they might prevent his indignation.

NOT long after this, he went out to meet the King of Babylon, who was marched out to make War againſt him: and being incredulous and careleſs of the Prophets Predictions, he opened the gates unto him, ſuppoſing that he intended him no evil. But when the Babylonians were entered into the City, the King obſerved not his promiſes, but put all ſuch to death as were in the flower and ſtrength of their years, and ſpared none of the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, with them alſo he ſlew their King Joachim, and cauſed his body to be caſt from the top of the walls, and vouchſafed him no Sepulchre, eſtabliſhing Joachin his ſon King of the Countrey, and of the City. Moreover, he took 3000 of N the moſt honourable Citizens of Jeruſalem Priſoners, and led them to Babylon with him, amongſt whom was the Prophet Ezekiel, at that time very young in years. This was the end of King Joachim; who lived 36 years, and reigned 11. Joachin that ſucceeded him in the Kingdom, was the ſon of Noſta of Jeruſalem, and reigned three months and ten days.

Nabuchodonoſor a Truce-breaker.

AS ſoon as the Babylonian had beſtowed the Kingdom of Judea on Joachin, he was ſeized with a ſudden fear, which made him ſuſpect leſt Joachin remembring himſelf of the injuries he had done unto him by the murther of his father, might draw the Countrey into rebellion, and revolt againſt him. For which cauſe he ſent out certain Forces, and beſieged Joachin in Jeruſalem: who being a man of a good nature, and of an upright heart, was loth to forſake the City in that danger without a Governor, conſidering that it was for his cauſe that the Common-weal was in that hazard. For which cauſe, taking his wife, and his neareſt akin with him, he delivered them into the hands of the Captains that were ſent againſt him, receiving an oath from them, that neither they nor the City ſhould receive any harm. But this promiſe continued not a year: for the King of Babylon obſerved it not, but commanded his Captains to impriſon all the youth and artificers that were in the City, and to bring them bound unto him. The number of them was 10832 perſons, beſides Joachin, his Mother, and his near Allies, whom they took Priſoners.

Sedechias is made King over Jeruſalem, by the Babylonians.

2 King. 24. 17. Sedechias King of Jeruſalem, ſeduced by his Courtiers and falſe Prophets, giveth no ear to Jeremy.

Ezekiel propheſieth the deſtruction of the Temple.

Ver. 20. Sedechias revolts from the Babylonian. Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. 2 Kings 25. 4. ad 12. The King of Egypt coming to reſcue the King of Jeruſalem, is overthrown by Nabuchodonoſor with all his Army, and driven out of Syria.

INſtead of Joachin, he appointed Sedechias his Uncle King of Jeruſalem, whom he bound by an oath that he ſhould govern the Countrey without any innovation, and that he ſhould hold no intelligence with the Egyptians. This Sedechias was 21 years old, at ſuch time as he came unto the Kingdom, and was Joachims brother by the mothers ſide: he was a contemner of all laws, and a perverter of ordinances. For the young men that were about him, were without the fear of God, and all the people under his dominions, committed whatſoever outrages were beſt liking unto them. For this cauſe the Prophet Jeremy came unto him, proteſting oftentimes againſt him, and denouncing, That if he would not forſake his impieties, and addict himſelf to that which was juſt, (but gave ear unto his Governors, amongſt which there were many wicked men, und to thoſe falſe Prophets that miſ-led him, truſting that the Babylonians ſhould not make War againſt his City, but that the Egyptians ſhould levy an Army, and overcome them) that then he ſhould ſuffer much miſery: For (ſaid he) they have no truth in their ſayings, and they will always miſlead you by falſe reports. Whil'ſt Sedechias gave ear to theſe diſcourſes of the Prophet, he was perſuaded, and acknowledg'd all that to be true which he had ſpoken, and very profitable both for him, and his people; but anon after, his friends corrupted him, and diverted him according to their own opinions. Ezekiel alſo at the ſame time had propheſied in Babylon concerning all thoſe calamities which were to fall upon the Temple, and ſent notice to Jeruſalem of that which he had received from God. Notwithſtanding Sedechias gave no credit to his Propheſies, by reaſon that all the Prophets were accuſtomed to accord in all things the one with the other, as touching the ſurpriſal of the City, and the impriſonment of Sedechias: but Ezekiel differed in this, that he ſaid that Sedechias ſhould not ſee Babylon; notwithſtanding that Jeremy had propheſied, that the King of Babylon ſhould lead him away Priſoner in bonds: becauſe therefore theſe two accorded not in all their ſayings, he concluded that the matter wherein they agreed, was of no conſequence. Notwithſtanding all things hapned unto him according as the Prophets had pronounced, as we will declare hereafter. After that he had continued his alliance and friendſhip with the King of Babylon for the ſpace of eight years, he brake the league that was between them, and confederated with the Egyptians (under hope that they ſhould overcome the Babylonians.) Which when the King of Babylon underſtood, he led forth his Army againſt him, and deſtroy'd his Countrey to the uttermoſt; ſo that after he had taken his Cities of defence, he brought his Army before Jeruſalem, and beſieged it. The Egyptian perceiving the ſtate wherein his Ally Sedechias was, levied an huge Army, and came into Judea, with an intent to raiſe the ſiege. Whereupon the Babylonian withdrew his Army from Jeruſalem, to encounter with the Egyptian, and fought with him, and overcame him in battel, and preſſed on him with ſuch courage, that he put him to flight, and drave him out of Syria. As ſoon as the Babylonian was diſlodged from Jeruſalem, the falſe Prophets deceived Zedechias, telling him, That the Babilonian ſhould never more return to make War either

H ther againſt him, or his Nation, and that he ſhould never any more depart from his houſe in Babylon; and that they who had been led away captives, ſhould return home again, loaden with thoſe veſſels of the Temple which the King of Babylon had taken from them.

The year of the World, 3346. before Chriſt's Nativity, 618.

But the Prophet Jeremy preſenting himſelf before the King, propheſied the contrary to theſe Impoſtors, aſſuring both him and the People, That no profit could befall them by means of the Egyptians, for that the Babilonians ſhould overcome them, and ſhould return and encamp before Jeruſalem, and beſiege the ſame, and deſtroy the People by Famine, and lead them away Priſoners that were remaining, and carry away all their ſubſtance; and that after they were ſeized of the riches of their Temple, they ſhould finally burn the ſame. As for the City, they ſhould raze it; and (ſaid he) they ſhall keep us captive for the ſpace of 70 years: And I from this ſervitude the Perſians and Medes ſhall deliver us, at ſuch time as they have gotten the Empire out of the hands of the Babilonians; then ſhall they ſend us back again into our Countrey, and we ſhall build our Temple anew, and eſtabliſh the City of Jeruſalem.

Divers men gave credit to theſe words of Jeremy; but the Governors, and ſuch as contemned God, intreated him very cruelly, as if he had been a man beſide himſelf. And whereas he had an intent to viſit his Native Countrey Anathoth, ſome 20 furlongs from Jeruſalem, one of the Magiſtrates encountring him in his journey, and laying hold on him, retained him, loading him with this ſlander, That he ſtole away, to ſubmit himſelf to the Babilonians. But Jeremy anſwer'd, That he was falſely accuſed, and that he repaired only to the place where he was born. This Prince giving him no credit, arreſted him, and brought him K before the judgment-ſeat, where he ſuſtained all ſorts of outrages and torments, and was ſhut up in Priſon to be puniſh'd, and remain'd there for a time, ſuffering the extremity of wrong and injury. The ninth year of the Reign of Zedechias, and on the tenth day of the ninth month, the King of Babilon came and encamped the ſecond time before Jeruſalem, and intrenched himſelf round about the ſame, for the ſpace of 18 months, and laid ſiege thereto, uſing his utmoſt endeavor to make himſelf Maſter of the place. And they that were beſieged therein, were afflicted with two of the greateſt calamities, Famine, and a moſt grievous Peſtilence. At this time the Prophet Jeremy being in Priſon, held not his peace, but cryed with a loud voice, and preached and exhorted the People, willing them to entertain the Babilonians, and to open their gates unto them: becauſe that in ſo L doing, they might ſecure themſelves with their families, whereas otherwayes they were aſſured of deſtruction.

Jeremy perſuadeth them to yield.

He foretold them alſo, That if any one remained in the City, he ſhould moſt aſſuredly either periſh by famine, or the enemies fury; but if ſo be they ſubmitted themſelves to the enemies mercy, they ſhould eſcape from death. But thoſe Governors that heard him ſpeak after this ſort, gave him no credit, in that they were not as yet preſſed with the danger: for which cauſe they came unto the King, and after a deſpiteful manner, told him all that which had been ſpoken, accuſing Jeremy, and reproving him for a mad man; urging this, That he had abated their courage; and by his woful predictions, had weakned the hearts of the people, which were otherwayes ready to fight for him and their Countrey, by reaſon that he flying unto the M enemy, menac'd them with the ſurprizal and utter ruine of their City.

The King, in regard of the natural humanity and juſtice that was in him, was not any wayes hereby provoked againſt Jeremy; yet to the intent that he might not ſeem utterly to oppoſe the Governors, he deliver'd the Prophet into their hands, to deal with him howſoever they pleaſed. Who, having obtained this liberty from the King, entred the Priſon on the ſudden, and laying hold on Jeremy, they let him down into a Pit full of mud, to the intent he might die in that place, and be ſtrangled by the filth; in effect, he was ſet therein up to the neck. But one of the Kings ſervants (an Ethiopian by Nation) certifi'd the King of the Prophets affliction, aſſuring him, That his Friends and Governors did not juſtly, ſo to thruſt and bury the Prophet in the mud, and curſedly to conſpire againſt him, N tiring him with bonds and tortures worſe than death. Whereupon the King hearing this, was ſorry that he had deliver'd the Prophet to the Governors, and commanded the Ethiopian to take 30 men of his Court with him, (with cords, and ſuch other things neceſſary, as might concern the ſafety of the Prophet) charging him with all expedition to deliver him from that captivity. Hereupon the Ethiopian furniſh'd with men and neceſſary means, drew the Prophet out of the mud, and diſmiſs'd him without any guard. That done, the King ſent for him in private, demanding of him, If he had any meſſage to deliver him from God, praying him to let him underſtand whatſoever he knew as touching the ſucceſs of the ſiege? The Prophets anſwer was, That although he ſhould tell him, yet it would not be believed; and that if he ſhould exhort him, he would not give ear, or liſten unto him. O But (ſaid he) *O King, thy friends have condemned me to death, as if I had been a moſt wicked Malefactor. hand, ſaying, That the Babylonian would not come and beſiege thee? Now will I take heed how A I tell thee the truth, for fear leſt thou condemn me to death.

Hereupon the King ſwore unto him, That he ſhould not die, neither that he would deliver him into the hands of the Governors: For which cauſe, Jeremy grounding himſelf upon the faith which he had plighted unto him, counſelled the King to yield up the City to the Babilonians; becauſe that God had willed him to ſignifie unto the King, that if he would ſave his life, and avoid the imminent danger, and ſave his City from utter ruine, and preſerve the Temple from burning, he ſhould ſubmit; or otherwiſe, that none but he ſhould be reputed to be the cauſe of all thoſe evils that ſhould happen unto the City and Citizens, and of that calamity that ſhould confound both him and all his family. When the King heard this, he told him, B That he would do according as he had counſelled him, and perform whatſoever he thought neceſſary to be done: but that he feared that his Subjects, who were already gone over to the King of Babylon, would do him ill offices with that King, and that by their means he might be accuſed, and deliver'd unto death. But the Prophet encourag'd him, telling him, That his fear was in vain; aſſuring him; that he ſhould ſuffer no evil, if ſo be he yielded up the City: and that neither his wife, nor children, nor the ſacred Temple ſhould ſuffer any miſchief.

Upon theſe words the King diſmiſſed Jeremy, charging him to communicate the counſel that was held between them to no one of the Citizens, no not to the Princes, if they ſhould ask of him wherefore the King had ſent for him? adviſing him to anſwer, if ſo be they were inquiſitive, That he reſorted to the King, to requeſt him that he might be no more impriſoned: all which the Prophet performed; but they preſſed him very much, to know C for what cauſe the King had ſent for him.

CHAP. X.

Jeruſalem is taken, and the People carried into Babylon by Nabuchodonoſor.

2 Kings 25. 1, &c.
Jeruſalem beſieged eighteen months, and at length taken.

Mean-while the Babylonian continued his violent ſiege againſt the City of Jeruſalem, and having raiſed Towers upon certain Bulwarks, he drave away by this means D all thoſe that approached near unto the walls: he raiſed alſo (round about the City) divers platforms, that equalled the walls in height. Mean-while, the City was as valiantly and courageouſly defended by the Inhabitants; for neither Peſtilence, nor Famine, plucked down their ſpirits: And although that within the City they were tormented with theſe ſcourges, yet were not their reſolutions broken, nor did the enemies inventions aſtoniſh them, nor their engines afright them; ſo that all the battel betwixt the Babylonians and Jews, ſeem'd to be a tryal both of valor and art, whil'ſt theſe do aſſuredly hope to ſurprize the City; and the other thought their ſafety conſiſteth herein, if they ceaſed not by new inventions to fruſtrate their enemies endeavors. And in this ſtate continu'd they both, for the ſpace of 18 months, until they were conſumed by Famine, E and by the darts that were ſhot againſt them by thoſe that ſhot from the Towers. At length, the City was taken by the Princes of Babylon, (in the eleventh year of the Reign of Zedechias, the ninth day of the fourth month) who were put in truſt by Nabuchodonoſor to manage the ſiege; for he himſelf made his abode in the City of Reblata. Now if any man be deſirous to know the names of them that had command at ſuch time as Jeruſalem was ſurpriz'd, theſe they be, Nergelear, Aremantus, Emegar, Naboſar, and Echarampſor. The City being taken about midnight, the Princes of the Enemies Army entred into the Temple; which when Zedechias underſtood, he took his wives and his children, with the Princes and his friends, and fled thorow a great valley by the deſart: which when the Babylonians underſtood by certain Jews that were revolted, and had ſubmitted themſelves unto them, they aroſe early in the morning to purſue them, and overtook and F ſurprized them near unto Jericho. Whereupon thoſe Princes and friends of Zedechias that had taken their flight with him, ſeeing the Enemies near unto them, forſook him, and ſcattering themſelves here and there, endeavour'd each of them to ſave himſelf. When therefore the Enemies had apprehended him, attended by a few followers only, and accompanied by his children and wives, they brought him unto the Kings preſence; who no ſooner beheld him, but he called him wicked and perfidious, and upbraided him with breach of his promiſe, and contempt of his Majeſty. Furthermore, he reproached him for his ingratitude, in that having received the Royalty from his hands (which he had G taken from Joachin, to beſtow on him) he had, notwithſtanding, employed all his Forces againſt his Benefactor.

Temple the firſt day of the 5th month, of the eleventh year of Zedechias Reign, which was the N When Nebuchodonoſor was come to Babylon, he ſhut up Zedechias in priſon, where He likewiſe offered the Veſſels that he had taken out of the Temple of Jeruſalem unto

When the General Nabuzaradan underſtood his reſolution, he gave charge to the Governour Godolias (whom he left in Judea) to have care of him, and to furniſh him with all that which he wanted, and after he had gratified him with Preſents he departed. In mean while, Jeremy dwelt in the City of Maſphath, he deſired Nabuzaradan, that he would ſend him his Diſciple Baruch (the Son of Neria, a man of a Noble Family, and excellently Learned in that Countrey Language,) Now when thoſe, that during the Siege of Jeruſalem, were retired out of the City, underſtood the retreat of the Babylonians, B they aſſembled together from all parts, and came to Maſphath to Godolias, under the conduct of John the Son of Careas, and Jezanais and Sareas, and others. And beſides theſe a certain man called Iſmael, of the Bloud Royal, a wicked and fraudulent man, who during the Siege of the City, had retired himſelf to Bathal, King of the Ammonites, and had ſojourned with him during all the troubles. When they were come together, Godolias adviſed them to remain in that Countrey, without any fear of the Babylonians, promiſing that in manuring their Land, they ſhould incurr no inconvenience. All which he confirmed unto them by an Oath; adding further, that if any diſturbance were offered to any man, he would readily aſſiſt him. He gave each one this advice likewiſe, to inhabit any City that they liked beſt: promiſing them to ſend them thither, C with ſuch things as appertained to them, to build them Houſes, and furniſh their Habitation; promiſing that when time ſerved, he would make proviſion of Corn, Wine and Oil, for their maintenance during the Winter; and when he had thus adviſed them, he gave them leave to depart, and inhabit the Countrey. Now when the rumor was ſpread amongſt the people of Judea, that Godolias had thus courteouſly entertained thoſe that were Fugitives, and how he had permitted them to Inhabit and Till the Countrey (provided that they payed their Tribute to the Babylonian) divers of them repaired to him, and inhabited the Countrey. And John and the other Governors being with him, and aſſured of his clemency, began entirely to love him. Wherefore they told him, that Bathal King of the Ammonites, had ſent Iſmael to murther him by D ſome Treachery, that by that means he might have the Dominion over the Iſraelites that remained, in that he was of the Bloud-Royal; perſwading him, that the only means to eſcape this Treaſon, was, to permit them to kill Iſmael in ſecret: aſſuring him on the contrary, that they feared, that if Iſmael ſhould happen to kill him, their whole Nation that remained, was like to fall to utter ruine. But Godolias replyed, that it was not probable that Iſmael, who had received nothing but kindneſs from his hands, ſhould make any attempt upon his life; and that having never been guilty of any unworthy action in the time of his neceſſity, he ſhould now make himſelf guilty of ſo great a Villany againſt his Benefactor, whom he ought, even with the hazard of his own life, to ſecure from the attempts of others. Yea, ſaid he, although thoſe things were true, which you inform me of, yet had I rather dye, than murther a man that had committed his life to my truſt. For which cauſe, John E and the reſt (ſeeing their perſwaſions were in vain) departed from him. Some thirty days after, Iſmael (accompanied with ten Men) came to Maſphath to Godolias, who received them with Preſents and magnificent Entertainment; ſo that to expreſs to Iſmael and his companions, how heartily they were welcome, Godolias drunk ſo hard, that he was ſomewhat overcame with Wine. Now when Iſmael perceived him overloaden with Drink and Sleep, he ſtept unto him with his ten aſſociates, and cut both his throat, and theirs, who kept him company at the Banquet; after which murther, he iſſued out by night, and ſlew all the Jews that were left in the City, and thoſe Babylonian Soldiers alſo that were left in Garriſon in that place. The next day there came F fourſcore Men of the Countrey to Godolias with Preſents, being utterly ignorant of that which had happened. Iſmael knowing them, called them unto him, as if he intended to bring them to Godolias, and as ſoon as they were entred, he locked the Court-Gates, and ſlew them, and afterwards caſt their bodies into a deep Ditch, to the intent they might not be diſcovered. Of this number there were ſome that eſcaped, who beſought him that they might not be put to death, before they had delivered certain Moveables, Garments and Corn that they had hidden in the field: which when Iſmael underſtood, he ſpared them: but he kept them priſoners that were in Maſphath, with their Wives and Children, in the number of whom were the Daughters of Zedechias, whom Nabuzaradan had left with Godolias. This done, he retired back again to the G King of the Ammonites. John, and the Governors of his company, hearing what was done by Iſmael in Maſphath, and above all, of the murther of Godolias, they were wonderfully inraged. ſo that each of them aſſembling his forces, iſſued forth to purſue

H Iſmael, whom they overtook near unto a Fountain in Hebron. The priſoners that were with Iſmael, ſeeing John and his Confederates, took courage, ſuppoſing that it was ſome ſuccors that came to help them, and forſook him that led them, and began to joyn with Johns followers: and thus fled Iſmael with his eight Men, to the King of the Ammonites, John gathering together all thoſe whom he had reſcued from Iſmaels hands, both Eunuchs Women, and Children, retired into a certain place called Mendra, where he ſojourned all that day, reſolving from thence to depart into Egypt, fearing leſt the Babylonians ſhould put him to death, if they ſhould remain in Judea, for that they would be diſpleaſed with the death of Godolias, whom they had placed in the Government.

Ver. 12. ad finem. John releaſeth Iſmaels Captives.

In this perplexity and diſtreſs, they addreſſed themſelves to the Prophet Jeremy, beſeeching him I to enquire of God, and to certify them, what it behoved them to do in this their doubtful Eſtate, binding themſelves by an Oath, to do that which Jeremy ſhould command them. Hereupon the Prophet promiſed that he would ask Counſel of God for them: and ſome ten days after God appeared unto him, and willed him to certify John, the Governors, and the reſt of the people, that if they inhabited Judea, he wou'd aſſiſt them, and take care of them, and ſecure them ſo, as the Babylonians (whom they feared) ſhould do them no harm: but if they departed into Egypt, he would abandon them, and deliver them over to the like miſery, as their brethren had endured in times paſt. Whileſt the Prophet thus warned them from God, they would not believe him, in that he commanded them to remain in that place, but they imagined, that under a falſe pretext of K Gods command, he had counſelled them thereto, but that in effect, he ſpake in favor of his Diſciple Baruch, perſwading them to ſtay there, to the end they might be conſumed by the Babylonians: Contemning therefore the counſel which God gave them by the Prophet; both John and the reſt of the multitude went into Egypt, and led with them both Baruch and Jeremy. Whither they were no ſooner come, but God told the Prophet, that the Babylonian ſhould lead his Army into Egypt; for which cauſe he willed him to foretell the people, that Egypt ſhould be deſtroyed, and that they ſhould partly be ſlain in that place, and partly led captive to Babylon. Which came in like manner to paſs: for in the fifth year after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem (which was the three and twentieth year of the Reign of Nabuchodonoſor) Nabuchodonoſor in his own perſon L led his Army into Cœloſyria, and having conquered the ſame, he made War upon the Ammonites and Moabites. And after he had brought theſe Nations under his obeyſance, he went and fought againſt the King of Egypt, and overcame him: and after he had ſlain their King that governed at that time, and planted another in his place, he afterwards took the Jews that he found in that Countrey, and carried them priſoners into Babylon. By this means we have learned, that the eſtate of the Hebrews, hath been tranſlated twice to the other ſide of Euphrates. For the people of the ten Tribes, during the Reign of Oſeas, were carried away captive by Salmanazar, King of the Aſſyrians, after he had taken Samaria; and the two Tribes by Nabuchodonoſor, King of the Babylonians and Chaldees, upon the taking in of Jeruſalem. True it is, that Salmanazar, after he had diſpleaſed M the Iſraelites, planted the Chutheans in their place, who before-time inhabited the innermoſt of the Countreys of Perſia and Media, and were called Samaritanes, according to the name of the place which they inhabited; but the Babylonian having led the two Tribes priſoners, hath not planted any other people in their places.

John asketh counſel of God, and being informed, refuſeth the ſame.

Jer. 43. per totum. The Prophecy of the Babylonian Army, and the Jews captivity.

For this cauſe, Judea, Jeruſalem, and the Temple, remained deſart for the ſpace of ſeventy years: and all the time that paſſed between the captivity of the Iſraelites, until the deſtruction of the two Tribes, was an hundred and thirty years, ſix moneths and ten days; but Nabuchodonoſor choſe the nobleſt young men amongſt the Jews (and ſuch as were allied to King Zedechias, and eſteemed likewiſe for the good diſpoſition, and fair proportion of their Bodies and Faces) and committed them to Maſters to be inſtructed, N commanding that every one of them ſhould be gelded, according as they were accuſtomed to deal with young Children of other Nations, whom he ſubdued by force. He allowed them Victuals from his own Table, and they were taught and inſtructed in the Diſcipline of the Countrey, and in the Chaldee Tongue. Theſe were very apt to learn Wiſdom: and for that cauſe he commanded that they ſhould be Trained up in the exerciſe thereof. Of theſe were four of Zedechias kindred, fair in Body, and virtuous in their Nature, who were called Daniel, Ananias, Miſael and Azarias; whoſe names the Babylonians changed, and appointed that they ſhould be called by other names, diſtinct and different from their own: Daniel was called Balthaſar; Ananias, Sidrach; Miſael, Miſach; and Azarias, Abednago. Theſe did the King eſteem very highly for their O excellent nature, and for the great affection that they had to attain unto Learning and Wiſdom, wherein they profited greatly, and were for that cauſe, highly eſteemed by him, and whereas Daniel and his kinſman thought good to live auſterely, and to ab-abſtain from thoſe Meats that came from the Kings Table, and in general from all things A that had life, they went to Aſkenas the Eunuch (who had the care and charge over them) beſeeching him to convert thoſe Meats to his own uſe, which were ſent from the Kings Table, and allow them Herbs and Dates, and ſuch things as had no life; becauſe they intended to hold that courſe of life, and to forſake all others. Askenas told them, that he was ready to condeſcend unto their demands; but that he feared, leſt being called for by the King, they ſhould be found to be lean in Body, and diſcoloured in Face (for without doubt, following that Diet, they muſt needs loſe their Beauty and Complexion) which might bring him in damage of his Head. They perceiving that Askenas intended nought elſe but his ſecurity, perſwaded him to allow them but ten days of approbation, under condition, that if by that regiment of Diet, their habitude of body B ſhould not be any ways altered, they might continue that courſe of life, which they had intended from that day forwards: but if they ſhould be found lean and weak, and leſs proportionable then they that fed upon the Kings allowance, that then they ſhould return to their accuſtomed Diet. Now it fell ſo out, that not only their Bodies were better in growth, but they ſeemed rather better fed, and of a taller ſtature than the reſt: ſo that they that lived upon the Kings allowance, ſeem'd lean and ill-favoured; whereas Daniel and his companions made ſhow, as if they had been nouriſhed with Dainties, and brought up in abundance. From that time forward, Askenas took all that which was allowed the four young Men from the Kings Table, and kept it to himſelf, giving them inſtead thereof, the Diet that they choſe and delighted in. They C having their ſpirits more pure and ſubtil to comprehend their Maſters inſtructions, and their Bodies more ſtrong to endure labour (for their ſpirits were not charged with diverſity of meats, nor their Bodies effeminated for the ſame cauſe) attained the more readily to all that Doctrine that was taught them by the Hebrews and Chaldees: Daniel eſpecially having profited in Wiſdom, ſtudied the interpretation of Dreams, and God appeared unto him. Two years after the Egyptian War, King Nabuchodonoſor dreamed a wonderful dream, the explication whereof, God gave unto him in his ſleep, but he forgat the ſame when he aroſe out of his Bed. And for that cauſe ſent he for his Chaldees and Divines, telling them that he had dreamed a dream, but that he had forgot the ſame, commanding them to declare unto him what the dream was, and the ſignification D thereof alſo. Whereunto they anſwered, that it was impoſſible for men to ſound out the ſecret thereof; notwithſtanding they promiſed him, that if he would declare his viſion unto them, they would cauſe him to underſtand the ſignification thereof. Hereupon Nabuchodonoſor threatened them with death, except they repreſented his dream unto him; and they proteſting that they could not fulfil his requeſt, he commanded them all to be ſlain. But Daniel hearing how the King had condemned all the Sages to death, and knowing that both he and his companions were concerned in that danger; addreſſed himſelf to Ariochus, the Captain of the Kings Guard, requiring him to inform him, for what cauſe the King had adjudged the Chaldees and Sages to be put to death: and having told what had happened, as touching the dream, and how the King forgetting the E ſame, had charged them to inform him therein; and how they had anſwered, that it was impoſſible for them to perform the ſame, and how thereby they had provoked the King to diſpleaſure: he beſought Ariochus to go unto the King, and to procure one nights reprieve on the behalf of the Egyptians and Chaldees, in that he hoped during that night to beſeech God, and intreat from him both the Dream and the ſignification thereof. Hereupon Ariochus told the King what Daniel had requeſted, and he thereupon reſpited the execution of the Magicians for that night, until he might ſee what would become of Daniels promiſe: who retiring himſelf with his companions into his chamber, beſought God all the night long to manifeſt unto him the dream, and deliver the Magicians and Chaldees from the Kings wrath, with whom, both he and the reſt of his companions were like to dye, except he might know what the King had dreamt the night paſt, and what F was the interpretation thereof. Whereupon God (having compaſſion of the danger wherein they were, and taking pleaſure in Daniels wiſdom) ſignified unto him both the dream, and the ſignification thereof, to the intent the King might be reſolved of the meaning thereof.

v. 20. ad 24. The Viſion and the Revelation thereof opened to Daniel.

Daniel having received the truth from God, aroſe very joyfully, and certified his Brethren (who had already loſt all hope of life, and thought on nothing but death) and gave them courage and hope. Having therefore rendred thanks unto God, for that he had had compaſſion of their younger years, as ſoon as it was day, he went unto Ariochus, requeſting him that he might be brought to the Kings preſence, aſſuring him, G that he would open unto him the dream which he had ſeen the night paſt. Now when Daniel was brought unto the Kings Preſence, he beſought him that he would not eſteem him to hath had compaſſion on us that were in danger of death; and at ſuch time as I requeſted him to grant me, and my Countrey-men life, he hath certified me both of your Dream, and the ſignification thereof. I was not ſo much aggrieved, for that in our innocency we were adjudged to death by thee, as concerned for thy reputation and renown, which was hazarded by condemning ſo many, and ſo innocent, and juſt men to death: whereas that which you have required of them, ſavoureth nothing of humane wit, but is the only work of God: Whileſt therefore thou thoughtſt in thy ſelf, who it was that ſhould command the whole world after thy ſelf, at ſuch time as thou wert aſleep, God intending to let thee know all thoſe that ſhould govern* I after thee, preſented thee with this Dream. It ſeemed unto thee, that thou ſaweſt a great Statue, whereof the Head was of Gold, the Shoulders and Arms of Silver; the Belly and Thighs of Braſs; and the Legs and Feet of Iron. Thou beheldeſt after that, a great Stone (that was drawn from a Mountain) that fell upon the Statue, and beat down and burſt the ſame, and left no whole piece thereof; ſo that the Gold, Silver, Iron and Braſs, were powdered as ſmall as duſt: whereupon a violent wind ſeemed to blow, which by the fury and force thereof, was born away and ſcattered into divers Countreys: on the other ſide the ſtone grew ſo mighty, that it ſeemed to fill the whole Earth, This was that Viſion that appeared unto you; the ſignification whereof is expreſſed after this manner. The Head K of Gold ſignifieth your ſelf (and thoſe Kings of Babylon that have been before you.) The two Hands and Shoulders ſignify, that your Empire ſhall be reſtored by two Kings, the one part by the King of the Eaſt, cloathed in Braſs, whoſe force ſhall be abated by another power reſembling that of iron, and he ſhall have the power over the whole Earth, by reaſon of the nature of Into, which is more ſtrong than Gold, Silver, or Braſs; he told the King alſo what the Stone ſignified. But for mine own part, I thought it not expedient to expreſs in this place: becauſe the only deſign, and intent of my Writings, is to regiſter ſuch things as are paſt, and not ſuch matters as are to come. But if any man be ſo curious as to enquire into theſe things; and to underſtand ſuch matters as are hidden, let him read the Book of Daniel, which he ſhall find amidſt the Sacred Scriptures.

L When King Nabuchodonoſor had heard thoſe things, and remembred himſelf of his Dream, he was aſtoniſhed at Daniels wiſdom, and caſting himſelf proſtrate on the Earth, after the manner of thoſe that adore God, he embraced Daniel, giving direction that ſacrifice ſhould be offered unto him, as if he were God. Moreover, he called him by the name of God, and committed the adminiſtration of his whole Kingdom, to him and his companions, who, by reaſon of the conſpiracies of their malignours and detractours, happened to fall into moſt imminent and dreadful danger, upon the occaſion that enſueth. The King built a Golden Image, ſixty Cubits high, and ſix in bigneſs, and erected it in a great Plain, near unto Babylon: and being ready to dedicate the ſame, he aſſembled all the Governours and Princes of his Countreys, M commanding them firſt of all, that as ſoon as they ſhould hear the Trumpet ſound, they ſhould proſtrate themſelves on the Earth to adore the Statue; threatening that whoſoever ſhould do the contrary, he ſhould be caſt into a burning Furnace: whereas therefore all of them adored the Statue upon the ſound of the Trumpet; Daniel and his companions utterly refuſed to perform that duty; alledging for their juſtification, that they would not tranſgreſs the Laws of their Countrey: for which cauſe, being apprehended, they were inſtantly caſt into the Furnace of Fire, (and protected therein by Gods providence) eſcaped death beyond all mens expectation.
For the fire touched them not, neither could it burn, during their abode in the Furnace.
For God ſo defended their Bodies, that they could not be conſumed by fire; which miracle made them in great eſtimation with the King, for that he ſaw that they N were virtuous, and beloved of God: and for that cauſe they were highly honoured by him. Not long after this, the King ſaw another Viſion in his ſleep, which ſignified unto him, that being caſt from his Empire, he ſhould converſe with Savage Beaſts, and that having lived in that eſtate in the Deſart, for the ſpace of ſeven years, he ſhould recover his Kingdom again. Having had this Dream, he aſſembled the Magicians once more, demanding their anſwer, and the ſignification thereof. But it was impoſſible for any one of them, either to find out, or declare the meaning of this Dream unto the King: Onely Daniel diſcovered the ſame, and the effect was anſwerable to his prediction.
For the King paſſed the fore-limited time in the Deſart, ſo that no man durſt intermeddle O with the affairs of Eſtate during ſeven years. But after he had called upon God, that it would pleaſe him to reſtore him to his Kingdom, he repoſſeſſed the ſame again. Let no man in this place accuſe me for reporting theſe particularities, according as I have found them written in Holy Books: for in the entrance of my Hiſtory, I have A anſwered thoſe objections: ſo that I have openly proteſted, that I will onely faithfully tranſlate the Hebrew Hiſtories into the Greek tongue: and according to my promiſe, relate that which is contained therein, without adding any thing of mine own, or concealing ought of another mans. After that Nabuchodonoſor had reigned fourty three years, he dyed: he was a man of good Conduct, and more happy than any of his Predeceſſors.

Beroſus maketh mention of his acts, in the third Book of the Chaldaique Hiſtory, where he ſpeakth thus. His Father Nabuchodonoſor, having notice that the Governour whom he had appointed over Egypt, and the neighboring parts of Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, was revolted from him (being at that time in himſelf unable to endure the troubles of War) committed a part of his Forces unto his Son Nabuchodonoſor, who was in the flower of his age, B and ſent him forth againſt them, who encountring the Rebels, and fighting with them, overcame them, and brought the Countrey under his ſubjection. Mean while, Nabuchodonoſor the Father died of a ſickneſs in Babylon, after he had Reigned One and twenty years. Nabuchodonoſor the Son, having notice of his Fathers death, gave order to the affairs of Egypt, and the reſt of the Countrey: and committing the care and tranſportation of the Jews, Syrians, Egyptians, and Phœnicians to his friends, to bring them to Babylon with his Army and Carriage, he with a few Men, made haſty journeys thorow the Deſart. And when he had taken the adminiſtration of the Kingdom upon him (which in his abſence, was in the hands of the Chaldees, and by their Chieftain was reſerved until his return, unto his uſe) he became Lord of all his Fathers Empire. When his priſoners were arrived, he aſſigned them convenient C dwelling places in the Countrey of Babylon; and with the ſpoils of War, he magnificently repaired and decked the Temple of Bell, and other places. He enlarged the old City, and repaired and beautified it with other buildings; by means whereof, they that would beſiege the ſame, were hindred from cutting off the current of the River, to the prejudice of the Inhabitants. He invironed it within with a treble Wall, and outwardly with as mighty and as many encloſures, and made all of burnt Brick. The Walls were magnificently builded, and the Gates bravely adorned in manner of Temples. He cauſed a Palace to be builded near unto his Fathers antient Palace: the magnificence and ornaments whereof, I am not able to expreſs; onely this thing moſt memorable, I have thought good to note, that theſe great and pompous Buildings were finiſhed in fifteen days. In this Palace he had Vaults D raiſed ſo high, that in outward appearance they ſeemed to be Mountains, on which all ſorts of Trees were planted. He deviſed and prepared alſo a goodly Garden, and called it the hanging Garden, becauſe (his Wife having been brought up in the Countrey of Media) deſired at Babylon, to ſee ſome reſemblance of her own Countrey. Megaſthenes, in the fourth Book of his Indian Hiſtory, *maketh mention of this Garden in that place, Evilmerodach died in the eighteenth year of his Reign, and Nigliſar his Son obtained the

Dan. 5. 5, 6, 7, ad 30.
Balthaſar ſeeth a hand thruſt out of a Wall, and writing certain Syllables.

H Balthaſar ſate upon a certain Feſtival day in a Royal Chamber, where he was ſerved with great ſtore of Veſſels fit for his Majeſty; and with him at the Banquet there ſate his Concubines, and moſt intimate friends. At which time (to ſhew his Magnificence) he cauſed thoſe Veſſels to be brought out of the Temple of his God, which Nabuchodonoſor his predeceſſor (fearing to employ to his own uſe) had ſtored up in his Idols Temple.
But Balthaſar was ſo puffed with pride, that he drank out of them, and employed them to his own uſe. Now came it to paſs, that whileſt he quaffed, and blaſphemed the Name of God, he ſaw a hand iſſuing from a Wall, which wrote on the ſame certain words: by which Viſion being ſomewhat terrified, he aſſembled his Magicians and Chaldees, and all that ſort of people (who amongſt thoſe barbarous Nations made profeſſion to interpret I Prodigies and Dreams) to the intent they might ſignify unto him the meaning and ſignification of that Writing. Now when theſe Magicians had told them that they could not give an interpretation of it, the King was ſore vexed and troubled at this unexpected Viſion: whereupon he cauſed it to be proclaimed thorow his Countrey, that whoſoever ſhould read that Writing, and declare the meaning thereof, he would give him a Golden Chain, and a Purple Robe (ſuch as the King of the Chaldees wore) and beſides all this, the third part of his Empire. After this Proclamation the Magicians aſſembled together with a great concourſe, and were far more diligent and inquiſitive to find out the ſignification of the Writing: but they advanced nothing more than at the firſt.
Mean while, the Kings Grandmother ſeeing him wholly dejected in mind, began to comfort K him, and to tell him that there was a certain man amongſt the priſoners of Juda, led thither at ſuch time as Nabuchodonoſor deſtroyed Jeruſalem, whoſe name was Daniel, a man wiſe and expert in ſearching out of things that were onely known unto God, who evidently expounded that which Nabuchodonoſor required, at ſuch time as no other man could ſatisfy his demand. Whereupon the King called him unto his Preſence, and telling him what proofs he had heard of his Wiſdom, and of that Divine Spirit that was in him, and how he onely was fit to interpret thoſe things which were concealed from other mens knowledge; he prayed him to inform him what that hand-writing ſignified, promiſing him in reward thereof, a Purple Garment, a Golden Chain, and the third part of his Empire: to the end, that being honoured with theſe rewards for his wiſdom, L he might grow famous amongſt all men, who demanding the reaſon, ſhould know the intent why he was honoured. But Daniel (refuſing all theſe Preſents of his, in that the wiſdom that is given from above, is not corrupted thereby, but is freely imparted to thoſe that have need thereof) told him that that Writing did foretell the end of his life, becauſe he had not learned to fear God, neither to lift up his thoughts higher than humane nature, notwithſtanding he had ſeen the chaſtiſement wherewith his predeceſſor had been puniſhed, for the outrages he committed againſt God. For that Nabuchodonoſor having been driven to lead his life amongſt Beaſts, by reaſon of his Impieties, after divers requeſts and ſupplications, had obtained mercy, and was returned unto humane converſation, and into his own Kingdom, for which cauſe all the time of M his life, he praiſed Almighty God, the Governour of all things: whereas he had omitted to do the like, and had blaſphemed the name of God, and had debauched himſelf with his Concubines in the Veſſels dedicated to God: For this cauſe, God was diſpleaſed with him, and certified him by his Writing, what end he ſhould expect. Whereupon he expounded the Writings after this manner: Mane (which is as much to ſay, as number) ſheweth that God hath numbred the days of thy Life and Reign, which ſhall endure but a little while; Thekel ſignifieth a balance; God therefore (ſaid he) weighing the government, ſheweth that it ſhall be overthrown: Phares, this word ſignifieth a fragment, God ſhall break thy Kingdom, and divide it among the Medes and Perſians. When the King had heard this interpretation, he was very ſorrowful (according N as the nature of things ſo diſaſterous and ſo apparent required. (Notwithſtanding he delayed not to beſtow thoſe Preſents which he had promiſed the Prophet, although (as he well perceived) the words boaded him ill, yet he gave him all that which he promiſed him, conſidering with himſelf, that it was his own deſtiny that he ought to accuſe, and not Daniel, who like an honeſt man had declared the Truth, notwithſtanding it were very unwelcome to his ear. Not long after this, Balthaſar and the City were overthrown and taken by Cyrus King of Perſia and his Army; For this was that Balthaſar, under whom, and in the ſeventeenth year of whoſe Reign, the ſurpriſal of Babylon hapened. This as far as I could gather, was the end of King Nebuchodonoſors poſterity.

into Media, and kept him near unto him, doing him much honour, for he was of the num- A ber of three Governours whom he conſtituted over three hundred and threeſcore Provinces; for ſo had Darius commanded it. Now Daniel being thus honoured and beloved by Darius, and truſted by him in all things, for that God was with him, was much hated; as they uſually are, who have the greateſt intereſt in Princes favours. Whereas therefore they that were jealous of the good eſteem which he had with Darius, ſought occaſi-on to calumniate and backbite him, he warily cut off all opportunity thereof; for he would neither be bribed with Silver, nor corrupted with Preſents, ſuppoſing it to be an act of much diſhoneſty to receive gifts after a man had done any courteſies. He therefore gave his maligners no manner of ground to detract from his reputation. But they ſtill perſiſted in their malice, and all other attempts failing, they thought upon one at laſt, by B which they imagined they might deſtroy him; For they perceiving, that Daniel did thrice every day make his Pray'rs unto God, they ſuppoſed that they had found a juſt pretext to work his ruine. Whereupon they came unto Darius, certifying him, that the Princes and Governours had concluded together, to this effect: that for 30 days ſpace, an intermiſſion ſhould be granted to the people; during which time, it was neither lawful for them to demand any thing, neither of himſelf, or of any man or God whatſoever; and if any man ſhould attempt any thing againſt this common decree, it was ordered, that he ſhould be caſt into the Lions Den. But the King not perceiving the drift of their malice, nor how they ſought by this device to entrap Daniel, told them, that he liked of the decree, and promiſed to confirm the ſame, and made a publick Edict, wherein the Princes C reſolutions were ratified. Now whileſt all men endeavoured through fear, carefully and diligently to obſerve this Edict; Daniel ſet light thereby, and according to his accuſtomed manner, ſtanding in all mens ſight, he worſhiped his God, and prayed unto him.
Whereupon the Princes (having got that occaſion which they long expected) came readily unto the King, and accuſed Daniel, for that he onely amongſt the reſt, had preſumed to infringe their Decree: urging moreover, that he did it not for his Religion ſake, but in contempt of the Kings Edict. And becauſe they feared, leſt Darius, by reaſon of the great affection he bare unto Daniel, ſhould be ready to pardon him (notwithſtanding he had tranſgreſſed their Edict) they preſſed him earneſtly to inflict the puniſhment which was threatened by the Law, and to caſt him into the Lions Den, according to the D form of the Edict. Darius hoping that God would deliver Daniel, and that no harm ſhould befall him by the jaws of wild Beaſts, exhorted him patiently to endure that Trial. Now as ſoon as he was caſt into the Den, the King ſealed up the Stone that cloſed the mouth thereof, and departed, ſpending all that night without repaſt or repoſe, ſo much was he concerned in Daniels behalf. And when the day was come, as ſoon as he aroſe, he came unto the Den, and finding the Seal unbroken, wherewith he had marked the Stone, he opened the ſame, and called unto Daniel with a loud voice, asking him if he were in ſafety? He hearing the King ſpeak, anſwered, that he had received no hurt. Whereupon Darius commanded that they ſhould draw him out of the Lions Den. His adver-ſaries perceiving that Daniel had eſcaped without harm (becauſe that God had taken E care of him) would not that he ſhould eſcape: and thereupon told the King, that the Lions did neither touch nor approach Daniel, becauſe they had been fed and gorged before. For which cauſe the King diſpleaſed with their injurious malice, commanded a quantity of fleſh to be caſt unto the Lions; and when they were glutted, he commanded that Daniels enemies ſhould be caſt among them, to the intent he might know, whether the Lions would touch them or no, when they were gorged. At which time Darius ſaw very manifeſtly, that God had by his power protected Daniel from death. For as ſoon as the Nobles were caſt into the Den, the Lions ſpared not one of them, but tore them all in pieces, as if they had been hungry and without meat. I ſuppoſe that theſe Lions having been a little before glutted with meat, did not ſlay theſe men to ſatisfy their hunger, but I rather F judge that their crimes provoked the rage and fury of the Beaſts: for when God pleaſeth, he maketh even unreaſonable creatures to execute his vengeance againſt wicked men. Daniels adverſaries being thus deſtroyed, Darius gave notice hereof to all the Subjects of his Provinces, praiſing that God whom Daniel had adored; ſaying that he was the only true God, who had all power: he honoured Daniel likewiſe with eſpecial regard, eſteeming him amongſt the chiefeſt of his Familiars. He therefore being thus renowned (becauſe he was beloved by God) built in Ecbatane in the Countrey of the Medes a magnificent Caſtle, and a marvellous Monument, that remaineth even unto this day, which ſeemeth to thoſe that look thereon, that it is but newly built, and made but that very day which they behold the ſame; the Beauty G thereof ſeemeth ſo lively and perfect, as that continuance of time doth in no ſort deface it. For it fareth with Buildings as with Men, they wax old, and are infeebled by years, and loſe their Beauty. At this day, all the Kings of Media, Daniels Prophecies.

H Perſia and Parthia, are entombed in this Caſtle, and the charge thereof is committed to a Prieſt, who is a Jew: and this cuſtome continueth even until this day. Neither is that to be buried in ſilence, which is worthy eſpecial admiration in this man: For all felicity that could be expected by a famous Prophet, attended him; and during his whole life-time, he was both moſt highly honoured by Kings, and reverenced by the common ſort: and after his death, his memory is immortal. For all the Books which he left in writing, are read amongſt us even at this preſent; and we have been perſwaded by the reading thereof, that Daniel had conference with God. For he hath not only Prophecied of things to come (as other Prophets have done) but alſo hath determined the time wherein thoſe things ſhould happen. And whereas other Prophets, were I accuſtomed to foretell adverſities, and for that occaſion were miſliked both by Princes and their People; Daniel foretold them always good ſucceſſes; ſo that he hath drawn unto him the good will of all men, by reaſon of thoſe pleaſing Predictions that he pronounced; and by the iſſues thereof, he hath obtained a teſtimony of Truth, and a reputation, to have had in time, a Spirit that was truly Divine, and hath left us certain Writings, by which he hath manifeſtly declared the immutability and exact certainty of his Prophecies.

Dan. 7. 3. ad 27.

Daniels Viſion of the Ram and Goat, by whom the Kings of Media and Perſia were prefigured.

It is ſaid, that being at Suſa, the Metropolitan City of Perſia, at ſuch time as he walked abroad, attended by his Familiars, that there happened an Earthquake, with a great noiſe: ſo that he was left alone, and all his companions fled from him. And that K thereupon, being ſore troubled, he fell upon his Face, and both his Hands: at which time ſome one touched him, and commanded him to ſtand up, and to ſee that which ſhould happen to his Countrey-men after divers ages. Being therefore raiſed upright, there was a great Ram ſhewed unto him, that had divers Horns, the laſt whereof was the greateſt of all. Afterwards he looked towards the Weſt, and perceived a Goat carried thorow the Air, that butted at the Ram, and having encountred him twice, had beaten and trampled him under his Feet. Thirdly, he ſaw a Goat, in whoſe forehead there grew one great Horn onely: which being broken, four others brake out inſtead thereof, bending each of them towards the four Winds of the World. He hath written alſo, that from them, there ſhall ariſe another little one alſo, which as God L (who preſented the Viſion to him) told him, being grown to perfection, ſhould war againſt the whole Nation of the Jews, and take the City by force, and confound the Eſtate of the Temple, and hinder the Sacrifices, for one thouſand two hundred ninety and ſix days.

Daniel writeth that he ſaw theſe things in the field of Suſa, and hath declared that God himſelf told him what that Viſion ſignified; which was, that the Ram ſignified the Kingdoms of the Perſians, and the Medes: His Horns ſignified the Kings that were to Reign in thoſe Kingdoms; and that the laſt Horn ſignified the laſt King, who ſhould ſurpaſs all the reſt in Riches and Glory. That the Goat ſignified, that there ſhould come a certain King among the Greeks, who ſhould fight at two ſeveral times with the Perſian, M and ſhould overcome him in War; and afterwards poſſeſs the whole Government: And that by the great Horn that grew in the forehead of the Goat, the firſt King was repreſented; and how that after he was taken away, four other ſhould ſpring out of it. And whereas every one of theſe turned themſelves towards the four corners of the World, it was a ſigne, that after the death of the firſt, he ſhould have four ſucceſſors, that ſhould part the Kingdom between them, who neither ſhould be his Allies or Children; yet ſuch notwithſtanding, as ſhould command the world for many years: That from them, there ſhould ariſe a certain King, that ſhould oppoſe himſelf againſt the Hebrew Nation, and their Laws, and ſhould overthrow their policy, ſpoil their Temple, and be a lett that for three years ſpace, the Sacrifices ſhould not be ſolemnized. Now ſo hath it N happened, that our Nation hath been ſo handled under Antiochus the famous, as Daniel had foreſeen, and hath written divers years before, all that which ſhould happen.

At the ſame time Daniel wrote concerning the Empire of the Romans, how it ſhould deſtroy our Nation: and hath left all theſe things in writing, according as God declared them unto him; ſo that they who read and conſider thoſe things that have happened, admire Daniel for the Honour God dignified him with, and find thereby, that the Epicureans are miſtaken, who exclude all Divine Providence from intermedling with the concerns of humane life, and affirm, that God Governeth not the affairs of the World; or that the World is ruled by a happy and incorruptible Eſſence, which cauſeth all things to continue in their Being: but ſay, that the world is managed by O it ſelf, by caſualty, without any Conductor, or ſuch a one that hath care thereof. For if it were ſo, and that it were deſtitute of a Soveraign Governor (as we ſee Ships deſtitute of their Pilots to be drowned by the Winds; and Chariots that have no Drivers

By theſe things therefore that Daniel hath foretold, I judge, that they are far eſtranged from the Truth, that affirm, that God hath no care of humane affairs; for if we ſee that all things happen caſual, then happen they not according to his Prophecy. But I have written hereof, according as I have found and read: and if any one will think otherwiſe, let him continue his opinion as long as he pleaſeth.

THE firſt year of the Reign of Cyrus (which was the 70 after that our Nation was tranſlated from Judea to Babylon) God had compaſſion on the captivity and calamity of his afflicted People: and accompliſh'd that which he had foretold by the Prophet Jeremy, before the deſtruction of the City, viz. That after they had ſerved Nabuchodonoſor and his poſterity for 70 years, he would again reſtore them to their native Countrey, where they ſhould build a Temple, and enjoy their former felicity, Eſay. Chap. 44. Ver. 5. ad 10. Chap. 45. Ver. 1. ad 8. Prophecy of Cyrus.

For he awakened the Spirit of Cyrus, and put it into his heart to write Letters throughout all Aſia, to this effect: Thus ſaith King Cyrus, ſince Almighty God hath made me King of the whole world, I am perſwaded that it is he whom the Jewiſh Nation do adore: for he hath declared my name by his Prophets, before I was born, and hath ſaid, that I ſhould build his Temple in Jeruſalem, which is in the Countrey of Judea. Now Cyrus knew theſe things by Reading of a Book of Prophecies, written by Eſay, two hundred and ten years before his time. For (he ſaith) that God did ſecretly reveal theſe things unto him, ſpeaking to this effect; I will that Cyrus, whom I have declared King over many Nations, ſhall ſend my people back into their Countrey of Judea, and ſhall build my Temple. Theſe things did Eſay foretell one hundred and forty years before the ruine of the Temple. Cyrus in reading theſe things (being raviſhed in admiration of the Majeſty of God) was carried on with a great affection and zeal, to finiſh that which was written. He therefore called for all the Men of greateſt account among the Jews that were in Babylon, and told them that he gave them Licence to return into their Countrey, and to repair the City of Jeruſalem, and to rebuild the Temple of God; promiſing them that he himſelf would aſſiſt them. And to that effect he wrote unto his Governours, and Princes of thoſe Countreys that confined upon Judea: charging them to contribute both Gold and Silver towards the building of the Temple, and to furniſh them with Cattel for the Sacrifices. After that Cyrus had certified the Iſraelites of this his intent, the Princes of the two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, with all the Levites and Prieſts, Ver. 3. Cyrus permitteth the Jews to return into their Countrey to build their Temple and City.

H Prieſts departed thence, and repaired to Jeruſalem: Nevertheleſs, divers of the Jews remained in Babylon, becauſe they were loth to abandon thoſe Poſſeſſions they had gotten.
Thoſe unto whom Cyrus had directed his Letters, afforded them their aſſiſtance, and furniſhed them with all things neceſſary to build the Temple, ſome of them with Gold, others with Silver, and the reſt with a certain number of Oxen and Horſes. Thus payed they their Vows unto God, and offered Sacrifices according to the antient cuſtom, as if they had but now firſt begun to build the City, and this were the third time of practiſing thoſe Ceremonies, which our Fathers had obſerved. Cyrus ſent them back alſo thoſe Veſſels, which were conſecrated to God, (which King Nabuchodonoſor had ſent unto Babylon, after he had ſpoiled the Temple) and delivered them I to Mithridates his Treaſurer, commanding him to commit them to Abaſſars hands, who ſhould have the cuſtody thereof, until the Temple were built, to the end, that a ſuch time as it ſhould be compleat, he might deliver them to the Prieſts and Princes of the people, to be reſtored again to the ſervice of the Temple. He ſent Letters alſo to the Governors of Syria to this effect: Cyrus the King to Siſine, and Sarabaſme, health. *I have permitted thoſe Jews that inhabit my Countrey, to return into their native Countrey, and to reedify

K Countrey affordeth; the Altar likewiſe, whereupon they may offer Sacrifice unto God: And my pleaſure is that the charge of all theſe things be defrayed out of my Coffers. I have alſo ſent back WHileſt according to the King's Order, the Jews laid the foundation of the Temple, and were very buſy about the building thereof; the Nations that bordered upon them, and eſpecially the Chutheans, (whom Salmanazar, King of Aſſyria, Health. Having read your Letters, I have commanded the Records of mine Anceſtors to be examined, and I find that the City of Jeruſalem hath been always an enemy to their Kings, and that the inhabitants thereof have always raiſed Sedition and Wars. I have likewiſe found, that their Kings have been mighty, and that they have exacted from Syria and Phœnicia continual C Tributes. For this cauſe I have ordained, that the Jews ſhall not be permitted to re-edify their City, for fear, leſt the boldneſs of that people being thereby encouraged, they ſhould, according

Rathymus and the Scribe Semelius, and thoſe of their faction, took horſe, and rode ſpeedily to Jeruſalem, leading with them a great number of People, and prohibiting the Jews from the building their City or Temple. Thus was this work interrupted, until the ſecond year of the Reign of Darius, King of Perſia, for the ſpace of nine years. For Cambyſes reigned ſix years, during which time he ſubdued Egypt, and upon his rereturn Darius voweth to ſend the ſacred Veſſels to Ieruſalem. Zerobabel.

DArius, during the time that he lived a private life, made a vow unto God, that if he obtained the Kingdom, he would ſend back unto the Temple of Jeruſalem, all thoſe Veſſels which were as yet remaining in Babylon. It fell out that about the ſame time that he was made King, Zerobabel, who was appointed Governor over the Captive Jews, came unto him from Jeruſalem. And being the Kings antient friend: he, with two others, had three of the Principal Offices of the King's Houſe conferred upon them, and were placed the neareſt about his perſon. The firſt year of the Reign of Darius, he entertained all his Courtiers with great pomp and magnificence, both thoſe of his Houſhold, and thoſe alſo that were his Governors and Princes of Media and Perſia, and the Commanders in India, confining upon Ethiopia, with all the Chieftains F of his Army, in one hundred twenty and ſeven Provinces. Now after they had Feaſted, and were full of Wine, they departed each of them unto their Lodgings, to betake themſelves to reſt: but King Darius being laid in his Bed, repoſed very little all the night long, but paſſed the time without ſleep: Whereupon, ſeeing he could not compoſe himſelf to reſt, he began to diſcourſe with theſe three great Officers, promiſing unto him that ſhould moſt truly and aptly anſwer thoſe queſtions that he ſhould demand, to grant him licence, by way of reward, to wear a Purple Garment, and to drink in a Golden Cup, to lye on a Golden Bed, and to ride in a Chariot, whoſe Horſes Chain about his neck, and ſit in the next place to the King; and ſhould likewiſe G promiſes, he demanded of the firſt, whether Wine were the ſtrongeſt? of the ſecond, whether Darius propoundeth three queſtions to three of his Guard.

H Whether the King were ſtronger? of the third, Whether Women, or Truth, were the ſtrongeſt of the three? As ſoon as he had deliver'd them theſe queſtions to deliberate upon, he laid him down to reſt. Upon the morrow he ſent for the Princes, Chieftains, and Governors of Perſia and Media, and afterwards ſitting aloft in that Throne from whence he was accuſtomed to determine controverſies between his ſubjects, he commanded thoſe three young men, in the preſence of that Princely Aſſembly, publickly to reſolve thoſe queſtions which he had propoſed.

The year of the World, 3443, before Chriſt's Nativity, 521.

Whereupon the firſt of them began after this manner to expreſs the force of Wine: Noble Princes, when I conſider the force of Wine, I find nothing that can ſurpaſs it: for Wine diſturbeth the judgment, and maketh the Princes underſtanding like to that of a Child, who hath I need of one that ſhould always direct him: It giveth the ſlave that freedom in diſcourſe, which his thraldom had deprived him of: It equalleth the poor man to the rich: It changeth and transformeth the ſoul, aſſuageth the miſerable mans grief, and maketh the Priſoners forget their bonds, and think themſelves very rich; ſo that they think not on mean things, but talk of Talents, and ſuch things as appertain unto the moſt wealthy: It cauſeth them to loſe all apprehenſion both of Princes and Kings, and taketh from them the remembrance of their friends and familiars: It armeth them againſt their greateſt friends, and maketh them ſuppoſe their neareſt relations to be ſtrangers; and when the Wine, concocted by night and ſleep, hath forſaken them, they riſe, and know not what they have committed in their drunkenneſs.

The firſt expreſſeth the power of wine.

When the firſt of them had ſpoken thus in favor of Wine, he that had undertaken to K ſhew, that nothing was equal to the power of Kings, began after this manner: Kings (ſaith he) have dominion over men, who govern the earth, and at their pleaſure can command the Sea to ſerve them: Kings have power and dominion over thoſe men who maſter and command the moſt untamed and mightieſt creatures; it therefore appeareth that their force and puiſſance exceedeth that of all theſe. If they command their ſubjects to wage War, and to expoſe themſelves to danger, they are obedient; and if they ſend them out againſt their enemies, they willingly obey them, by reaſon of their force: By their command they level Mountains, beat down Walls, and raze Towers. And if they command their ſubjects to kill or be killed, they reſiſt not, for fear leſt they ſhould ſeem to tranſgreſs the Kings commandment. When they have obtained the victory, all the glory and profit of the War redoundeth unto the King. They likewiſe L that bear no Arms, but intend the tillage of the earth, after they have born all the toil, they reap and gather the fruits, to the end they may pay the King his tribute: And if he will or command any thing, it muſt be performed without any delay. Furthermore, when the King is addicted to any pleaſures, or intendeth to enjoy his reſt, during the time that he ſleepeth, he is guarded by thoſe that watch, who are, as it were, tyed unto him, through the fear and awe they have of him: For not one of them dare forſake him when he ſleepeth, nor depart from him, to follow their own affairs, but intend thoſe ſervices only which he thinketh neceſſary, which is the guard of his perſon. Who therefore will not eſteem the Kings force to be greater than any others, ſince ſo many people obey him in whatſoever he commandeth?

The ſecond extolleth the Kings power. Eſdr. 3, 4.

After he had ſpoken to this effect, Zorobabel, who was the third, began to ſpeak of the M power of Women and Truth, after this manner: True it is, that Wine hath much force, and no leſs true, that all men obey the King; yet far more mighty is the power of a Woman.
For by a Woman the King was bred, and brought into this world; and thoſe men that plant the Vineyards where Wines do grow, are born and nouriſhed by Women; and generally there is not any thing which we enjoy not by their means. For they weave us garments; they have the care and cuſtody of our houſes; neither is it poſſible for us to be ſevered from Women. Yea, they that poſſeſs much gold, and abundance of ſilver, and other things of great and ineſtimable price, only upon the ſight of a fair Woman, forſake all theſe things, and will follow after the beauty which they beheld, and for the poſſeſſion thereof, content themſelves to loſe all things. We forſake likewiſe our Father and Mother, and the Countrey that hath bred us, and forget our Friends N for our Wives ſake; yea, we will willingly content our ſelves to dye with them. Yet is there a greater and further demonſtration of the moſt mighty power of a Woman: For whatſoever we travel for, all the pains that we endure both by Land and Sea, to the intent we may reap ſome fruits of our labours, do we not carry all this to give unto our Wives, as unto thoſe who were our Miſtreſſes? I have ſeen the King likewiſe, who is ſo great a Lord, endure a ſtroke on the ear, by Apame the daughter of Rhapſaces his Concubine, and patiently ſuffer her to take the Diadem from his head, and ſet it on her own. When ſhe laughed, he laughed; and when ſhe was diſpleaſed, he was diſpleaſed: and according as her paſſion changed, ſo he complyed, and humbly ſubmitted his affection to her pleaſures, according as he ſaw her paſſionate or pleaſed.

Zorobabel, the third, expreſſeth the power of women, and at length attributeth the palm unto truth.

But whil'ſt the Princes, in way of admiration, beheld one another, he began to diſ-O courſe of Truth, ſaying: I have already declared what the force of Women is; yet notwithſtanding both the King and they are more feeble than Truth. For whereas the earth is huge and vaſt, the heaven likewiſe of an immeaſurable height, and the ſun of unſpeakable celerity; and whereas the Will of God both governeth and moveth theſe things (becauſe God is juſt and true) it therefore followeth, that Truth is the moſt mighty of all things; againſt which, injuſtice may no ways prevail. Furthermore, all other things, notwithſtanding they ſeem to be of value, yet are they mortal, and of little continuance: but Truth is immortal, and everlaſting. Moreover, all thoſe things which we receive thereby, are neither mortal, nor ſubject to the injuries of time, fortune, or alteration, but continue equal, and ſeparated from all ſtain of injuſtice. When Zorobabel had ſpoken after this manner, he made an end of his diſcourſe: whereupon, all the Aſſembly began to pronounce that his Aſſertions were of moſt value, and that only Verity had an immutable force, and an undeterminable continuance. Whereupon the King commanded him to ask what he would, as touching that which he had promiſed to give, becauſe he intended to grant it him, as to the wiſeſt, and beſt learned amongſt the reſt. For (ſaid he) thou ſhalt ſit henceforth next unto me, and ſhalt be called my friend.

1 Eſd. 6. v. 7, 8, ad 16.

When the King had ſpoken thus, Zorobabel called to remembrance the vow that the King had made, if ſo be at any time he obtain'd the Kingdom: namely, That he would build Jeruſalem, and the Temple of God, and reſtore thoſe veſſels likewiſe, which were taken away by Nabuchodonoſor, and carried into Babylon. For this (ſaid he) O King, is my requeſt, which you permitted me to ask, and you promiſed me to grant, at that time when I was judged wiſe and well-learned by you. The King was well-pleaſed at his words, and riſing from his Throne, he kiſſed him. He wrote alſo to his Governors and Princes, that they ſhould ſend away Zorobabel, and thoſe of his company, to build the Temple. Moreover, he ſent Letters to them of Syria and Phœnicia, commanding them to cut down the Cedars of Libanus, and to ſend them to Jeruſalem, towards the building of the City; publiſhing a Law, that all Jews ſhould be made free, if they would reſort unto Judea; forbidding all Commiſſaries and Princes, to impoſe any charge upon the Jews, for the neceſſities of the Kingdom; and commanding that all the Countrey which they ſhould inhabit, ſhould be exempt from Tribute: appointing the Idumæans, Samaritans, and Cœloſyrians, to reſtore thoſe lands unto the Jews which they unlawfully with-held, which their Anceſtors had heretofore poſſeſſed. And beſides that, to deliver them by way of contribution 50 Talents of ſilver towards the building of the Temple, permitting them to offer their ordinary Sacrifices. He likewiſe commanded, that all the Neceſſaries and Veſtments which either the High-Prieſt, or the other Prieſts uſed in the ſervice of God, ſhould be furniſhed at his charge. He appointed alſo that the Levites ſhould have Inſtruments of Muſick deliver'd unto them, to praiſe God withall; and that certain portions of land ſhould be alotted for them that had the guard of the City, and the Temple. Moreover, he allow'd them a certain Sum of money every year for their ordinary maintenance. After this, he ſent back all thoſe veſſels which Cyrus heretofore had reſolv'd to reſtore unto Jeruſalem.

3 Eſd. 5.
The number of the Jews that went out of Babylon.

When Zorobabel had obtained theſe things above-named at the Kings hands, he went out of the Palace, and lifting up his eyes unto Heaven, he began to give God thanks, That he had enabled him to appear more diſcreet than others before the King, and for the good ſucceſs which he had given him in Darius's preſence. For (ſaid he) O Lord, if thou hadſt not been favourable unto me, I had not obtained it. After he had in this manner given thanks for the preſent, and pray'd God to ſhew himſelf always favourable hereafter; he repaired to Babylon, and told his Countreymen what encouragement he had receiv'd from the King: who hearing thereof, gave God thanks alſo, who had reſtor'd them once more to the poſſeſſion of their native Countrey: and they fell to feaſting and banquetting for ſeven days ſpace, for the reſtoring unto their Countrey, as if they had ſolemniz'd the feaſts of their birth-days. Hereupon the heads of the ſeveral families made choice of thoſe, that (with their wives and children) ſhould return unto Jeruſalem, who, by the aſſiſtance of Darius's Convoy, perform'd that journey with great joy, playing on their Pſalteries, Flutes and Cymbals, and were after this manner conducted on their way, by thoſe Jews that remained in Babylon. Thus went they forward, being a certain and determinate number of every family. I have not thought it neceſſary to repeat theſe families by name, leſt I ſhould perplex the Relation, and the Readers ſhould be interrupted thereby. Notwithſtanding, the whole number of thoſe that went, and were about 12 years old of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, were four millions, ſix hundred and eight thouſand. There were likewiſe four thouſand and ſeventy Levites: And of their wives and children together, forty thouſand, ſeven hundred, forty and two. Beſides theſe, there were of Singers of the Tribe of Levi, one hundred, twenty and eight; of Porters, one hundred and ten; and of thoſe that attended on the Sanctuary, three hundred twenty and two. There were certain others likewiſe, that pretended that they were of the race of the Iſraelites, but could give no teſtimony of their deſcent, the number of whom was ſix hundred fifty and two. Of the number of the Prieſts, they that had eſ-

H pouſed wives, (whoſe genealogy could not be derived, and who were not found alſo in the genealogies of the Prieſts and Levites) they were about five hundred, twenty and five. The multitude of ſervants that followed or attended on them, were ſeven thouſand, three hundred thitty and ſeven. There were alſo two hundred, forty and five Singers of men and women: four hundred, thirty and five Camels; and five hundred twenty and five other beaſts for their carriage. The conducter of this above-named multitude, was Zorobabel, the ſon of Salathiel, deſcended of Davids Line, and of the Tribe of Juda; and Jeſus the ſon of Joſedech the High-Prieſt; beſides which, were Mordochæus and Serabæas, who were choſen by the people to be their Governors, who contributed 100 pounds of gold, and five hundred of ſilver. Thus the Prieſts and Levites, and part I of all the people of the Jews which were then in Babylon, were conducted to dwell in Jeruſalem; the other part of them following a little after, returned every one into his own Countrey.

Zorobabel Chieftain, and Jeſus High-Prieſt of this company.

The ſeventh month after their departure out of Babylon, the High-Prieſt Jeſus, and the Governor Zorobabel, ſent Meſſengers thorow all the Countrey, and aſſembled the people from all quarters of the Region, who, with all alacrity and expedition, repair'd to Jeruſalem. There erected they an Altar in the ſame place, where heretofore it was built, to the end they might offer Sacrifices thereon, according to Moſes Law; but hereby they gave offence to their neighbouring Nations, who, in general, were incenſed againſt them. They celebrated alſo at that time the feaſt of Tabernacles, according as the Law-maker K had ordain'd: afterwards they offer'd oblations, and continual ſacrifices, obſerving their Sabbaths, and all holy ſolemnities. And they that had made any vows, perform'd them, and ſacrificed from the New Moon until the ſeventh month. After this, they began to build the Temple, and deliver'd great ſums of money to the hewers of ſtone, and Maſons, and gave ſtrangers their ordinary diet, who brought them ſtone and timber. For it was an eaſie matter for the Sidonians, to bring wood and timber from Libanus, and binding it up, and gathering it together in rafters, to ſhip it, and land it at the Port of Joppa. For Cyrus had heretofore given them that commandment, and now the ſecond time they were enjoined thereunto by Darius.

The Temple began to be built, ver. 8.

The ſecond year after their arrival in Jeruſalem, the Jews aſſembled together in the ſe- L cond month, and began to build the Temple, having laid the foundation thereof on the firſt day of December. Over this work, thoſe Levites that were above 20 years of age, were overſeers: with them alſo was Jeſus, and his ſons and brothers joined, and Zolimiel the brother of Juda the ſon of Aminadab, and his ſons. And through the diligence that theſe overſeers of the Temple uſed, it was ſooner finiſh'd, than it was expected. As ſoon as the Sanctuary was built, the Prieſts, apparelled in their accuſtomed habits, and the Levites, and the ſons of Aſaph aroſe, and with Trumpets praiſed God, and ſung ſeveral Hymns and Pſalms compos'd by King David. The Prieſts and Levites, with the Elders of the Tribes, calling to mind how great and magnificent the firſt Temple was, and beholding that which was built at preſent, far inferior to the former, and perceiving M how much the ancient wealth and dignity of the Temple was abaſed; they were ſo ſenſibly touched with the conſideration thereof, that they could not but burſt forth into lamentations and tears. But the people were contented with that which they beheld, and without any mention of the former Temple, they troubled not themſelves in comparing the one with the other; neither thought they upon the difference betwixt the preſent, and that which ſtood in times paſt: but the Elders lamented, and the Prieſts complain'd, that the new erected Temple was far leſs than the former; yet the noiſe of the Trumpets drowned their lamentations, and the joyful applauſes of the people their mournings.

The Samaritans hearing the noiſe of the Trumpets, ran out to know the cauſe thereof, becauſe they were ill-affected toward the Tribe of Juda and Benjamin; and underſtand- N ing that the Jews which were return'd from Babylon, had re-edifi'd the Temple, they addreſſed themſelves to Zorobabel and Jeſus, and to the chief Governors of the families, requiring them that it might be lawful for them to repair the Temple with them, and to have part in the building thereof. For (ſaid they) we honour God no leſs than you, we pray unto him, and adore him; we conform our ſelves to your cuſtoms, ever ſince the time that Salmanazar King of Aſſyria removed us out of Chuthea and Media hither. To theſe demands of theirs, Zorobabel, and Jeſus the High-Prieſt, and the Governors of the Tribes, anſwer'd, That it was impoſſible for them to admit of their aſſiſtance in the building of the Temple, becauſe they had received their firſt commandment from Cyrus to perform it, and afterwards from Darius: notwithſtanding they gave them licence to worſhip therein, offering them O that the Temple ſhould be common to both, if they pleaſed: yea, and acceſſible to all other Nations that would repair thither to adore God. The Chutheans (for ſo were the Samaritans call'd) hearing this, were much offended; and perſuaded the other Nations of Syria,

The Syrian Princes examine the cauſe why the Jews repair their City and Temple. 1:Eſdras 5. v. 3, 4, 5, 6.

A to require the Princes (who continued their authority ſince the time of Cyrus, and afterwards ruled in Cambyſes time) to hinder the building of the Temple; and to delay the Jews, who were ſo intent and buſie in their work. Whereupon Siſin Governor in Syria and Phœnicia, and Sarabazan, accompanied with others, came unto Jeruſalem, and demanded of the Chieftains of the Jews, By whoſe permiſſion they built the Temple, which rather ſeemed to be a Fort than a Temple? and for what cauſe they fortified their City with gates, and ſo ſtrong walls? Zorobabel and Jeſus the High-Prieſt anſwer'd, That they were the ſervants of the living God, and that their Temple had been built by one of their Kings, who was rich, and ſurpaſſed all other in virtue, that afterward it had continued ſo long time in venerable eſtimation; but by reaſon their fathers had been guilty of impiety againſt God, Nabuchodonoſor, King of Babylon and Chaldæa, having taken the City by force, deſtroyed the ſame; B and after he had ſpoiled the City, he burned it, and tranſported the people captive into Babylon. But after that Cyrus King of Perſia had obtained the Kingdom of Babylon, he commanded by his expreſs Letters ſealed with his Royal Seal, that they ſhould re-edifie the Temple, and ordained that all thoſe Treaſures which Nabuchodonoſor carried from thence, and of the conſecrated veſſels, ſhould be deliver'd to Zorobabel and the Treaſurer Mithidrates, to be conveyed to Jeruſalem, and placed again in the Temple, as ſoon as it ſhould be built. And he commanded alſo, that it ſhould be preſently re-edified, appointing Abaſſar to repair to Jeruſalem, and give order for all that which was requiſite; who haſtening thither as ſoon as he had received Cyrus's Letters, did ſpeedily lay the foundations anew. From that time forward, until this preſent, it hath been hindered by the ſubtilty and malice of the neighbouring Nations, who have always been C our Enemies, ſo that as yet it remaineth imperfect. If therefore it pleaſe you, and you think good, ſignifie what you hear, by your letters to Darius, to the end, that examining the Regiſters of the Kings, he may find that all things have proceeded after the manner which we have related.

V. 1, 2, 3. Aggeus and Zachary the Prophets.

When Zorobabel and Jeſus had anſwer'd to this effect, Siſin, and they that accompanied him, thought not good to hinder the building, until ſuch time as they had certified Darius hereof, for which cauſe they wrote unto him preſently. Hereupon the Jews were much diſcomforted and troubled, fearing leſt the King ſhould change his mind, and put a ſtop to the building of Jeruſalem and the Temple. But two Prophets, Aggeus and Zachary, (who were amongſt them) began to perſuade them, willing them to fear no ill D from the Perſians, becauſe God had aſſur'd them, that they ſhould receive no harm; hereupon the people gave credit to the Prophets, and diligently intended their building, without intermiſſion.

C. 5. a v. 7. ad finem. The Samaritans endeavouring to hinder the reparation of the Temple and City, do further it the more.

When the Samaritans had after this manner written to Darius, and accuſed the Jews unto him for fortifying their City, and re-edifying their Temple, and inform'd him how it ſeem'd rather to be a Fort, than ſome ſacred place; and had further alledg'd, that it would be no profit unto him: and moreover, had produced Cambyſes letters, by which they were forbidden to build the Temple, he underſtood that the re-eſtabliſhment of Jeruſalem ſtood not with the ſecurity of his ſtate. But when he had read Siſins letters, and his aſſociates, he commanded that the Chronicles of the Kings ſhould be ſearch'd, E and there was found in Ecbatane, a City of the Medes, in a Tower, a certain Book, in which theſe things were written.

C. 6. 4, 5, 6. Cyrus decree as touching the Temple and the Jews.

The firſt year of the Reign of Cyrus, commandment was given to build the Temple of Jeruſalem, and the Altar therein. It was likewiſe decreed, that the heighth of the Temple ſhould be ſixty cubits, and the breadth as many; three ſtories of hewed ſtone, and one ſtory of the wood of that Countrey: and it was ordained, that the expence of that building ſhould be deducted out of the Kings Revenues. Moreover, he commanded that reſtitution ſhould be made unto the Inhabitants of Jeruſalem, of thoſe veſſels that were taken away by Nabuchodonoſor, and carried away to Babylon: And the commiſſion to effect all theſe things, was given to Abaſſar Governor of Syria and Phœnicia, and his companions, to the end that they might depart from F theſe places, and the Jews might be permitted to build therein. Furthermore, he ordained that the charge of this building ſhould be gathered out of the Tributes of his Countries, and that they ſhould furniſh the Jews with Bulls, Weathers, Lambs, Goats, Flower, Oyl, and Wine, and all other things which the Prieſts ſhould think meet to offer ſacrifice, to the intent that they might pray for the preſervation of the King of Perſia: commanding that they that ſhould tranſgreſs or oppoſe this commandment, ſhould be laid hold on, and hanged on a Gibbet, and that their goods ſhould be confiſcate to the Kings uſe. Moreover, he beſought God, that if any man went about to hinder the building of the Temple, that he would execute his vengeance upon that perſon, and puniſh him for his wickedneſs. When Darius had found theſe things written in his Regiſtries, he wrote back to Siſin and his companions in this form: G

K Now when the Feaſt of unleavened bread (which is the Feaſt of Eaſter) drew near, in the firſt month called Xanthicus by the Macedonians, and Niſan by the Hebrews, all the people of the Towns round about Jeruſalem reſorted thither, and celebrated the Feaſt, purifying themſelves, their wives and children, according to the ordinance of their Forefathers: And after they had ſolemniz'd the Feaſt call'd Eaſter, or the Paſſeover, in the 14*th* Moon, they rejoyced for ſeven days ſpace, ſparing no coſt how great ſoever. They offer'd burnt-offerings alſo, and ſacrifices of thankſgiving, acknowledging Gods goodneſs that had brought them home into their native Countrey, to live according to the laws of their Forefathers, and had cauſed them to find favor in the eyes of the King of Perſia. Thus dwelt they in Jeruſalem, ſacrificing unto, and ſerving God, and living L under the Government of their Nobility. For they ſet up a kind of Ariſtocratical Government, and the chief authority remain'd in the High-Prieſts, until the Aſmonæans obtained the Kingdom: for before the captivity of Babylon, they were under the Government of Kings, who began from Saul and Davids times, about ſome 532 years, ſix months, and ten days; and before their Kings, certain Governors, call'd Judges, reigned: and under this ſort of Polity liv'd they more than 500 years, from the death of Moſes and Joſhua. And this was the ſtate of the Jews after their captivity, during the days of Cyrus and Darius. True it is, that the Samaritans were their mighty and malicious adverſaries, and did them many miſchiefs, truſting in their riches, and pretending to be the Perſians kinſmen, becauſe their original proceeded from thence. For they refuſed to pay M that Tribute which the King had commanded them to diſburſe unto the Jews to make their ſacrifices, and the Governors of Syria and Phœnicia loſt no opportunity which might promote their deſign. For which cauſe, the Jews determined to ſend Ambaſſadors unto King Darius, to accuſe the Samaritans; and to that intent, Zorobabel, and four others were ſent. As ſoon therefore as the King underſtood by theſe Ambaſſadors, what crimes and accuſations they had brought againſt the Samaritans, he diſpatched his letters, and addreſſed them to the Governors and Council of Samaria, the tenour of which letters was to this effect:

Nehem. 2. 1. ad 11. Xerxes favoureth the Jews.

AFter Darius death, his ſon Xerxes ſucceeded him, not only as Heir in the government of his Kingdom, but alſo as Succeſſor unto his piety and devotion towards God: for he changed not thoſe inſtitutions of his Father that concern'd religious ſervice, but with great benevolence favoured all the Jews. During his Reign, Joacim the ſon of Jeſus was High-Prieſt; amongſt them alſo that remained in Babylon, there lived a Prieſt with the Jews in that place called Eſdras, a juſt man, and one of great reputation amongſt the people: and whereas he was very ſkilful in the laws of Moſes, he was much eſteem'd by the King. This man intending (with certain other Jews of Babylon) to return to Jeruſalem, beſought the King that he would vouchſafe to beſtow his letters of commendations to the Governors of Syria in his behalf. Whereupon the King gave him letters of recommendation to the Governors, certifying them of his favor towards Eſdras, and to the Princes in thoſe parts, to this effect:

Xerxes King of Kings, to Eſdras the Prieſt, and Reader of the Divine Law, health.

It is decreed by me, and ſeven other of my Council, that whoſoever in my kingdom of the Iſraelites, their Prieſts or Levites, will repair with thee unto Jeruſalem, may freely do it with my licence, and may ſettle themſelves in Judea, there to ſerve the God of their Fathers; bearing with them thoſe Preſents unto the God of Iſrael, which I and my friends have vowed to offer unto him. I likewiſe give thee licence to take with thee all the gold and ſilver which any of thy Nation living here in Babylon will offer up unto God, to buy offerings to be ſacrificed upon the Altar of thy God: and to make whatſoever veſſels of gold or ſilver, which either thou or thy Brethren ſhall think meet. Thoſe ſacred veſſels alſo which are given thee, thou ſhalt dedicate unto thy God; and if there be ought elſe requiſite in this behalf, that thou ſhalt think fit to provide, the charges ſhalt thou receive out of my treaſury. I have alſo commended thee to the Treaſurers of Syria and Phœnicia, and have written to them, that whatſoever Eſdras the Prieſt, and Reader of the Law of God ſhall require, they ſhall preſently deliver it to him. And to the end that God may be favourable to me and my poſterity, my will is, that an hundred meaſures of wheat be offer'd unto God, according to the Law. I command you alſo that are Magiſtrates, that you exact nothing, neither impoſe any taxations on the Prieſts, Levites, Singing-men, Porters, or holy Officers. But thou Eſdras (according to the wiſdom given thee from above) ſhalt appoint Judges, who ſhall in Syria and Phœnicia execute juſtice unto the people, according to your Law. Teach thou likewiſe freely all ſuch as are ignorant, ſo that whoſoever violateth either Gods or the Kings Law, he may be fined, or elſe condemned to death, as not ſinning through ignorance, but of contumacy. Farewell.

Ver. 16 17, 18. Eſdras aſſembled the Jews that dwelt in Babylon.

When Eſdras had received this Letter, he was well-pleaſed, and gave thanks unto God, confeſſing that it was he, who was the Author of that favour he had received at the Kings hand: And after he had read this Letter unto the Jews that were at that time reſident in Babylon, he kept the original, but ſent a copy to all thoſe of his Nation, being in the Countrey of the Medes: who being inform'd of the King's zeal to the ſervice of God, and his favour towards Eſdras, were very joyful; and divers amongſt them took their goods, and came unto Babylon, deſiring to return to Jeruſalem: but the reſt of the Iſraelites would not abandon or leave their dwelling. Whereupon it came to paſs, that two Tribes were under the obedience of the Romans in Aſia and Europe: but the ten Tribes were on the other ſide of Euphrates, even until this day; and it is incredible, how exceedingly they are there multiplied. With Eſdras there departed a great number of Prieſts, Levites, Porters, Singing-men, and ſervants of the Temple. Now after he had aſſembled thoſe of the captivity, that inhabited on this ſide Euphrates, and ſojourned there three days, he commanded them to ſolemnize a Faſt, and to pray unto God for his preſervation, that no evil might happen unto him; and that neither their enemies, nor any other might do them any violence: For Eſdras had foretold the King, that God would be their Protector, and that therefore he requir'd no Convoy of Horſemen at his hand for his ſecurity. After that they had recommended themſelves unto God, they ſet forward on their way, the twelfth day of the firſt month of the ſeventh year of the H Reign of Xerxes, and arrived in Jeruſalem in the fifth month of the ſame year. Whereupon he incontinently preſented unto the Treaſurers (who were of the race of the Prieſts) the ſacred depoſitum wherewith he was intruſted, which conſiſted of 650 Talents of ſilver, and of ſilver veſſels an 100 Talents, of veſſels of gold to the value of 20 Talents, of brazen veſſels (more precious than gold) the weight of 12 Talents.

Theſe were the Preſents of the King and his Friends, and of the Iſraelites that dwelt in Babylon.

The year of the World, 3506, before Christ's Nativity, 458.

Eſdras repaireth to Jeruſalem, and committeth the veſſels and other precious Preſents to the Treaſurers hands.

When Eſdras had deliver'd theſe Preſents into the hands of the Prieſts, he offer'd burnt-offerings unto God, according to the Law, namely, 12 Bulls for the publick conſervation of the people, 72 Rams and Lambs, and 12 Goats for a ſin-offering. And afterward I he deliver'd the Kings Letters to his Princes and Governors in Cœloſyria and Phœnicia: who being conſtrain'd to execute that which was enjoin'd them by the King, honour'd the Nation of the Jews, and ſupplied them every ways in their neceſſities. We owe unto Eſdras the honour of this Tranſmigration, for he not only laid the deſign of it, but his virtue and piety were undoubtedly the cauſe that God gave him ſo good ſucceſs in the undertaking.

Not long after, there came certain Men unto him, complaining that ſome of the people, Prieſts and Levites, had tranſgreſſed againſt their Ordinances, and broken the Laws of the Countrey, in that they had eſpouſed certain ſtrange women, and corrupted the purity of the Sacerdotal race; requiring him, that he would have a regard to Gods Ordinances, K for fear leſt he (being diſpleaſed with them) ſhould caſt them again into that miſery from which he had ſo lately deliver'd them. Eſdras hereupon was ſo much afflicted, that he rent his cloaths, and tore his hair, and pulled his beard, and caſt himſelf upon the ground, becauſe the chief among the people were concern'd in that offence. And becauſe he feared leſt if he ſhould command them to forſake their wives, and thoſe children which they had begotten by them, he ſhould not be obey'd, he continu'd in grief, and lay continually upon the ground. Whereupon, all thoſe reſorted unto him who were not guilty, and wept and lamented with him, becauſe of that which had hapned.
In this affliction of mind, Eſdras (raiſing himſelf from the earth, and lifting up his hands to Heaven) ſaid, That he was aſhamed to look thereupon, becauſe the offences of the people L were ſo heinous; and that they had ſo ſoon loſt the memory of thoſe calamities wherewith their Forefathers had been viſited for their ſins. Nevertheleſs, O Lord, (ſaid he) ſince thy mercy is infinite, have pity, I beſeech thee, on the remnant that hath eſcaped that long captivity, and which thou haſt brought back into their native Countrey. Spare them, O Lord; and though they have deſerved death, yet let thy mercy appear, in the ſparing of their lives. Whil'ſt thus both he and thoſe that came unto him, lamented with him, with their wives and children, a certain man called Achonias, one of the principal men of Jeruſalem, came to him, and ſaid, That they had ſinned, becauſe they had eſpouſed ſtrange women; and perſuaded Eſdras to command them all, to baniſh both them and the children begotten by them; adviſing, that they who obey'd not the Law, might be puniſh'd. Eſdras (perſuaded by theſe words) M made all the Princes of the Prieſts, Levites, and Tribes of Iſrael, ſwear, That they would diſmiſs their wives and children, according to the counſel of Achonias. And as ſoon as he had received their oaths, he departed from the Temple unto Johns houſe the ſon of Eliaſib, and there ſpent he all the day, without taſting any meat, by reaſon of the grief which he had conceiv'd. Hereupon an Edict was publiſh'd, That all they that were returned from the captivity, ſhould repair within two or three days to Jeruſalem (under the penalty that they who defaulted, and came not within the prefixed time, ſhould be held as excommunicate, and their goods confiſcate to the publick treaſury of the Temple, by the ordinance of the Prieſts:) They of the Tribes of Juda and Benjamin came thither within three days, on the 20 day of the ninth month, call'd by the Hebrews, Thebeth; and by the Macedonians, Apellæus.
N And as ſoon as they were ſeated in the upper part of the Temple in the preſence of the Elders, Eſdras aroſe and reprov'd them, becauſe they had tranſgreſs'd the Law, in taking wives who were not of their Nation: For which cauſe he told them, that if they would do that which were agreeable unto God, and profitable for themſelves, they ſhould diſmiſs ſuch wives. Whereupon, with a loud voice, they all cried, That they would do it willingly; but that there was no ſmall number of them, and that it was the winter-ſeaſon, and the matter of that conſequence, as one or two days could not end it: For which cauſe they thought it very needful, that the execution were deferred for a while; and that at the length, ſome of the Princes who were free from that crime, with certain other choſen Elders of every place, ſhould make inquiſition after them that had married O wives contrary to the preſcript of the Law. Which being approv'd by them, about the New Moon of the tenth month, this Inquiſition began, which continued until the New Moon of the month enſuing: and there were many of the family of Jeſus the High-Prieſt, Prieſt, and of the Prieſts, Levites, and Iſraelites, that (making more account of the obſervation A of the Laws, than of the natural affections to their wives and children) did

The reading of Moſes Law. Nehem. 8. v. 1. ad 11.

When Eſdras had in this manner reform'd the abuſe committed by ſuch marriages, he ſo corrected the evil cuſtom thereof, that this confirmation continued firm and irrevocable for ever. In the ſeventh month, they ſolemniz'd the Feaſt of Tabernacles: whereto when all the people were reſorted, they all came together in an open place in the Temple, towards the gate that looketh Eaſtward, requiring Eſdras, that he would read Moſes's B Ordinances unto them: which he performed; and ſtanding up in the midſt of the multitude, he read the Law unto them, from the morning until noon. By which reading, not only for the preſent, but for the time to come, they were informed of their duty; and calling to mind that which was paſt, they were ſo ſorrowful, that the tears fell from their eyes, when they conſider'd, that if they had kept the Law, they had not ſuffer'd any of thoſe evils wherewith they had been afflicted. But Eſdras beholding them in that ſtate, advis'd them to repair home, and to weep no more, becauſe that day was a ſolemn and holy day, wherein they ought not to weep, becauſe it was forbidden. But he commanded them rather to intend their feaſts and pleaſures, and to make this good uſe of their remorſe for their former ſins, that they might not fall into the like for the time to come.
They following Eſdras exhortation, began to celebrate the Solemnity, and continued C their feaſt of Tabernacles eight days. After which time, they returned every one unto his houſe, praiſing God in hymns, and thanking Eſdras for the reformation of thoſe unlawful marriages which had been contracted with ſtrangers; after he had gotten great honour among the people, he finiſh'd his days in an happy old age, and was buried honorably in Jeruſalem. About the ſame time alſo died Joacim the High-Prieſt, whoſe ſon Eliacim ſucceeded in his place.

Nehem. 1. 1. ad 5.

After this it came to paſs, that a certain man that was one of the captive Jews, and King Xerxes Butler, called Nehemias, walking before the City of Suſa, (which was the Metropolitan City of Perſia) heard certain ſtrangers that came from far, upon their entrance into the City, talking with one another in the Hebrew Tongue; whereupon he drew D near unto them, and ask'd them, Whence they came? They anſwer'd, That they came from Judea: which as ſoon as he knew, he inquir'd after the ſtate of Jeruſalem, their native City, and how the people fared. To whom they anſwer'd, That they were in very bad ſtate, and that their City-walls were demoliſhed, and that the Nations round about them, afflicted the Jews with many outrages, making inroads into their Countrey, and ſpoiling them daily, ſo that divers of them were led away Priſoners; yea, ſome Citizens of Jeruſalem: and that the High-wayes were found full of dead bodies. Hereupon Nehemias began to weep, (thorow the compaſſion he had of his diſtreſſed brethren) and looking up towards Heaven, How long (ſaid he) *O Lord, wilt thou ſee our Nation thus afflicted, without taking care of us?
Behold how we are made a prey to all men!* Whil'ſt thus he walked before the gate, and E lamented bitterly, word was brought him, that the King was ready to ſit down to his meat: whereupon he haſted away to give his attendance, according to his office. As ſoon as Supper was done, the King grew pleaſant, and caſting his eyes upon Nehemias, (whom he perceiv'd to be heavy and diſconſolate) he ask'd him what he ailed? Nehemias (after he had beſought God to give him perſuaſive words to diſcourſe unto the King) anſwer'd, O King, how is it poſſible but that I ſhould be afflicted, when I hear that the walls of Jeruſalem, (which is my native Countrey) are levelled with the ground, and the Sepulchres and Monuments of my Predeceſſors are defaced, and the gates of the City are burned? Do me therefore this grace, that I may go thither, and repair it, and finiſh the reſt of the building of the Temple.

The King gave ear to his requeſt, and promis'd him his Letters, aſſuring him, That he F would addreſs them to the Governors, commanding them to do him honour, and to furniſh him with all things neceſſary, to accompliſh that which he intended. For which cauſe (ſaid he) ceaſe to be afflicted, and give thy attendance chearfully. Hereupon Nehemias adored God, and thanked the King for the promiſe he had made him; and therefore by the joy he conceived, he cleared that confuſion and ſorrow, that before he bare in his countenance. The next day the King called for him, and gave him Letters unto Sadeas the Governor of Syria, Phœnicia and Samaria, in which he commanded him to honour Nehemias, and to furniſh him with all things neceſſary for that building which he intended. As ſoon as he came to Babylon, he took divers of his Countreymen with him, who willingly follow'd him, and went with him unto Jeruſalem, in the 25 year of the Reign of Xerxes; and after G he had deliver'd his Letters to Sadeas, and the other Governors, he aſſembled the people of Jeruſalem, and ſtanding up in the midſt of them, he ſpake unto the whole Congregation

H tion to this effect: You men of Jury, there is none of you but know what care God Almighty hath been pleaſed to take of our Forefathers, Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob, in regard of their piety and love to juſtice; and he doth ſtill make it evident that he will not abandon us, in that I have obtained favour of the King and permiſſion (by his aſſiſtance) to rebuild the Walls of our City, and finiſh the reſt of the Temple. I therefore pray you (who are aſſuredly perſuaded of the envy and hatred the neighbouring Nations bear unto you, who hearing that we are intent upon our building, will overpreſs us, and labour by all means poſſible to hinder us) firſt to re-lie upon Gods Providence, who will oppoſe himſelf againſt the hatred which they bear us, and afterwards to intermit neither day nor night in proſecution of the building, but with all care continue the work, in that the opportunity doth require our diligence. After he had ſpoken I to this effect, he gave order that the Governors ſhould take the meaſure of the Wall, and diſtribute the task among the people, according to the Burroughs and Towns, and to every mans ability: and after he had promiſed to employ both himſelf, and all his family therein, he diſmiſſed the Aſſembly. Hereupon the Jews (incited by his authority) addreſſed themſelves to the work, and then it was that they firſt began to give the name of Jews to thoſe of our Nation who returned from the Captivity; and to the Countrey the name of Judea, becauſe it had been heretofore inhabited by thoſe of the Tribe of Juda.

Nehemias having gotten licence and authority to build the walls of Jeruſalem, inciteth the people thereunto. Nehem. 2. v. 1. ad 11.

The Ammonites, Moabites, Samaritans, and all the Inhabitants of Cœloſyria, underſtanding that the walls were raiſed with ſuch haſte and diligence, were much troubled, and re-K ſolved with themſelves to lie in ambuſh, and to hinder them in the proſecution of their work; ſo that they ſlew divers Jews, and ſought the means likewiſe to murther Nehemias himſelf: and having hired certain ſtrangers with money to commit the fact, they lay in wait for him. They endeavour'd alſo to terrifie the Jews with vain reports, and by ſpread-ing certain rumors, that divers Nations intended to make War againſt them: by which reports (being much troubled) they deſiſted for a time from the proſecution of their building. Yet none of theſe things could weaken Nehemia's diligence or reſolution, but that (keeping a guard round about him) he diligently proſecuted his deſign, ſetting light by all occurrents: ſo great was his affection to accompliſh the work. And therefore he carefully ſtood upon his guard, not that he fear'd death, but becauſe he was perſua-L ded, that his Fellow-Citizens would abate of their courage and reſolution, if he continued not with them, to animate them to the proſecution of ſo holy an enterprize. He commanded likewiſe, that the Workmen while they wrought, ſhould have their Arms near them, ſo that both Maſons and Labourers carried their Swords.

V. 16. ad fin. The ardent care in building the walls of Jeruſalem.

Moreover, he gave order that they ſhould have their Targets by them; and he placed certain Trumpetters, ſome 500 foot diſtant the one from the other, charging them, that as ſoon as they diſcover'd the Enemy from any part, they ſhould incontinently ſound the alarum, and give notice unto the people to arm themſelves, and prepare for the fight, for fear they ſhould be ſurprized, and found unprovided. He himſelf alſo walked the round, about the City by night, with an indefatigable courage, and without either eating or M ſleeping, but only for neceſſity ſake; and this labour endured he for the ſpace of two years, and three months: for the Wall of Jeruſalem was built again in that time, in the 28 year of the Reign of Xerxes, and in the ninth month. After the City was fortified, Nehemias and the people offered Sacrifices unto God, and ſpent eight dayes in feaſting.
When the rumor was ſpread abroad that this building was finiſhed, the Inhabitants of Syria were ſore diſpleaſed. But Nehemias perceiving that the City was weakly manned, beſought the Prieſts and Levites to forſake their dwellings without the City, and to come and dwell within, and to that intent he built them houſes upon his own charge. He ordained likewiſe, that they that intended their Husbandry, ſhould bring the Tenths of their fruits unto Jeruſalem, to the intent that the Prieſts and Levites by enjoying their con-N tinual maintenance, might omit no time in the ſervice of God: wherein he was readily obey'd. By this means, the City of Jeruſalem was very well peopled. After that Ne- hemias had honourably accompliſh'd divers other worthy actions deſerving praiſe, he died in a good old age. He was a man ſo good, ſo juſt and highly affectionate towards his Countrey: and one to whom they are ſo much obliged for the benefits which they have receiv'd, that his memory will remain for ever among the Jews.

*C.*1. v. 10,11. ad finem. Ahaſuerus ſendeth for Vaſhti to grace his feaſts; ſhe refuſeth, and therefore is caſt off by him.

AFter the death of Xerxes,the Kingdom fell to Cyrus his ſon,who by the Grecians was call'd Artaxerxes. Under his government all the race of the Jews, both Men, Women and Children, were in danger to be utterly exterminated: the cauſe whereof, I B will hereafter declare. But firſt of all I muſt ſpeak ſomewhat of the King, and declare how it came to paſs, that he married an Hebrew Woman of the Blood Royal, by whoſe means (as it is ſaid) our Nation was preſerv'd. After that Artaxerxes had taken the Kingdom upon him, and eſtabliſh'd Governors over 127 Provinces, from India as far as Æthiopia: in the third year of his Reign, he entertain'd and feaſted all his Friends with great magnificence, the Nations of Perſia likewiſe with their Governors for 180 days.
He feaſted after this, for the ſpace of ſeven days, the Ambaſſadors of all Nations in the City of Suſa, after this manner. There were ſeveral Pavilions erected, whoſe pillars were of gold and ſilver, cover'd with linnen and ſcarlet vails, which were of that extent, that divers thouſands of Men might take their refection therein. All the entertainment C was ſerv'd up in veſſels of gold, enriched with precious ſtones, very glorious to behold. The King likewiſe commanded his ſervants (that attended the feaſt) that they ſhould enforce no man to drink, by filling continually, according to the manner of the Perſians, but to permit every one of the gueſts to drink according to his diſcretion.
He ſent alſo throughout all the Countrey, commanding a ceſſation from all labour, and that every one ſhould make Holy-day for many days, and think of nothing but rejoycing, and wiſhing him an happy Reign. The Queen Vaſhti alſo made a banquet unto her women in the Royal Palace. Now whereas the King was deſirous to ſhew, that ſhe ſurpaſſed all other women in beauty, he ſent unto her, commanding her to come to the banquet in more Royal manner than the reſt of her Attendants: but ſhe, too curiouſly tied to the obſervation of the law of the Perſians, (which forbiddeth women to be ſeen by D ſtrangers) went not unto the King; and notwithſtanding he ſent his Eunuchs divers times unto her, yet perſiſted ſhe in her refuſal to come unto him. Whereupon the King (moved with diſpleaſure) gave over his banquet, and ariſing, he call'd unto him his ſeven Counſellers, to whom (according to the cuſtom of the Perſians) it belong'd to expound the Laws; and accus'd his wife, telling them how much he had been ſlighted by her, ſince having ſent for her divers times to accompany him at his banquet, ſhe had refus'd to obey him: he therefore commanded them to declare their opinion, what puniſhment appertain'd to her. One amongſt them, call'd Muchæus, anſwer'd, That the injury was not only offered unto him, but to all the Perſians,who ſhould likewiſe be all in danger of E being after that manner deſpiſed by their wives; for that no one of them would acknowledge duty towards their husbands, taking their example from the Queens diſobedience, which ſhe ſhewed towards him, who was the Governor over all. Whereupon he concluded, That ſhe that had thus diſhonoured him, ſhould be ſeverely puniſhed: which done, he thought fit that this ordinance of the Kings, might be publiſhed thorow all Nations, that Queen Vaſhti ſhould be ſeparated from his bed, and another woman choſen in her place. This determination, confirmed by the conſent of the reſt of the Magi, very much afflicted the King, becauſe on the one ſide he was unwilling to act contrary to the Laws of his Countrey, and on the other, he knew not how to put away his Queen, for whom he had ſo great a paſſion, by reaſon of her beauty. Which when his Friends perceiv'd, they counſel'd him to forget the memory F and love of a woman ſo unprofitable, and to ſend and ſeek out thorow all his Countries for the faireſt woman amongſt them, whom he might chooſe and take to wife, that by the ſociety of another woman, the great affection which he bare unto Vaſhti, might be extinguiſh'd. The King approving of this counſel, ſent out certain Meſſengers and Deputies, commanding them to bring unto him the faireſt Virgins that were to be found in his Kingdom: when therefore they had aſſembled a great number of them, they found in Babylon a young Orphan, (without either father or mother) who was brought up under her Uncle (whoſe name was Mardocheus) of the Tribe of Benjamin, and one of the greateſt men among the Jews. The beauty and modeſty of this Virgin were ſo extraordinary, that ſhe rais'd the admiration of all that beheld her. She therefore was deliver'd G in charge unto one of the Eunuchs, who carefully attended her with all diligence, furniſhing her with odors and precious perfumes, according to the cuſtom of noble

H women; and after this manner were 400 Virgins entertain'd for the ſpace of ſix months.
Now when he that was put in truſt with this Commiſſion, thought theſe Virgins to be ſufficiently prepar'd, and that they were fit to come to the Princes bed, he ſent every day one unto the King to keep him company: who, after ſome embraces, ſent her preſently back again unto the Eunuch. But when Eſther came into his preſence, he ſetled his affection more on her, than all the reſt; and being ſurpriſed with her beauty, he took her for his lawful wife: and the Nuptials were ſolemnly celebrated in the ſeventh year of his Reign, and in the 12 month, call'd by us Adar, that is February. And he ſent Meſſengers thorow all his Kingdoms, to proclaim a Feaſt in honour of his marriage: he himſelf alſo feaſted the Perſians, and Medes, and the Princes of the Nations, for a whole months I ſpace. At ſuch time as Eſther entred into the Royal Palace, he ſet a Diadem upon her head, and ſo lived with her, that he never queſtion'd her either of her Birth, or Nation.
Her Uncle came from Babylon to Suſa, (the chief City of Perſia) where every day he walked before the Palace-gate, enquiring how Eſther did: for that he lov'd her as dearly as if ſhe had been his own daughter. Now the King had made a Law, That no man ſhould approach his preſence, upon pain of death, except he were called, during the time that he was on his Throne; and round about his ſeat there ſtood certain Officers with their Arms, ready to puniſh thoſe who being uncalled ſhould attempt to approach the Throne. The King himſelf ſate aloft, and holding in his hand a golden Scepter, whenſoever he intended to ſave the life of any one that approached his Throne uncal-K led, he ſtretched forth the ſame, and touch'd him therewith: who being thus touch'd, by that means eſcap'd death. And as touching theſe things, we have ſufficiently ſpoken in this place.

Mardocheus diſcovereth the Traytors. Eſth. 2, 21, 22.

Not long after this, when as Bagathous and Theodeſtes, two of the Kings Eunuchs, had conſpir'd againſt him; Barnabas, who was of the Hebrew Nation, and one of their ſer-vants, being acquainted with their Treaſon, diſcover'd it to the Queens Uncle Mardoche-us, who, by her means, inform'd the King of their conſpiracy. Who finding out the truth by their examination, he commanded them to be executed on the Gibbet; he for that time gave no recompence to Mardocheus for ſaving his life, but only commanded his name to be regiſtred in his Records, permitting him to have acceſs to his Palace, as if he had L been one of his Domeſticks. Now as often as Haman (the ſon of Amadath an Amalechite) came unto the Palace to viſit the King, all thoſe that were either Perſians or ſtrangers, (according to the Kings eſpecial direction) did him honour: But Mardocheus ſhew'd him no honour (becauſe the laws of the Jews forbade it.) Which when Haman had obſerv'd, he demanded whence he was? And underſtanding that he was a Jew, he was much diſpleas'd, ſaying in himſelf, That the Perſians who were of a freer condition, caſt themſelves proſtrate before him, and he that was but a ſlave, diſdained to do the like. Intending therefore to revenge himſelf on Mardocheus, he thought it not ſufficient to procure his puniſhment at the Kings hands, but reſolv'd wholly to exterminate his Race (for he was by Nature an Enemy to the Jews, by reaſon that the Amalechites, from whom he deſcend-M ed, had heretofore been conquer'd by them.) Whereupon he addreſs'd himſelf unto the King, and accus'd them, ſaying, That there was a certain curſed Nation ſpread through his whole Kingdom, inſociable, and abhorring the cuſtoms of other men, who uſed divers laws and ceremonies, contrary to thoſe of all other Nations, and deſtructive of the fundamentals of his Kingdom, ſo that the greateſt favour he could do to his Subjects, would be utterly to exterminate them. And leſt your Majeſties Tribute ſhould be anyways impaired by theſe means, I promiſe you of mine own Revenues forty thouſand talents of ſilver, deſiring rather willingly to forbear ſo much money, than that your Kingdom ſhould be unpurged of ſuch a curſed Race of men.
When Haman had made this his requeſt, the King anſwer'd, That he forgave him the money, and that he permitted him to deal with that Nation as he thought fit. When Haman had ob-N tain'd his deſire, he preſently ſent forth an Edict thorow all Nations, in the Kings Name, to this effect.

The lamentation of the Jews, upon the hearing of this Edict. Eſther 4. 1, 2, &c.

B This Edict being ſpread thorow all places of the Countrey, and publiſh'd in every City, all men prepar'd themſelves againſt the prefixed day, utterly to exterminate the Jews, and no leſs diligence was there uſed in Suſa the Metropolitan City. Mean-while, the King and Haman feaſted, and made good cheer, whil'ſt the City hung in ſuſpence, being troubled with the expectation of the event of that which ſhould follow. But Mardocheus having intelligence hereof, rent his garments, put on ſackcloth, and caſt aſhes on his head, walking thorow the City, and crying, That their Nation had not committed any crime deſerving death: and uſing theſe, or ſuch like ſpeeches, he came unto the Kings Palace, and ſtood before the gate, becauſe it was unlawful for him to enter thereinto in that habit: The like alſo did the Jews that were in the Cities where thoſe Edicts had been publiſh'd againſt them, weeping and lamenting their miſeries. But when the News C hereof was brought unto the Queen, that Mardocheus ſtood before the Palace-gate in a deplorable condition, ſhe was much troubled, and ſent certain of her ſervants unto him, to command him to change his attire, but they could not perſuade him to put off his ſackcloth, for the cauſe of his ſorrow ſtill remaining, he could not think of laying aſide the marks of it. She therefore called unto her her Eunuch Acratheus, and ſent him unto Mardocheus, to know what accident had befaln him, that made him put on his mourning habit, and to afflict himſelf after that manner, and not at her intreaty to lay aſide thoſe marks of his ſorrow. Hereupon Mardocheus told the Eunuch of the Edict made againſt the Jews, and ſent by the King unto all his Provinces; the offer of the money that Haman likewiſe had tender'd to the King, whereby he had bought the utter D ruine of his Nation at the Kings hands; moreover, he gave him the Copy of that which had been proclaim'd in Suſan, to be deliver'd unto Eſther: whom he intreated to beſeech the King, and to eſteem it no diſhonour to become a Suppliant, to ſave her Nation, and to preſerve the Jews from that death whereunto at that time they were expos'd: ſince Haman, the next in honour to the King, had accuſed the Jews, and incens'd his Majeſty againſt them. When Eſther underſtood this, ſhe ſent again unto Mardocheus, giving him to underſtand, That ſhe was not called for by the King; and that whoſoever entered unto him, and was not called, ſhould die, except the King would ſecure him, by ſtretching out his golden Scepter; for he, unto whom the King was pleaſed to grant that favor, although he were not called unto him, yet ſuffered he not death, but obtained pardon. When theſe things were reported E by the Eunuch from Eſther unto Mardocheus, he commanded him to tell her, That ſhe ought not ſo much to tender the particular reſpect of her life, as the lives of her whole Nation; aſſuring her, that if at that preſent ſhe had not care of them, their ſuccor ſhould onely proceed from God by ſome other means than this: but ſhe and her fathers houſe ſhould be deſtroyed by them whom ſhe had contemned. Upon this reply, Eſther ſent the ſame meſſenger back again unto Mardocheus, commanding him to repair unto Suſan, and to call a general Aſſembly of all the Jews that remained there, willing them for three days ſpace to faſt and abſtain from all kind of meat for her ſafety, and that both her ſelf and her ſervants would do the like; promiſing them, that at that time ſhe would preſent her ſelf unto the King, notwithſtanding his contrary Edict; and that if ſhe muſt needs die, ſhe would willingly ſuffer it. F

*Ver.*16,17. Faſting and praying unto God, for the ſafety of the people.

Mardocheus obſerv'd her orders, cauſed the people to faſt, and to pray unto God for her ſafety; he likewiſe himſelf beſought him, That it might pleaſe him at that preſent to have compaſſion on their deſolate and diſtreſſed Nation, as he had done oftentimes heretofore: and that as he had pardoned them at ſuch time as they had offended, ſo now alſo at this preſent he would deliver them from that perdition which was denounced againſt them. For that they were not in danger to die infamouſly for any offence of their own, but becauſe he onely had incenſed Haman, in that he would not adore him, or perform that honour unto him, which is onely due to God: for which cauſe, in revenge, he had contrived this miſchief againſt them, who would not tranſgreſs the divine ordinances. The People likewiſe pray'd to the like effect, beſeeching God, G That he would have care of their preſervation, and preſerve the Iſraelites in what place ſoever they were, from the miſery at hand, which was before their eyes, and already expected by them. Eſther alſo beſought God, (according to the manner of her Countrey) caſting

H caſting her ſelf proſtrate on the earth, cloathed in ſackcloth, and abſtaining for three dayes ſpace from meat and drink, and what thing ſoever elſe was delectable, beſeeching God to have compaſſion on her, That when ſhe preſented herſelf before the King ſhe might have words fit to perſuade and mollifie him, and grace and beauty far more amiable than ever ſhe had, to the end that by thoſe means ſhe might be the better enabled to appeaſe the King, if ſo be he were diſpleaſed with her; and to ſuccor her brethren in extreme danger, whereby the King might turn his anger againſt the enemies of the Jews, and take compaſſion of their imminent danger, which, without his prevention, would ſurely fall upon them. After ſhe had in this ſort for three dayes ſpace faſted and prayed, ſhe caſt off her mourning attire, and changed her habit, attiring herſelf as became the Majeſty of a Queen, having two of her ſervants I on whom ſhe leaned, and the third that follow'd her, carried up her train, which was large, and trailed on the ground: and in this equipage came ſhe unto the King, having her cheeks ſtained with a modeſt bluſh, bringing with her a Majeſty mixed with beauty, but her heart was not altogether free from fear. But when ſhe beheld the King ſitting aloft on his Throne, glorious in his garments embroider'd with gold, and adorn'd with precious ſtones, a fear ſuddenly fell upon her, ſince he lookt not on her perhaps at firſt with a favourable countenance; whereupon being aſtoniſhed, her limbs failed her, her colour faded, and ſhe fell betwixt her handmaids arms into a ſwound. Hereupon the King (by the will of God) changed his affection, and ſuddenly leapt from his Throne, and embracing her with both his arms, he raiſed her up, and kiſſed her, and ſpake K comfortably unto her, praying her to be of good courage, and not to ſuſpect any misfortune, for that ſhe came unto him without any motion of his: That the ordinance was only made for his Subjects, but that ſhe (who was equal with him) ſhould fear nothing: whereupon he took his Scepter in his hand, and laid it on the Queens neck, whereby he deliver'd her from all fear; ſo that ſhe recovered her vigor and courage, and ſpake after this manner: O King, I cannot eaſily expreſs unto you the inconvenience that is ſuddenly fallen upon me; for as ſoon as I beheld the great and redoubted Majeſty of your perſon, my ſpirits forſook me, and my heart failed me. Now whil'ſt ſhe ſpake theſe words with pain and feebleneſs, the King was touched with compaſſion; ſo as he animated and encouraged her, and commanded her to expect nothing but good; yea (ſaid he) if thou demandeſt the half of L my Kingdom, I will grant it thee. But Eſther only requeſted this at his hands, that only he and his friend Haman would vouchſafe to grace her with their preſence at her banquet: which the King readily granted her. Now when they were come unto the banquet, and in the midſt of their cups, the King commanded Eſther to ask what ſhe would, and he would grant it her, aſſuring her, That he would refuſe her in nothing; yea, although ſhe demanded the half of his Kingdom. But ſhe deferred to diſcover her ſuit until the next day, requiring him once more to repair with Haman unto her banquet.

Ver. 9.

When the King had promiſed to viſit her again, Haman departed with great joy, for that he alone had the credit to banquet with the King and Eſther, and no other had ever obtained the like honour amongſt any Kings of thoſe Dominions. But in his return, M perceiving Mardocheus in the Court, he was moved, becauſe that (notwithſtanding he had lookt upon him) he had not done him honour: when therefore he came home unto his houſe, he called Zaraza his wife, and his friends, and told them what honour not only the King, but the Queen alſo had done him; and how he only with the King had ſupped that day with the Queen, and was invited the next day alſo to banquet with the King: notwithſtanding he told them that he was diſcontented, becauſe he ſaw Mardocheus the Jew in the Court. Zaraza his wife told him, That he ſhould cauſe a gallows to be raiſed fifty cubits high, and that the next day he ſhould demand licence of the King, that Mardocheus might be hanged on the gibbet. Haman approving of his wives counſel, commanded his ſervants to prepare the Timber, and erect the gallows in his Court, to hang N Mardocheus thereon: which they diligently perform'd. But God, who knew what would come to paſs, mocked at Hamans curſed hope; for the very ſame night he deprived the King of ſleep, who being not willing to ſpend the time idlely whil'ſt he was awake, but to employ it in ſomething that might be profitable for his Kingdom, he commanded his Secretary to bring him the Chronicles of the Kings his Predeceſſors, and of thoſe things that were done by himſelf, and to read them to him. When therefore they were brought and read, he found that a certain man whoſe name was there ſet down, had received a great poſſeſſion for reward of his virtue. He read likewiſe of another, that had obtained a recompence for his fidelity, and the like; till at laſt he came to the place where the Eunuchs Bagotheus and Theodeſtes, were noted down for a ſecret conſpiracy

He anſwer'd, That he found nothing ſet down. Whereupon the King commanded him to give over, and inquired of thoſe to whom that office appertain'd, what hour of the night it was: and knowing that the morning was already diſcover'd, he commanded that ſome one ſhould certifie him, which of his friends attended before the Palace. At this time it hapned that Haman was found there, who came thither ſooner than he was accuſtomed, with an intent to beſeech the King, that he might put Mardocheus to death.

When the officers had brought the King word that Haman was before the Palace, they were commanded preſently to call him in. As ſoon as he came into the Kings preſence, he ſaid unto him, *Since I am aſſured that no man hath ſo great an affection for me as thou haſt, I moſt affectionately love? Haman thinking the advice he ſhould give, ſhould be given for a Royal habit, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and let ſome one of thy chiefeſt friends

King loveth.* The King with great ſatisfaction received this counſel which Haman thought he had given in favor of himſelf, and turning towards him, ſpake thus unto him: Take one of my Horſes, a garment of purple, and a chain of gold, and ſeek out the Jew Mardocheus, C and give them unto him, and march thou before him, making proclamation after that manner which you lately propoſed: For (ſaid he) *thou art my neareſt friend, and it is very fit that the execution of this thing be committed to thy truſt, which thou haſt ſo faithfully counſelled.
And this command I to be done, becauſe* Mardocheus hath been the preſerver of my life. Haman, upon the hearing of theſe words, beyond all expectation, was no leſs amazed, than if he had been Thunder-ſtruck; but finding a neceſſity of giving obedience to a command that was ſo poſitive and expreſs, he went out, having with him the horſe, the purple habit, and the chain of gold, and meeting with Mardocheus before the Palace, who was Eſther 7. 1. Whil'ſt they were thus ſpeaking Eſthers Eunuchs came to haſten Haman to the banquet, it was raiſed up? And underſtanding that it was for the Queens Uncle, whom Haman went into the garden: then began Haman to pray, and beſeech Eſther to forgive him his

Which when the King underſtood, he adjudged Haman to no other death but that which he intended againſt Mardocheus; and thereupon preſently commanded that he ſhould be hanged upon the ſame gibbet, until he were dead. And here we cannot but admire the Providence of God, in conſidering his wiſdom and juſtice in that he not only puniſhed the wickedneſs of Haman (as he had deſerved) but alſo cauſed him to fall into the ſame ſnare which he had prepared for another mam. Thus died I Haman, who had unjuſtly abuſed the Kings friendſhip: as for his goods, they were given unto the Queen.

L Artaxerxes the great King, to the Governours, and thoſe that faithfully rule under us, Health

Many men being puffed up withpride, by reaſon of the many benefits and honors, which they receive throgh the liberality of their benefactors, do not only excerciſe their pride towards their inferiours, but alſo are not afraid to wax inſolent againſt thoſe who are the authors of their benefits, extinguiſhing as much as in them lieth, all manner of gratitude amongſt men, and believing that it is in their power to deceive God himſelf, and rob him of his Juſtice: ſo that when the favor of their Princes hath given them power and authority in the Government of their affairs, in ſtead of applying themſelves to the benefit of the publick, they have given M place to the hatred they have conceived againſt ſome particular men, and deceived their Princes by falſe accuſations and detractions, and provoked their wrath againſt thoſe who have not done amiſs: whence it cometh to paſs, that they have been ſometimes in extream danger to loſe their life. The proof whereof appeareth not only in ancient Hiſtories (the knowledg whereof we have only obtained by hear-ſay) but by that likewiſe which hath been audaciouſly attempted before our eyes; ſo that hereafter we ought not to give credit to detractions and accuſations nor to ſuch things as men inforce themſelves to perſwade: but it behoveth every man to judge according to the truth of that he knoweth, and to puniſh thoſe which are guilty, and to pardon the innocent, in conſidering their acts, and not the words that are ſpoken. For it is moſt notorious unto all men, that Haman the Son of Amaeath (an Amalechite by Nation, and by that N means a ſtranger, and not of the Perſian blood, but entertained by us) hath in all things enjoyed the fruit of our bounty hitherto; ſo that he hath been called our father, honoured by all men, and obtained amongſt all men, and in all things, the ſecond place after us: yet could he not make a moderate uſe of his happineſs, nor prudently entertain the greatneſs of his felicity; but hath ſought means to deprive Mardocheus of his life, who preſerved mine; ſeeking by his fraud and malice to practiſe the ruine of Eſther, the companion of our life and Kingdome; and by this means ſtriving to diſpoſſeſs me of my moſt faithfull friends, he determined to transfer the Kingdom unto others. Touching my ſelf, in that I know that the Jews, who are by this wretch deſtinated to die, are no wicked men, but ſuch as live under a ſtrict and holy diſipline praying God continually that it would pleaſe him to continue the Kingdom O in us, and our Succeſſors; I abſolve them not only from that penalty, contained in my former Letters ſent by Haman (which by theſe preſents I utterly diſanul) but my pleaſure likewiſe is, that they be had in all honour. As for him that practiſed theſe things, againſt them, I have cauſed him and all his race to be hanged before the gates of Suſan, according to the juſt A Judgement of God inflicted on them for their offences. My will and pleaſure therefore is, That the Copy of this Letter be ſent through all Countreys belonging to us, to the intent that the Jews be ſuffered to live according to their own Laws, in peace; and that aſſiſtance may be given them, to the end they may revenge themſelves of thoſe who have offered them outrage in their adverſity. And I command that this be done the thirteenth day of the twelfth month called Adar, which is the day that God ordained for their preſervation (when they were appointed to be ſlain) which day I wiſh may be fortunate to thoſe that love us, and a monument of revenge on thoſe that intended our ruine. My pleaſure likewiſe is, that all men, Cities and Nations ſhould know, that whoſoever ſhall neglect, through obſtinacy, to fulfil the tenor of this my Mandate, he ſhall be purſued with fire and ſword: and let theſe Coppies be ſet up B throughout all our Dominions; and let each man of the Jews, upon the prefixed day, prepare himſelf to be revenged on his enemies.

The Jews reveng them on their enemies.

As ſoon as the Poſts had received theſe Letters, they preſently mounted on horſback and rode each of them his appointed way; and Mardocheus being cloathed in a Royal habit, and adorned with a crown of Gold on his head, and a chain of Gold about his neck, came forth: and the Jews of Suſan, ſeeing him thus honoured by the King, ſuppoſed that his good ſucceſs was an aſſurance of their own: and when the Kings Letters were publiſhed; The Jews lookt upon them as a favourable ray of light which portended their deliverance, and their enemies were in ſo great fear that divers of other C Nations circumciſed themſelves, ſuppoſing in that ſo doing they ſhould be in ſecurity. For the thirteenth day of the twelfth month (by the Hebrews called Adar, and by the Mecedonians Diſtre) the poſts that carried the Kings letters certified them, that they ſhould exterminate their enemies on that very day whereon they themſelves were in danger to be exterminated. The Governors likewiſe of the Provinces, the Lords and chief Magiſtrates, did honour to the Jews: for the fear they had of Mardocehus, and after the Kings Letters were publiſhed, it came to paſs that the Jews ſlew about five hundred of their enemies. Within the City of Suſa the King declared unto Eſther the number of the dead that periſhed in the City, and ſuſpecting what might happen thorow the whole Countrey, he asked her if ſhe requeſted any further matter, promiſing her that D he would ſee it executed: ſhe beſought him that it might be lawful for the Jews to revenge themſelves yet once more the next day upon their enemies, and to hang Hamans ten Sons upon the gibbet: which the King (being loth to contradict Eſther) permitted, ſo that on the 14. day of the Month Diſtre, they ſlew about three hundred more of their enemies; without taking the ſmalleſt portion of their goods. Furthermore the Jews ſlew in the Countrey, and in the Cities, about ſixty five thouſand of their enemies, whom they diſpatched the thirteenth day of the month, and ſolemnized the day following in mirth and feaſting. The Jews that were at Suſan aſſembled themſelves likewiſe on the fourteenth day of the month, and banquetted that whole day. Whence it cometh to paſs, that all the Jews which are throughout the world, keep and ſolemnize this day for a feſtival, and ſend Preſents the one unto the other. E Mardocheus alſo wrote unto the Jews, who lived under the Empire of Artaxerxes, commanding them to obſerve thoſe dayes, and to ſolemnize them; willing them to charge their Succeſſors to do the like, to the end that this feaſt might continue for ever. For ſince on that day they ſhould have been deſtroyed by Haman, they ſhould do well if after they had eſcaped that danger, and taken revenge on their enemies, they ſhould obſerve the ſame day to give thanks to God: For this cauſe the Jews keep a ſolemn feaſt on theſe dayes, and call it Purim, that is to ſay, Lotts. But Mardocheus was great and powerfull with the King, Governing the whole Kingdom under him, and had alſo all the power that could be conferred on him by the Queen; and for this cauſe the affairs of the Jews had F better ſucceſs than was hoped, but there was nothing during the whole reign of John the High-Prieſt, kills Jeſus his brother in the Temple. Manaſſes the brother of Jaddus the High-Prieſt, eſpouſeth the daughter of Sanaballath Governor of Samaria.

Helio & Ruffinus, cap. 7. The revenge taken on John for ſlaying his brother.

AFter the death of Eliaſib the High-Prieſt, Judas his ſon ſucceeded in the office. And Judas being dead, John his ſon obtained the place, and was the cauſe that Bagoſes, General of Artaxerxes Army, polluted the Temple, and made the Jews tributaries; ſo that before they could offer their ordinary and daily ſacrifices, they were compelled to I pay for every Lamb 50 drachmes, which hapned upon this occaſion: John had a brother called Jeſus, whom Bagoſes favoured, and promiſed to give him the High-Prieſthood.
One day theſe two Brethren being in the Temple, they fell out about the ſucceſſion, and the quarrel roſe ſo high, that John ſlew his brother Jeſus in that holy place. It was a thing very ſtrange, that John being a Prieſt, ſhould commit ſuch an impiety againſt his brother; and yet far more ſtrange, in that ſo cruel an act, and an offence ſo impious, hath neither hapned amongſt Greeks nor Barbarians. But God left it not unpuniſhed, in that for the ſame ſin the people loſt their liberty, and the Temple was polluted by the Perſians. When Bagoſes had intelligence, that John (the High-Prieſt among the Jews) had ſlain his brother Jeſus in the Temple, he came thither in all haſte, and began to break K forth into bitter threats againſt the Jews, Have you (ſaid he) been ſo bold as to commit murther in your Temple? And when he attempted to enter, they hindered him. Whereupon he replied. Am I therefore more polluted than the body that lieth dead in the Temple?
And having ſpoken thus, he entred thereinto, and for the ſpace of ſeven years Bagoſes being thus incenſed againſt the Jews, puniſh'd them for murthering Jeſus. After that John was deceaſed, Jaddus his ſon was made High-Prieſt, who had a brother called Manaſſes: Sanaballath ſent by the late King Darius to govern Samaria, (for he alſo was of the race of the Chuteans, from whom came the Samaritans) knowing that Jeruſalem was a famous City, and that the Kings thereof wrought much trouble unto the Inhabitants of Aſſyria, and Cœloſyria; he willingly marrieth his daughter Nicaſis to this Manaſſes, with L an intent that this Marriage ſhould be as a pledge of his good will to the Nation of the Jews.

Jaddus High-Prieſt, whoſe brother Manaſſes marrieth Sanaballaths daughter.

CHAP. VIII.

Alexander the great King of Macedonia, paſſeth out of Europe into Aſia, deſtroyes the Empire of the Perſians; and when it was believed that he would have demoliſh'd the City of Jeruſalem, he pardons the Jews, and treats them very favourably.

Alexander made King after Philip his father King of Macedon.

M ABout this time, Philip King of Macedon died in the City of Ægæa, being traiterouſly ſlain by Pauſanias the ſon of Ceraſtes, of the race of Oreſtes, and his ſon Alexander ſucceeded him in the kingdom; who paſſing over the Helleſpont, gave battel unto the huge Army of Darius near the River Granic, and there obtained a famous victory. And hereupon alſo invading the Countrey of Lydia, (after he had conquered Jonia, and over-run Caria) he fell upon the quarters of Pamphilia, as is declared in another place.
But the Elders of Jeruſalem were much diſpleaſed, that Jaddus's brother, who was at that time High-Prieſt, and had married a foreign Woman, ſhould be companion and aſſociate with him in the Prieſthood, ſo as they mutined againſt him. For they ſuppoſed that that Marriage would be but a means to animate thoſe who had a mind to profane Marriages, N and prove an inducement to others to communicate in Marriage with ſtrangers: calling to mind, that the cauſe of their evils, and firſt captivity was, becauſe ſome of them had fallen, and offended, by coupling themſelves with Women of foreign Nations.

They therefore commanded Manaſſes either to forſake his Wife, or elſe never more to approach the Altar. The High-Prieſt likewiſe being incenſed againſt his brother, as well as the People, drave him in like manner from the Sacrifice. For which cauſe, Manaſſes (addreſſing himſelf to his Father-in-law Sanaballath) told him, That although he loved his daughter Nicaſis very intirely, yet would he not condeſcend for her ſake to be deprived of the Prieſthood (which was the greateſt dignity that could be among their Nation, and which had ever continued in his race.) Whereupon Sanaballath anſwer'd and promis'd him, That he O would not only continue him in the Prieſthood, but alſo would give him the power and dignity of the High-Prieſthood, and make him Governor of all places that he commanded, provided the

The Apoſtaſie of the Prieſts.

Marriage ſolemnized betwixt his daughter and him, were continued. He furthermore aſſured A him, That he would build a Temple, reſembling that in Jeruſalem, upon the Mountain of Garzim, which was the higheſt in all the Countrey, permitting him to do the ſame with Darius's conſent. Manaſſes puffed up by theſe promiſes, remaineth with Sanaballath, and grew in hopes that he ſhould obtain the Prieſthood by Darius's means: for Sanaballath was very old. Whereas divers others, both Prieſts and common People, among the Iſraelites, were intangled in ſuch Marriages, there aroſe no ſmall commotion in Jeruſalem. For all they of this condition retired themſelves to Manaſſes, whom Sanaballath furniſhed with money, and lands to till, and houſes to inhabit, to favour the ambition of his Son-in-law.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8.

Alexander's victory againſt Darius.

At the ſame time Darius underſtanding that Alexander having paſſed the Helleſpont, had B overcome thoſe Governors, whom he had placed near unto the River Granicus, and that he paſſed further, ſpoiling his Countrey; he gathered together his Horſemen and Footmen, reſolving to make head againſt the Macedonians, before they ſhould gain all Aſia: he therefore paſſed Euphrates, and Mount Taurus in Cilicia, to encounter his enemies. Sanaballath joyful at Darius's approach, incontinently told Manaſſes, that he would fulfill his promiſe, as ſoon as Darius ſhould return from the conqueſt of his enemies. For not only he, but alſo all the Aſians perſuaded themſelves moſt aſſuredly, that the Macedonians would not abide the battel againſt the Perſians, by reaſon of their great multitude; but it fell out altogether contrary to their expectation. For the Perſian encountering with the Macedonians, was overcome; and after he had loſt the greater part of his Army, and C left his Mother, Wife and Children Priſoners, he himſelf fled into Perſia. Alexander arriving in Syria, ſeized on Damaſcus, took Sidon, and beſieged Tyre: and by his letters ſending unto Jaddus the High-Prieſt of the Jews, he required him to ſend him ſome ſupplies, and to ſell his Army victuals for their money; aſſuring him, That if he deſired the friendſhip of the Macedonians, he would give him that tribute which he paid to Darius, and he ſhould have no cauſe to repent of the choice which he ſhould make. The High-Prieſt anſwered Alexanders Meſſenger, That he had ſworn unto Darius never to bear Arms againſt him, during his life-time; againſt which oath of his, he could not act. Which when Alexander heard, he was diſpleaſed, but reſolved notwithſtanding to continue the ſiege at Tyre, until ſuch time as it ſhould be taken; yet threatned he, that as ſoon as he had taken it, he would lead D forth his Army againſt the High-Prieſt, to the end that all Men might know to whom they ought to keep their faith. For which cauſe, ſparing no labour, he overcame Tyre; and after he had given order for the ſettlement thereof, he came unto Gaza, and took it with Babemeſes the Captain of the Gariſon that held it. But Sanaballath finding a fit opportunity to make himſelf great, forſook Darius, and followed Alexander, leading with him eight thouſand of his Subjects: and coming to him at the beginning of the ſiege of Tyre, he offered to ſurrender to him all thoſe places wherein he commanded, acknowledging him for his Lord more willingly than he had Darius. Alexander received him graciouſly: whereupon, Sanaballath informed him of his condition, and let him underſtand, that Manaſſes (who was brother to Jaddus the High-Prieſt of the Jews) was his Son-in-law, E who with divers of the ſame Nation, were deſirous to build them a Temple in the Countries under his dominion, aſſuring the King of much profit thereby, becauſe in ſo doing, the force of the Jews would be diſmembred into two parts, and they could not conſpire together to make any new inſurrection or trouble, as in times paſt they had done during the Government of the Kings of Aſiria.

Manaſſes enjoyeth his deſire.

When Sanaballath had permiſſion from Alexander to build his Temple, with the greateſt ſpeed he might he finiſhed the ſame, and made Manaſſes the High-Prieſt thereof, ſuppoſing that it was the greateſt advantage that might happen to his daughters children. Seven months after the ſurrender of Tyre, and two after the taking of Gaza, Sanaballath died. Alexander alſo razed Gaza, and prepared himſelf to come ſuddenly upon Jeruſa- F lem. Which when the High-Prieſt Jaddus underſtood, he was much grieved, and afraid, not knowing how to gain the favour of the Macedonians: and on the other ſide, knowing that the King was diſpleaſed with him, (becauſe heretofore he had diſobeyed him:) He commanded the people to make their prayers unto God, and he in his own perſon offered ſacrifice; beſeeching God that it would pleaſe him to be a ſhield of defence and ſuccor to their Nation, and to deliver them from thoſe imminent dangers wherewith they were threatned. But the next night following, whil'ſt he ſlept, God appeared unto him, and commanded him to be of good courage, and that as ſoon as he had gone about the Wall, he ſhould open the Gates boldly, and command the reſt of the people to attire themſelves in white; and that accompanied with them, he ſhould march forwards G in thoſe Prieſtly ornaments which were appointed by the Law, to the end that in

H this equipage they might go and meet with Alexander, without any apprehenſion of future evil, becauſe he would protect them. As ſoon as he awaked from his ſleep, he was very joyful, and related this Revelation from God; and performing that which had been commanded him, he expected in this manner the approach of the King; and when he knew that he was not far off from the City, he marched forth to meet him, accompanied with the Prieſts, and a multitude of other people, giving him a moſt Royal entertainment, and far different from that of other Nations, near unto a place called Sapha, which word ſignifieth a Watch, (by reaſon that from that place a man may diſcover the City and Temple of Jeruſalem.) The Phœnicians and Chaldeans that were in Alexanders Army, grounding their hopes upon his diſpleaſure, doubted not but that he would give I them leave to ſack the City, and to hew the High-Prieſt in pieces: but it fell out quite contrary; for Alexander eſpying the People from afar in white Rayments, and the Prieſts going before them in their Rochets, and the High-Prieſt attired in a Robe of Purple, broidered with Gold, having his Mitre on his head, and his plate of Gold wherein the Name of God was written, Alexander himſelf marched forward before the reſt of his company, and fell proſtrate on his face before that Name, ſaluting firſt of all the High Prieſt; and at the ſame inſtant, all the Jews together ſaluted the King with one voice, and encompaſſed him round about. The Kings of Syria and the reſt that ſaw that which hapned, were wonderfully aſtoniſhed, and thought that the King was out of his wits: Parmenio only drew near unto him, and ask'd him, what he meant, to adore the Prieſt of the K Jews, whereas all other men adored him? To whom he anſwer'd, I do not adore him, but that God whom the Prieſt worſhippeth: for in my ſleep I ſaw him in ſuch a habit, as I ſee him in at this preſent, at ſuch time as I was in Dio a City of Macedonia: and whileſt I conſulted with my ſelf by what means I might attain to the conqueſt of Aſia, he counſelled me to make no delay, but to march forward boldly, aſſuring me, that it would be he that would guide both me and mine Army, and would deliver the Empire of the Perſians into my hands. Since that time, I have not ſeen any one attired after the ſame manner: and at this preſent beholding this man, and calling to mind the viſion and exhortation that he gave me in my ſleep, I hope that mine Army being conducted by divine providence, I ſhall overcome Darius, and diſcomfit the Perſians, and that my deſigns ſhall have a happy iſſue.

Alexander intending to beſiege Jeruſalem, meeteth with the High-Prieſt and people in white, and is honorably received by them, and doth them honor in memory of his viſion that appeared unto him in the like habit.

L When he had thus anſwer'd Parmenio, he gave the High-Prieſt his hand, and went with him into the City, being conducted by the Prieſts: after this, when he came into the Temple, he offered ſacrifice, according to the High-Prieſts direction, whom he honoured likewiſe with very great reverence. And when Jaddus ſhewed him the Prophecy of Daniel, wherein he declared that a certain man of the Nation of the Greeks, ſhould deſtroy the Empire of the Perſians, and that in his opinion he was the man; Alexander was very joyful, and diſmiſſed the multitude that attended him, for that time. The next day aſſembling the Jews, he commanded them to let him know, what favors they deſired at his hands. Whereupon the High-Prieſt anſwer'd, That he deſired that they might be permitted to live according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of their Forefathers, and that every ſeventh year they M might be exempted from tributes. Which was granted them fully. They beſought him likewiſe, That by his permiſſion, the Jews that were in the Countries of Babylon and Media, might live according to their laws. And he promiſ'd them willingly to do all that which they deſired. He made Proclamation alſo among the People, That if any one of them would bear Arms under him, (and live according to the cuſtom of their Nation) he was ready to receive them: whereupon divers liſted themſelves under him in the Wars.

Alexander's ſacrifice in the Temple, the confirmation of his conqueſt by Daniel's prophecy, his bounty to the Jews.

After that Alexander had thus behaved himſelf at Jeruſalem, he marched with his Army againſt the neighbouring Cities; and whereſoever he went, he was received with great affection. But the Samaritans, whoſe Metropolitan City at that time was Sichem (ſcituate near unto the Mountain of Garizim, in which there dwelt divers Jews alſo, that were N revolted from their Nation) ſeeing how favourably Alexander had received thoſe of Jeruſalem, they reſolved to profeſs themſelves to be Jews. For ſuch is the nature of the Samaritans, (as we have declared heretofore) that when the Jews are in affliction, they renounce all alliance with them, (wherein they confeſs the truth:) But when they perceive our Affairs to be in proſperous condition, they endeavour to perſuade the World that we are both ſprung from the ſame original, and are deſcended of the race of Ephraim and Manaſſes, the ſons of Joſeph. They came therefore to the Kings preſence, and met him near unto Jeruſalem, with great magnificence, and demonſtration of ſingular affection towards him. And after that Alexander had entertained them, they of Sichem approached near unto him, (being accompanied with thoſe Men of War that Sanaballath had ſent O unto the King) beſeeching him, That he would viſit their City, and honour their Temple with his preſence: whereupon he promiſed, That at his return he would viſit them. They required to give them poſſeſſions by lot; which afterwards he did, (enjoining them to live in his Empire was divided amongſt his Succeſſors, and the Temple built near unto Mount B Jeruſalem, of Samaria and mount Garzim, ſent them into Egypt to inhabit there: and being aſſured that thoſe of Jeruſalem were moſt firm in maintaining their oaths and promiſes, according as it appeared by their anſwer made to Alexander, when after the diſcomfiture of Darius, he ſent Ambaſſadors unto them: he put divers of them into his Garriſons, giving them the ſame priviledges in the City of Alexandria, which the Macedonians had. After he had received their oath, that they ſhould be faithful unto him and his ſucceſſours, in memory of the great truſt and favours he had beſtowed on them, many of the other Jews likewiſe of their own accord went into Egypt, partly B allured thereunto by the plenty of the countrey, partly by the liberality of Ptolomey towards their Nation. Yet were there continual quarels betwixt their poſterity and the Samaritans: becauſe they would keep and maintain the cuſtomes and ordinances of their forefathers; whereupon divers wars aroſe amongſt them. For they of Jeruſalem ſaid that their Temple was the true Sanctuary of God, and would have the offerings and ſacrifices ſent thither; the Samaritans on the other ſide commanded them to be brought to the mount Garazim.

Ptolomey Philadelphus cauſed the Laws of the Jews to be tranſlated into the Greek tongue: and diſmiſſing many Captive Jews, dedicateth many preſents to the Temple of God. C Hedio & Ruffinus, chap. 2. The Library of Ptolomey Phyladelphus.

AFter the death of Ptolomeus Soter his Son Ptolomeus Philadelphus ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Egyptt, and held it for nine and thirty years ſpace, he it was that tranſlated the law into the Greek tongue, and delivered the Jews from that ſervitude, wherein they were inthralled in Egypt to the number of ſixſcore thouſand upon this occaſion.
Demetrius Phalereus Maſter of the Kings Library, endeavoured to make a collection of all ſorts of Books that were in the world, and brought all which he thought would be agreeable to the King, who was very curious in his collection of Books. D The Kings demanding one day how many thouſands of Volumes he had already gathered: he anſwered him, that he had already gott about two hundred thouſand Volums; but that ſhortly he hoped to have to the number of five hundred thouſand. Beſides he told him, that he had been lately informed that there ware divers Volumes, among the Jews wherein many things touching their Laws and policies were written which were worthy to be known and deſerved a place in ſo memorable and famous a Liberary but that it would be very difficult to tranſlate them into the Greek tongue, for their characters ſeem to have ſome relation to the Syriack, and their pronunciation likewiſe is not much different from it; notwithſtanding they have their phraſe proper and peculiar unto themſelves. But nevertheleſs he believed it might be done, ſince his Majeſty would not think much of any charge; the King approved of this propoſal, and wrote unto E the High Prieſt of the Jews to help him to theſe books. In the mean time a certain man called Ariſtæus, who was intirely beloved by the King by reaſon of his modeſty and had divers times reſolved with himſelf to ſolicit the King, to diſmiſſe all the Jews that were in his Kingdom, ſuppoſing that at that inſtant he had a fit oppertunity to make his requeſt, he ſpake unto Soſibus to Terentin, and Andrew the chief Captain of the Kings guard, beſeeching them to favour him in that which he intended to move to the King. Having found how they ſtood inclined, he addreſſed himſelf unto the King, and ſpake unto him after this manner. Since your Majeſty hath reſolved not only to tranſcribe, but alſo to tranſlate the laws of the Jews I ſhould not ſpeak to your Majeſty with that freedom F and ſincerity which I ought to uſe, if I ſhould not inform you that I know not how this can be fairly done at the ſame time that detain as your ſlaves ſo great a number of Jews within your Kingdom of Egypt? You will therefore do a work anſwerable to the greatneſs of your courage and benignity if you deliver them from their miſery, conſidering that he who gave them their law is God, who governeth your Kingdom (as by diligent inquiry I have certainly learnt) for both they and we adore one God, Creator of all things, whom we call by the name of Jupiter, for as much as he preſerveth our life and the lives of all men. For that honour therefore which you owe unto God, ſend back theſe people into their Countrey, and permit them to inhabit it, who amongſt all men are moſt ſingularly affected to their Religion. Neither hath your grace occaſion to ſuſpect, that I make this addreſs unto you, becauſe I am either allied or G deſcended of any of their Tribes; But only for this reaſon becauſe I am aſſured that there is but one God, who is the Maker of all men, and that he taketh pleaſure in thoſe that

H addict themſelves to beneficence. When Ariſteus had ſpoken thus, the King beholding him with a cheerful countenance, ask'd him, How many thouſands he thought they were, whoſe liberty he deſired? Andrew (being nigh at hand) anſwer'd, That there were more than 120000. Whereupon the King replied, Is this demand, Ariſteus, *a matter of ſmall conſequence, which thou requireſt? Soſibius and Tarentin replied, That he could do nothing more worthy of himſelf, than by ſuch an action, to acknowledge the great obligations which God had laid upon him, in raiſing him to the Throne. The King being well-pleaſed to ſee them ſo unanimous in their requeſt, promiſed that the Jews ſhould be ſet at liberty, and that he would pay unto his Soldiers 120 drachmes for each Jew that was his ſlave: and touching the requeſt made by them, he promis'd them to diſpatch his Letters Patents, in moſt ample I manner, to bring an happy iſſue to Ariſteus ſuit; or rather to ſatisfie the Will of God, which was chiefly to be regarded. Hereupon he ſent out his Proclamation, declaring, That he not only ſet them at liberty, who had been brought thither by his Father, or thoſe of his Army who attended him; but thoſe alſo who heretofore had been in his Kingdom, or lately had been brought thither: And notwithſtanding it was told him, that the money that would be required for their ranſom, would amount to more than 400 Talents, yet ceaſed he not to confirm that which he had promiſed. But that it may more plainly appear how great his Royal magnificence was, I thought good to inſert in this place the Copy of the Edict, which he ſent abroad, to this effect:

The year of the World, 3684. before Chriſt's Nativity, 280.

K Whoſoever of you that in my Fathers ſervice (by bearing Arms under him) have made any inroads into Syria and Phœnicia, and after the conqueſt of Judea, have taken any Priſoners, and brought them into our Cities and Countries, with intent to ſell them: All they alſo, who have heretofore detained any, or at this preſent have any ſuch Captives in their poſſeſſion, they are commanded hereby, to ſet them at liberty that live under their thraldom, receiving for the ranſom of every perſon 120 drachmes; if they are Soldiers, at ſuch time as their wages ſhall be paid them: as for the reſt, they ſhall receive their money out of the Kings Treaſury. For I am perſuaded, that it was contrary to my Fathers intent, and againſt all right, that they have been taken Priſoners, and that their Country hath been haraſſed by the inſolency of the Soldiers, who have thought to make their profit and merchandize by them, by bringing them into Egypt. Having therefore L an eſpecial regard to juſtice, and intending to ſhew mercy to thoſe who are wrongfully oppreſſed, I command that all thoſe Jews *who are detained in ſervitude be diſcharged, and that they who hold them captive, receive the ranſom promiſed by us, ſo as no deceit or fraud be uſed therein.
And to the end that our ordinance be exactly and fully obſerved, our Will is, That this Edict of ours be publickly proclaimed three days after it ſhall come unto your hands; and that thoſe who hold ſuch Priſoners in their poſſeſſion, declare how many Priſoners they have. Moreover, it ſhall be lawful for any man that will, to accuſe ſuch as obey not this Edict; and our pleaſure is, that ſuch as ſhall not obſerve it, ſhall have their goods confiſcated to the Kings uſe.*

The King of Egypts Proclamation touching the liberty of the Jews, ſollicited by Ariſteus.

When this Edict of the Kings, publiſhed to this effect, was proclaimed abroad, and that only point was omitted, that concerned thoſe that before-time had been, and afterwards M the ſecond time were led away Priſoners, in whoſe behalf he had given no direction, he ſhewed himſelf moſt bountiful in like manner toward theſe; and gave order that the number and tallie ſhould be ſpeedily gathered, and the money diſtributed to the Commiſſioners and Treaſurers appertaining to him. This was diſpatched in the ſpace of ſeven dayes, all the Kings ordinance was accompliſhed, and there was laid out for the ranſoms of them all, to the ſum of more than 460 Talents: For the Maſters exacted ſixſcore drachmes for the children alſo, grounding themſelves upon the Kings Edict, by which it was ordained that for every perſon they ſhould have that ſum, extending the ſame even unto children.

After this extraordinary munificence, according to the Kings command, he appointed N Demetrius to make a Decree, touching the Tranſlation of the Books of the Jews. For the King did nothing raſhly, but adminiſtred all things with great wiſdom and circumſpection; and therefore the Copy of Demetrius Propoſal, and the Letters ſent to this effect, are regiſtred, and recorded in writing: the number likewiſe of the Preſents that were ſent, and by whom they were offered. So that whoſoever ſhall behold them, he will judge by the curious workmanſhip, the great skill of the Workman; and by the excellencies of the pieces, he will know by whom each of them was faſhioned. The Copy of the advice given by Demetrius, is this:

Demetrius exhortatory Letter to Ptolomy, touching his Library.

Demetrius to the great King, Health.

Moſt mighty Prince, ſince you have committed the truſt unto me to find out ſuch Books as are wanting to your Library, and to ſearch for ſuch Volumes as hitherto have been hid from my ſight, to the end that I might gather them together after that I had uſed herein all the care that was poſſible; I have found, that amongſt others, we want the Books of the Laws of the Jews. For they being written in Hebrew Characters, we have no notice thereof; nor have we taken the pains to inquire after them, becauſe your Majeſty hath not as yet thought fit to deſire them. But I think it neceſſary, that your Majeſty ſhould have them procured, and that they be faithfully B Tranſlated, becauſe thoſe Laws proceeded from God himſelf; and it is moſt certain, that of all other Laws in the World, they are the wiſeſt and incorrupteſt. For which cauſe, Hecateus the Abderite ſaith, That neither Poets nor Hiſtorians have made any mention of them, nor of thoſe that have been governed under the ſame: becauſe in themſelves they are pure, and are not to be publiſhed by the mouth of the profane. May it therefore pleaſe your Majeſty to write unto the High-Prieſt of the Jews, commanding him to ſend you ſix of every Tribe, ſuch as he ſhall know to be moſt expert in their Law, by whom we may clearly apprehend the ſence contained in thoſe Books, to the end that having the faithful interpretation of thoſe things that are contained therein, we may collect and gather them together, to the ſatisfaction of your Majeſty.

The Kings liberality towards the Jews.

C When the King had in this manner been adviſed, he wrote unto Eleazar the High-Prieſt of the Jews, touching this matter: letting him know what liberty was by him granted unto the Jews that were in his kingdom: He ſent him alſo 50 Talents of gold, to make cups, ewers and veſſels, with an infinite number of precious ſtones, commanding his Cofferers, who had the charge of his Jewels, to ſuffer the Workmen to chooſe what ſtones they liked beſt. Furthermore, he appointed that a hundred Talents ſhould be given for the ſacrifices and oblations, and other uſes of the Temple. But after that I have declared what was the Copy of the Letter ſent unto Eleazar the High-Prieſt, and the manner how he obtained that Sacerdotal dignity, I will give an account of the rich Preſents, and their curious Workmanſhip.

D After the death of Onias the High-Prieſt, his ſon Simon ſirnamed the Juſt, ſucceeded in his place, who for that cauſe was ſo called, by reaſon of the piety which he ſhewed toward God, and good affection which he bare unto his Countreymen. This Simon dying, and leaving behind him one onely ſon, of young and tender years, who was called Onias: his brother (which was this Eleazar of whom we ſpeak at this preſent) took upon him the Prieſthood, and to him wrote Ptolomy, in ſuch manner as is hereafter expreſſed.

King Ptolomy to the High-Prieſt Eleazar, Health.

Ptolomy's Epiſtle to Eleazar for Interpreters to tranſlate the Bible.

Whereas divers Jews dwelt in my kingdom, whom my father had honoured, (though during the Reign of the Perſians they were ſent thither as Priſoners) and made ſome of them E Captains in his Wars, allowing them honourable wages and conditions: To others born in his time in Egypt, he hath committed his Forts and Gariſons, which made them much honoured and feared among the Egyptians. Since my coming to the Government, I have behaved my ſelf graciouſly towards all men, and eſpecially toward thoſe of your Nation, of whom I have delivered more than 100 000 out of Captivity, paying their ranſom out of mine own Coffers: I have likewiſe liſted ſome of thoſe that were of age in the companies and bands of my men of War: I have received ſome into my Court, whom I took to be faithful and loyal, and in my opinion well worthy of ſuch preferment; ſuppoſing this to be the moſt acceptable Preſent that I could offer up unto God, for his Providence in advancing me to the Kingdom. And being deſirous not only to gratifie them, but alſo all thoſe Jews that are in the whole world, I have determined to cauſe F your Law to be Tranſlated, out of Hebrew into Greek, that I might put it in my Library. You ſhall therefore do well, if you chooſe out ſix diſcreet and learned men of every Tribe amongſt you, and ſend them unto me, ſuch as by reaſon of their age ſhall be well inſtructed in your Laws, and ſufficiently enabled to expound the ſame. And I doubt not but that (the work ſucceeding as I hope it will) I ſhall thereby gain great glory. Wherefore I ſend unto you Andrew the chiefeſt Captain of my Guard, and Ariſteus alſo, (whom we eſpecially honour) to confer with you: by whom I have ſent you 100 Talents of ſilver, as the firſt-fruits of thoſe gifts and ſacrifices, which we intend to offer in the Temple. You will do us an eſpecial favor, if you ſignifie your mind unto us by your Letters.

G

As ſoon as Eleazar had received the Kings Letters, he returned him an anſwer full of reſpect, as followeth.

The year of the World, 3684. before Chriſt's Nativity, 280.

A The High Prieſt Eleazar to King Ptolomey, health.

If your ſelf, your Queen Arſinoe, and your children be in health, we do very much rejoyce thereat. We have received your Princely Letters with no ſmall joy, and have read and conſidered the contents thereof; we have alſo publiſhed them in the preſence of all the People, and have declared unto them your piety towards God, and have ſhewed them thoſe veſſelles which you ſent us, twenty of Gold, and thirty of ſilver; with five veſſells, and a Table which you have ſent us as Preſents. We have likewiſe ſhewed them thoſe hundred talents which Andrew and Ariſteus (vertuous and excellently learned men, and honoured by you amongſt your B deareſt friends) have brought unto us, to be employed in ſacrifices and other uſes in the Temple Know therefore that whatſoever you are pleaſed to command we will readily obſerve, that we may acknowledge the benefits, which you have divers wayes beſtowed upon our Nation. We have therefore daily offered ſacrifice for you, your Queen Arſinoe, your children and friends: the people likewiſe have prayed that God would ſend you happy ſucceſs in whatſoever you deſire, that your Kingdom may be continued in peace, and that the tranſlation of our Law may be accompliſhed at your deſire, for our own ſatisfaction. To that intent we have choſen ſix Elders out of every Tribe, whom we ſend unto you, together with the original of our Law. Our requeſt is, that according to your accuſtomed piety and juſtice, you return us both our Laws and theſe interpreters in ſafety, as ſoon as they have anſwered your expectation. Fare C you well.

Eleazars Letters in anſwer to Ptolomey.

This is the anſwer which the High Prieſt ſent unto him. I have not thought it neceſſary to ſet down the names of the ſeventy two Elders in particular, who were ſent by Eleazar together with the law, although they were all mentioned in the Letter ſent by the High Prieſt. Yet I think it not amiſs to recite the excellency of thoſe Preſents that were ſent by the King, and offered up unto God; to the end that all men may know how zealous he was towards the ſervice of God. For in performance thereof, he ſpared no expence, but continually aſſiſted the workemen and examined their workmanſhip; to the end that nothing might be careleſly finiſhed, or negligently performed. D I will therefore ſet down (as near as I can) the excellency of every piece (although it may be that the courſe of Hiſtory requireth it not) becauſe my deſire is, by ſo doing, to let the Reader know how great the liberality and generoſity of the King hath been. I will begin with the magnificent Table.

The deſcription of thoſe Preſents which Ptolomey dedicated in the Temple of Jeruſalem.

The King deſirous to make it ſurpaſſe that at Jeruſalem inquired after the dimenſions of it, to the intent that he might make it far greater. And having certain notice how large it was, and that there was no lett but that he might make his far greater, he ſaid that he would have it five times greater than the other: but that he feared leſt being ſo great it would be unfit to offer ſacrifice thereupon; and his intention was, that the preſent which he offered, ſhould not only ſerve for ſhew, but that they might alſo be E ſomewhat proper for the uſe and ſervice of the Temple. Wherefore concluding that the firſt was of a ſize large enough, he reſolved his ſhould not exceed the other in greatneſs; but that equalling it in the quantity of Gold, it ſhould exceed it in the variety and beauty of workmanſhip. For he was very ſkilful in all arts very ingenious in all new inventions ſo that by his own judgement, he contrived ſuch things as were not before in uſe; and commanded them to make and finiſh them, having alwayes an eye to the model, which he had given them to worke by. He undertook therefore to make the Table of two Cubits and a half in length, of one in breadth, and of one and a half in heigth all of maſſie Gold: about which there was made a border, of a hand bredth; enriched with moving waves, on which there was a figure graven with F admirable art, appearing on three ſides: For being triangular, every angle preſented the ſame engraving; ſo that when it was turned, it ſeemed that one and the ſame figure, repreſented it ſelf. Within the inſide of this border it was inchaſed with divers goodly figures, but on the out-ſide it was far more excellently beautified and wrought becauſe in that part it was moſt open to the eye. For this cauſe the upper part of the Table appeared to be of two parts, and of three angles, which (as we ſaid) were apparent at ſuch time as the Table was turned, each one ſeeming of equal magnitude with the other. Upon the graven bends there were precious ſtones inchaſed, diſtant by equal proportion the one from the other, and faſtned by Golden buttons tyed by loopes. The ſides of the borders (which preſented themſelves to the eye) G were beautified with rich ſtones, diſpoſed after the manner of an oval; and there was a border of golden twigs engraven round about the Table: under the ovals there was a Crown garniſhed with cluſters of divers ſorts of fruits, the cluſters of grapes hung down, the ears of Corn ſtood upright, and all was incloſed with Pomegranats, H and the precious ſtones were inchaſed in gold throw the whole circuit of the Table, to preſent each ſort of fruit in their native colours. There was alſo a rank of ovals under the Crown, not unlike to the former, made of Gold: ſo that on both ſides, both the variety and delicacy of the work appeared, both in the bends and borders, as alſo in the Table, in which their appeared not any difference, on whatſoever ſide it was turned; and from the tope unto bottom one and the ſame workmanſhip appeared. For it had a plate of Gold four fingers broad, comprehending the breadth of the Table, on which the feet of the ſame were ſtaied, which were afterwards faſtned to the border by buttons and claſps of Gold, to the end that the excellent and curious workmanſhip might the better be ſeen, and on what ſide ſoever it were turned, it might alwayes ſeem I the ſame. They engraved alſo on the ſame, a labyrinth, in the midſt whereof there were divers kinds of precious ſtones, ſhining like Stars: and amongſt the reſt there were Rubies and Emeralds of moſt orient brightneſs, as alſo all other ſorts of Stones that either are eſteemed for their beauty and price. Near unto this labyrinth from the one end unto the other there were certain knots ingraven, the middle whereof was like to a Rhombus or Loſenge, upon which there were certain pieces of Chryſtal and Amber, enchaced and placed one by the other in equal diſtance, and proportion: which gave a marvelous ſatisfaction to the beholders. The Corniches of the feet were made after the forme of a Lilly; the leaves whereof bent themſelves under the Table, and the ſtalke ſeemed to be ſtretehed out ſtraight. The baſe of the ſame was an hands breadth K large, adorned with a Carbuncle in every part, The breadth thereof was eight fingers, on which all the plate of the feet was ſtaied; and one every one of them was there engraven by curious workmanſhip Ivy and Vine branches loaden with cluſters of grapes, ſo made to the life, that they ſeemed to be grapes indeed. For the whole was ſo ſubtile and dilicate, that when the wind blew, the workmanſhip waved and was carried up and down; ſo that it ſeemed that theſe fruits were rather natural, than counterfeited by art. The work was made after a new faſhion, as if it conſiſted of three pieces: and notwithſtanding it was ſo well ſhut and cloſed together, that the ſeames and joynts might not any wayes be ſeen: The thickneſs of the Table was no leſs than half a Cubit. L

See here what this was, which the King preſented: wherein the price of the ſtuff, the diverſity and beauty of the workmanſhip, and the excellency of the engraving was very excellent; ſo that the richneſs of the materials, and the great variety of ornaments of this magnificent preſent made it evident that though this great Prince could not for the reaſons, before mentioned, make this Table larger than the former, yet he ſpared no charges to make it ſurpaſs it in all other reſpects. He gave beſides this, two veſſels of Gold, ſcaled from the bottom as far as the half part of the Cup; and beſides that, inriched with divers precious Stones curiouſly enchaſed. And in the midſt of them there was a labyrinth a Cubit high, made of all ſorts of precious Stones, and at the foot thereof were ingraven ſpires, after the manner of twigs, and M faſt by them a certain fold like unto a net made in oval faſhion, that aſcended even unto the brimes. The midſt thereof was filled with little targets, of the bigneſs of four fingers, made of precious Stones, and round about the edges thereof were Lillies, ivy flowers, and vines with their cluſters of grapes engraven round about. This was the beauty and excellency of thoſe two Cups, each of them containing twenty and four pints. There were alſo others made of Silver, ſo tranſparent as if they had been of the pureſt Chryſtal, thorow which all things that were put into them, were manifeſtly diſcovered. He cauſed alſo thirty ewers to be made, in which all the Gold that was not covered with precious ſtones, was ſhadowed with ivy leaves, and vine branches moſt curiouſly engraven: and all theſe things were not only curiouſly wrought N by the wonderfull cunning of the workemen; but were in like manner ſeconded by an ambitious diligence of the King, who thinking it not enough that without ſparing for any thing he had undertaken the charge, did oftentimes (forſaking his moſt ſerious affairs) viſit the ſhops, and examine the workes; and that which more and more increaſed their diligence, was, becauſe they ſaw him ſo intent upon the work.

The 70 Interpreters coming to to Alexandria, are Royally entertained.

And theſe were the preſents which were ſent by this King to be dedicated in the Temple of Jeruſalem. All which being conſecrated and layed up in the Temple by the High-Prieſt Eleazar, after he had greatly honoured thoſe that brought them thither, and given them certain preſents to be tendered in his behalf unto the King, O he diſmiſſed and ſent them back again. No ſooner were they arrived in Alexandaria, but the King (having notice thereof, and how the ſeventy two Elders were come with them)

H them) he ſent to ſeek out his Ambaſſadors, Andrew and Ariſtæus, who came and preſented him with letters from the High-Prieſt Eleazar, and anſwered him to all which he demanded of them. And being deſirous to communicate with the Elders that came from Jeruſalem to expound and interpret the Law, he contrary to his ordinary cuſtom and manner diſmiſſed all thoſe that came to him about private buſineſs, to whome he was accuſtomed to give audience every fifth day; as he uſed monthly to forrain Ambaſſadors. Having therefore for that time diſmiſſed them, he kept thoſe by him whom Eleazar had ſent unto him; who coming to his preſence (accompained with thoſe preſents which the High-Prieſt had delivered them to preſent unto him, with the Original where in the Law was written in Golden Letters) he asked them I where their books were: and they diſcovering and opening them, ſhewed them unto him. After the King had ſeen them, he was very much aſtoniſhed, to ſee the parch-ments ſo delicate, and to behold the whole form thereof ſo perfectly conjoyned, that it was impoſſible to diſcover the ſeames: and he told them that he gave them thanks, that were come unto him, and unto him that had ſent them, but more eſpecially unto God, who was the Author of theſe laws. Whereupon the Elders and thoſe that aſ-ſiſted them, cried out altogether, and wiſhed that all good hap might befall the King: who through the exceſſive joy that he conceived, burſt out into tears; For naturally extream joy as well as great grief is the cauſe of tears. After he had commanded that theſe books ſhould be committed to their truſt who were deputed to that office, at length he ſa-K luted the Elders, telling them that it was very requiſite after he ſhould have treated with them concerning the occaſion of their coming to take care of their particular entertainment, In a word, he confeſſed unto them, that their coming was ſo acceptable unto him, that he promiſed them ſo long time as he lived, he would every year renew, and honour the memory of that day, (and by good hap it was the very ſame day wherein he overcame Antigonus by Sea.) His pleaſure was alſo, that they ſhould be his gueſts, and he cauſed divers goodly lodgings to be aſſigned them under the Caſtle.

Nicanor likewiſe, who had the charge to entertain ſtrangers, commanded Dorotheus (who was ordinarily imployed in the ſame) to prepare for every one of them ſuch things, as were neceſſary for their diet and entertainment. For ſo was it ordained L by the King, that in every City, there ſhould be a Commiſſary appointed to provide for forrainers that ſhould come to that place, to the intent they might be treated according to their own cuſtomes: intending thereby, that their entertainment ſhould be the more agreeable unto them, and that they might be the leſs tired with forrain novelties. This cuſtome of his was put in practice at this time by Dorotheus's care and exact diligence, who in his own perſon diſpoſed all that which was neceſſary for that hoſ-pitality. He prepared two places to banquet in, in two ſeveral parts (according as the King had commanded him) ſo that ſome of them might ſit on either ſide of him and the reſt might be placed near unto his Table, omitting nothing of that which concerned their honour. When they were in this manner placed, the King commanded Dorotheus M to entertain them as he was wont to do thoſe who repaired unto his Court from Judæa.
Hereupon he diſmiſſed the Egyptian Prieſt, and others that were wont to make the ordinary prayers: which done he commanded that one of the Elders called Eliſæus (who was a Prieſt) ſhould bleſs the Table: whereupon he ſtanding upright in the midſt of them all, beſought God to bleſs both the King and his Subjects with all happineſs. Whereupon there aroſe an applauſe and acclamation of all men, which being ceaſed, they fell to their banquet, and made good cheer with that which was ſet before them. When the King had kept ſilence ſo long as he thought convenient, he began at laſt to Play the Philoſopher, asking of every one of them certain queſtions in Phyſick, praying them to diſcuſs the ſame; and when each of them in order had very pertinently N anſwered to the queſtion that was propounded unto them, the King took great pleaſure therein, and for twelve days ſpace he continued this feaſt. Whoſo deſireth to know the queſtions that were propoſed unto them in particular, let them read the Book which Ariſtæus hath written to that effect. The King was aſtoniſhed at their anſwers, and the Philoſopher Menedemus confeſſed that they confirmed him in his opinion that all things were adminiſtred by divine providence and that they furniſhed him with reſons to maintain his ſentiments. But the King proteſted in their preſence, that their con-verſation had infinitely contented and inſtructed him, in that by their means he had obtained the good hap to be informed by them how to govern his Kingdom. Whereupon he commanded that each of them ſhould have three talents given him, and that they ſhould O be conveyed to their lodgings. Some four days after, Demetrius took them with him, and led them over that trench of the Sea that containeth ſeven furlongs, and that Bridge which joyneth the Iſland to the continent, and toward the Northern part thereof, he aſſigned them a lodging remote from all noiſe, and fit for contemplation: to A which place after he had brought them, he beſought them, that ſince they had all thoſe things that were neceſſary for the interpretation of their laws, they would apply themſelves unto it without any diſcontinuance of the work, until they had brought it to perfection; whereupon they imployed all the diligence that was poſſible, to the end the interpretation might be exact, intending only this from the morning untill three houres after noon: after which time they imployed the reſt of the day in their refection; and to that end they were furniſhed in all aboundance with all ſorts of victuals. Beſides, Dorotheus preſented them with a part of divers diſhes which were prepared for the King; for ſo had his Majeſty commanded it. Thus every morning entred they the Kings Palace, and after they had ſaluted him they retired themſelves to their accuſtomed place; B and after they had waſhed their hands in the Sea water, and were purified, they ſate down in that manner to proſecute their tranſlation. Now when the law was fully interpreted, and the work was finiſhed, in the ſpace of ſeventy and two days, Demetrius aſſembled all the Jews in that place where the law had been tranſlated, and cauſed it to be read over in the preſence of the interpreters themſelves. Which done, the Aſſembly approved the Expoſitiou of the Interpreters; and praiſed Demetrius, by whoſe ſuggeſtions they enjoyed ſo great a good. They requeſted likewiſe that this Expoſition ſhould be peruſed and over-read by the Nobles and Governours. After this, both the Prieſt, the Elders the Interpreters, and the Magiſtrates of the People required, that ſince this tranſlation was ſo happily atcheived, it might remain unaltered; ſo C that no jot thereof might be changed, Gods juſtice upon thoſe Ethnicks that intermedled with the ſacred Scriptures.

Which reſolution being allowed by all men, it was ordered, that if any man perceived any thing in that tranſlation, which was either exuberant or deficient, he ſhould conſider thereupon and give notice thereof, to the end it might be corrected: dealing herein very diſcreetly, to the end that that which had once been adjudged good, ſhould continue inviolable for ever. The King therefore was highly contented, ſeeing his endeavours and purpoſe in that behalf ſo happily and profitably finiſhed; but above all things, he took pleaſure in reading the Law, admiring at the profound wiſdom of the Law-maker, and began to queſtion with Demetrius, by what means it came to paſs, that neither any Poet nor Hiſtoriographer had made mention of that Law, notwithſtanding that in it ſelf D it was ſo admirable. To whom Demetrius gave this anſwer: that no man was ſo hardy to touch that work, by reaſon that it was Divine, and every way venerable: aſſuring him alſo, that certain men who had attempted to ſet their hands thereto, had been puniſhed by God: giving him to underſtand, how Theopompus, intending to reduce ſome part of that Law into his Hiſtory, had ran mad for more then thirty dayes, and that having ſome intermiſſion of his fit, he appeaſed God by prayer; thereby eaſily conjecturing what was the cauſe of his malady. Moreover, he was certified by a Viſion that appeared unto him in his ſleep, that this inconvenience befell him, becauſe he had too curiouſly ſearched into ſacred and divine matters, and had intended to communicate the ſame unto prophane and wicked men from which enterpriſe when he had deſiſted, he recovered E his right wits again. He likewiſe inſinuated further, that Theodeſtes the Tragick Poet, intending to make mention (in ſome of his Poems of a certain Hiſtory written in the ſacred Scriptures, was ſtrucken blind; and acknowledging the cauſe hereof to proceed from his audacious preſumption, he was reſtored to his ſight after he had appeaſed Gods diſpleaſure.

The preſents which the King beſtowed upon the Interpreters, and thoſe he ſent to Eleazer.

When the King had conſidered on theſe words, according as Demetrius had diſcourſed them unto him, he proſtrated himſelf on the earth, and commanded that the books ſhould be carefully kept, to the end they might continue free from corruption. Furthermore, he exhorted the Tranſlators to repair oftentimes unto him from Judea, aſſuring them that in ſo doing, the matter would redound both to their honor and profit; telling them that for that time he thought good to diſmiſs them: but when they ſhould return unto F him again of their own motion, they ſhould obtain all that which their wiſedom deſerved, or magnificence could impart unto them. This ſaid, he gave them leave to depart, after he had given each of them three ſeveral ſuits of apparel, two talents of gold, and a cup that was, in value, worth a talent, and a certain Bed or curious Couch to ſit and banquet upon. This gave he them for themſelves. But to Eleazer the High Prieſt he ſent, by them, ten Couches, whoſe feet were of ſilver, and the furniture anſwerable, and a veſſel of thirty Talents; Ten Purple Robes likewiſe, and a magnificent Crown, and one hundred pieces of fine linen: and beſides that, he ſent, by way of preſent, unto the Temple Ewers, Baſins and two Golden veſſels: beſeeching Eleazer, by his letters, that if any one of his ſubjects had an inclination to come unto him, he would per- G mit him, aſſuring him that he would highly eſteem the converſation of ſo learned men: and that he had riches which he would imploy with great pleaſure in ſuch affairs. Thus did Ptolomey Philadelphus eſteem and honor the Jews Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 3. The immunities and priviledges granted to the Jews by Seleucus Nicanor, King of Syria.

The priviledge in Antioch continued to the Jews.

Antiochus the great King of Aſia and Syria vexeth the Jews.

THe Jews received honour likewiſe at the hands of the Kings of Aſia, becauſe they had born Arms under them. For Seleucus ſirnamed Nicanor, highly reſpected them, and permitted them to dwell in thoſe Cities which he built in Aſia and lower Syria; and in Antioch which was the Metropolitane chief City. Moreover he gave order, that B they ſhould be held in as great eſtimation, as either the Macedonians or Greeks that inhabited therein: ſo that even unto this day that order is continued as (it appeareth by this) for that the Jews refuſing to anoint themſelves with forrain oyl, do receive a certain ſum of money from the Maſters of the exerciſes in lieu of the Oyl. Which when the people of Antioch intended to aboliſh, during the preſent War, Mutianus at that time Governour of Syria, oppoſed himſelf againſt them. Again, when Veſpaſian and his Son Titus had conquered the world, although the Alexandrians and Antiochians deſired that the priviledges which the Jews enjoyed might continue no longer; yet could they not obtain it. Whereby the humanity and valour of the Romans may appear, and eſpecially of Veſpaſian and Titus, that notwithſtanding they had received ſo great C trouble the Wars of the Jews, and were ſo bitterly incenſed againſt them, for that they had not, by laying down their Arms, ſubmitted themſelves, but had continued War againſt them to the uttermoſt, yet they deprived them not of their privileges, but put a ſtop to that diſpleaſure which they had long before conceived againſt them; and in like manner had no regard to the requeſt of two ſo puſient Cities, as Alexandria, and Antioch: wherefore they granted nothing in favour of them, nor ordained any thing to the prejudice of thoſe whom they had overcome in War, ſo as to aboliſh one jot of thoſe priviledges which they had in times paſt; but ſaid that they that had reſiſted them by Arms, and who had been overcome, were ſufficiently puniſhed for their obſtinacy: and as touching thoſe that had not committed any offence, they ſaw D no reaſon to deprive them of their rights and priviledges. We know likewiſe, that Marcus Agrippa was of the ſame opinion touching the Jews. For whereas the Jonians were ſeditiouſly bent againſt them, and beſought Agrippa, that it might be only lawful for them to make uſe of the priviledges which Antiochus Seleucus's Nephew (whom the Greeks intituled by the Name of God) had given them; requiring, that if the Jews were of their blood, they might be tyed to adore the ſame gods which the Jonians worſhipped: When therefore this matter was referred to the determination of the Judges, the Jews had the better, and obtained the liberty to live according to their own Laws and Cuſtoms: and he that at this time pleaded their cauſe, was Nicholas Damaſcene. For Agrippa pronounced, That it was unlawful for them to innovate any thing. And if any man deſire E to have a more exact knowledge hereof, let him read the 123, and 24 book of the Hiſtories of Nicholas. Neither ought this judgment of Agrippa's, to ſeem in any ſort ſtrange: for at that time our Nation had not by any Wars procured the Romans diſpleaſure. But upon juſt occaſion may a man admire the magnanimity of Veſpaſian, and of his ſon Titus, who behaved themſelves with ſuch moderation after ſo great a War, and ſuch doubtful Battels as they had fought againſt us. But to return to my purpoſe, from whence I have digreſſed. At ſuch time as Antiochus the great reigned in Aſia, the Countrey of Jewry was much haraſſed, and both the Jews and Inhabitants of Cœloſyria endured many miſeries. For Antiochus making War againſt Ptolomey Philopater and his ſon, called Ptolomey the famous, they were miſerably perplexed. For whether Antiochus overcame, or was overcome, they were continually ſpoiled: ſo that betwixt the proſperity and adverſity of F Antiochus, they fared like a ſhip toſſed in a ſtorm. But at length, after Antiochus had overcome Ptolomey, he conquer'd Jewry. After the death of Philopater, his ſon ſent a great Army into Cœloſyria, under the conduct of Scopas, who ſeized a great number of thoſe Cities; and falling upon our Nation alſo, he conquer'd it. Not long after this, Antiochus fought with Scopas, near unto the River Jordan, and obtained the victory, diſcomfiting the greater part of the Enemies Army; at which time Antiochus recover'd again thoſe Cities of Cœloſyria, which were before taken by Scopas. He took Samaria alſo: which when the Jews perceived, they ſubmitted themſelves of their own accord unto him; and having received him into the City of Jeruſalem, they gave both his Army and his Elephants abundance of proviſion, and willingly aſſiſted him with their Forces, to ſubdue thoſe Gariſons which G Scopas had placed in the fortreſſes of the higher City. Whereupon Antiochus ſuppoſing it to be for his honour, to acknowledge and remunerate the affection and forwardneſs which the Jews had expreſſed in his ſervice, wrote unto his Captains and Friends, ſignifying unto them how forward the Jews had been in his Wars: and to let them know, that he was reſolved to gratifie them for their ſervice, Ptolomey Epiphames King of Egypt wareth againſt the King of Syria

Hereafter I will inſert the copy of his letters which he wrote in favour of them, after A I have recited that which Polybius the Megalopolitane, writeth, to this purpoſe, which I will recite out of the ſixteenth Book of his hiſtories. Scopas (ſaith he) the General of Ptolomeys Army, marching towards the mid-land, did in one winter overcome the whole nation of the Jews. He reciteth alſo in the ſame Book that after that Scopas had been overcome Antiochus ſeized Bathanæa, Samaria, Abila, and Gadra; and anon after the Jews, which dwelt at Jeruſalem where the Temple was, joyned themſelves with him: and although we are to ſpeake more amply and particularly of that appartition that hapned neare unto the Temple; yet we ſhall defer the recital hereof untill another time. This is that which Polybius hath written. But to return unto our purpoſe: I will recite B in this place the copy of thoſe letters which were ſent by the King.

King Antiochus to Ptolomey, Health.

Polybius the Megalopolitane of Scopas Ptolomeys Captain.

Antiochus Epiſtle to Ptolomy, as touching the liberty of the Jews.

Whereas the Jews have given us moſt apparent teſtimony of there affection towards us, ſince the firſt time of our entrance into their Countrey, and have magnificently entertained at ſuch time as we were in perſon before their City, by preſenting themſelves before us, with all their Elders; and have alſo furniſhed us largely with all that which was neceſſary for our Souldiers and our Elephants; and have likewiſe taken Arms with us againſt the Ægyptian Garriſon: we have thought fit to afford them ſome ſatisfaction in repairing their City, ruinated by caſualties, to the intent it might be inhabited and Peopled again, by gathering to- C gether thoſe Jews that are ſcattered abroad in divers places, and planting them again in the ſame. And in eſpecial (to the end that the ſervice of God may be renewed) we have ſet down a certain ſum of money, to be imployed in ſacrifices, and in buying Beaſts for their offerings, Wine, Oyl, and incenſe; that is to ſay, twenty thouſand ſicles of Silver; and for fine Floure, according to the law of the place, one thouſand, four hundred and ſixty meaſures of Wheat, and three hundred, ſeventy and five meaſures of ſalt. And my will is, that all theſe things that are above-named, be delivered unto them according to the form of our ordinance. We likewiſe command, that the work of the Temple be finiſhed with the galleries, and other neceſſary buildings; and that all the Timber be brought out of Judea and other places, and eſpecially out of Libanus, without any tax or tallage: which exemption alſo ſhall D take effect in all other neceſſaryes that are requiſite towards the reparation of ſo famous a Temple. My pleaſure likewiſe is, that all they of the ſame Nation govern their State, according to their own laws. Let the antient Prieſts and Scribes of the Temple alſo, and the ſinging men be freed from all taxations, that are payed by the powl, and the tributes, of the Crown and all other whatſoever. And to the end that the City may be the ſooner built, I grant unto all them that inhabit the ſame as this preſent, or that hereafter tranſport themſelves thither within the month of October, to inhabit the ſame with exemption from all charges for three years ſpace. We forgive them moreover the third part of their tributes, to the intent they may recover their loſſes. We will alſo that thoſe Citizens that have been forcibly led from thence into ſervitude, be ſet at liberty, both they themſelves, and alſo thoſe that are of their E alliance; commanding their goods to be reſtored unto them. Farewell

The Edict of Antiochus the great in honor of the Temple.

Theſe are the contents of this Letter. And to yeild the more honour unto the Temple, he ſent an edict thorow all his Kingdom to this effect.

That it ſhould not be lawfull for any ſtranger, to enter within the incloſure of the Temple without the Jews permiſſion; except thoſe that ſhould be purified according to the law and cuſtom of the place. That no man ſhould bring into the city any fleſh of Horſes, Mules, wild or tame Aſſes, Leopards, Foxes, or Hares, or Generally of any Cattel prohibited to be eaten by the laws of the Jews. That it ſhould not be lawful likewiſe for any man to bring their Skins into the City or to nouriſh any ſuch beaſts in the ſame, but that it might be only lawfull to uſe theſe beaſts which might be ſacrificed unto God, according to the law of their anceſtors. That whoſoever ſhould not obſerve theſe laws he ſhould pay three thouſand drachmes of ſilver F unto the Prieſts. Furthermore, to expreſs his piety and fidelity towards us, at ſuch time as he heard of the troubles that happned in Phrygia and Lydia, he wrought alſo unto Zeuxis Governour of one of the higher Provinces, and his intire friend, commanding him to ſend certain of our Nation from Babylon to Phrygia, writing unto him unto this effect.

King Antiochus to Zeuxis his Father, Health.

Underſtanding that thoſe of Lydia and Phrygia are newly fallen into Rebellion, I have thought good (according to my duty) to prevent the ſame: and whileſt I conſulted with my friends what was to be done, it hath been thought fit that two thouſand Families of the Jews ſhould be ſent thither; all which ſhould be drawn out of Meſopotamia and Babylon, to plant them in Gariſons, and places of ſecurity. For I am perſuaded of their good affection and zeal towards us, both in reſpect of their devotion towards God, as alſo from the teſtimony which our Predeceſſors have given them, namely, that they are faithful, and ready to execute that wherein they are employed. I Moreover, it is our pleaſure, that notwithſtanding all difficulties, you cauſe them to paſs thither, and permit them to live according to their own Laws. Now when they ſhall arrive in that place, thou ſhalt beſtow on every one of them ground to build them houſes on, with ſufficient Lands both for Tillage, and to plant their Vineyards in; for which they ſhall pay no Tribute for ten years ſpace: and during ſuch time as they may gather of their own for their ſuſtenance, they ſhall be allowed their proviſion of Corn for themſelves, and their ſervants. Our will is alſo, that they who ſhall be employed on neceſſary affairs, be ſufficiently provided of that they need, to the intent that being ſo bountifully dealt withall by us, they may ſhew themſelves the more affectionate in that which concerneth us. Thou ſhalt give order alſo to the uttermoſt of thy power, that this Nation be no wayes oppreſſed, or injured by any man. Farewell.

Antiochus's Epiſtle to Zeuxis, in which he maketh honourable mention of the Jews.

Hitherto we have ſufficiently declared what friendſhip Antiochus the Great bare unto the Jews. After this, Antiochus contracted an alliance and friendſhip with Ptolomy, who gave him his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, and aſſigned him for her dowry Cœloſyria, Samaria, Judea, and Phœnicia; and becauſe theſe two Kings divided the Tributes between them, the chiefeſt in authority in every Province, collected from their Countrey, and paid the Sum agreed upon to the Kings Treaſury.

Antiochus's friendſhip and confederacy with Ptolomy. The Samaritans moleſt the Jews.

At that time the Samaritans puffed up with their proſperity, vexed the Jews, ſpoiling their Countrey, and leading them away Priſoners by force. This hapned under the High-Prieſt Onias. For after the deceaſe of Eleazar, Manaſſes his Uncle obtained the Prieſthood, and after the death of Manaſſes, L Onias the ſon of Simon, ſirnamed the Juſt, enjoyed this dignity. Simon was brother to Eleazar, as I have heretofore related. This Onias was of no great capacity, and withall was very covetous: by which means he failed to pay the twenty Talents of ſilver which his Predeceſſors were wont to pay to the Kings of Egypt, of that Tribute which the People paid unto him. Whereupon Ptolomy Evergetes, the father of Philopater, was grievouſly incenſed againſt him; ſo as he ſent an Ambaſſador to Jeruſalem to accuſe him, becauſe he failed to pay his accuſtomed Tribute, threatning him, that if henceforth he received it not, he would divide the Countrey amongſt his Soldiers, and ſend them to inhabit it. When the Jews heard this they were much troubled: but Onias was no whit moved thereby becauſe he was wholly given over to covetouſneſs.

CHAP. IV. A

Joſeph, the Nephew of the High-Prieſt Onias, obtains pardon for his Uncle, of Ptolomy King of Egypt, gets the favor of that Prince, and raiſeth a very conſiderable fortune for himſelf. Hircanus, the ſon of Joſeph, becomes a great Favourite of Ptolomy. The death of Joſeph.

The Taxation of the High-Prieſt for offending the King.

But a certain man call'd Joſeph, the ſon of Tobias and of Onias ſiſter, who was the High-Prieſt, being young in years (but honored in Jeruſalem for his wiſdom, foreſight and juſtice) having certain notice by his mother of the arrival of this Ambaſſador, came unto the City (for he had been abſent in the Village of Phicala where he was born) and ſharply reproved Onias his Uncle on the mothers ſide, becauſe he did not any wayes provide B for the ſecurity of his Countrey, but ſought to draw his Countreymen into a general hazard, in that he retained in his hands that mony which was levied for the Tribute. whereby he told him, that he had obtained the Government over the people, and purchaſed the High Prieſthood. And that if he were ſo bewitched with mony, that for the love of it, he could have the patience to ſee his Countreymen in hazard, and behold his Citizens ſuffer all that which cruelty could inflict upon them, he adviſed him to repair to the King, and to require him to beſtow the whole or the half of the Tribute upon him. Hereunto Onias anſwer'd, That he would no more execute the Government; and that if it was poſſible for him, he was ready to give over the Prieſthood, rather than repair unto the King. Whereupon Joſeph asked him, If he would permit him, in the peoples behalf, to go Ambaſſador to Ptolomy. C Whereunto Onias anſwer'd, That he gave him leave. Upon this occaſion, Joſeph went up into the Temple, and ſummoned the people to a general Aſſembly, exhorting them to be no ways troubled, and to conceive no fear through the negligence of his Uncle Onias, wiſhing them to be of good courage, and promiſing them that he himſelf would go Ambaſſador unto the King, and faithfully plead their Cauſe before him, and perſuade him that they had committed no inſolent neglect or contempt againſt his Majeſty; which when the people underſtood, they gave Joſeph hearty thanks. Whereupon he preſently came down from the Temple, and honorably entertained the Ambaſſadors that came from Ptolomy, and having preſented them with gifts of great value, and feaſted them magnificently for many dayes, he ſent them back to their Prince; aſſuring them, that he would in perſon follow D them. And the rather was he incited to this journey, becauſe the Ambaſſador had perſuaded him to come into Egypt, under ſuch aſſurance, that he would obtain all his requeſts at Ptolomy's hands; the rather, for that he was won with the young mans free ſpirit and noble entertainment.

The Kings Ambaſſador honourably entertained, who reporteth Joſeph's liberality upon his return into his Countrey.

As ſoon as the Ambaſſador returned into Egypt, he certified the King of Onias's ingratitude, and Joſeph's humanity: certifying him, that he would come in perſon to entreat pardon for the People for that offence they had committed againſt him; and the rather, for that he was in eſpecial authority among the People: and he ſo far enlarged himſelf in the praiſe of Joſeph, that both the King and Queen Cleopatra had a good opinion of him, although he was as yet abſent. But Joſeph ſent unto Samaria to his Friends, and E borrow'd money, making preparation for his Voyage. Having therefore furniſhed himſelf with Apparel, Veſſels and Horſes, and with almoſt twenty thouſand drachms, he arrived at Alexandria.

At that time it hapned, that the Princes and Governors of Phœnicia and Syria repaired thither to farm their Tributes; for the King was accuſtomed every year to ſell them to the men of moſt reſpect in every City: theſe meeting with Joſeph on the way, began to mock at his baſeneſs and poverty. But when he came to Alexandria, and had intelligence that the King was at Memphis, he ſet forward, and went out to meet him. When therefore the King, accompanied with the Queen, and Athenion his Friend, who had diſcharged the place of Ambaſſador in Jeruſalem, came riding in his Chariot; Athenion (who had been F honorably entertained by Joſeph) perceiving him upon the way, certified the King that it was he of whom he had ſpoken upon his return from Jeruſalem: proteſting on his behalf, that he was a virtuous and honorable young man. Whereupon Ptolomy received him with more kindneſs than the reſt, and made him come up into his Chariot; where he was no ſooner ſeated, but the King began to accuſe Onias for what he had committed. But Joſeph ſaid unto him, Pardon him, O King, and have reſpect to his old age. For you know that ordinarily old men and young children have one and the ſame underſtanding; but from our ſelves who are young, you ſhall have what you pleaſe to require, without any pretext or cauſe of diſcontent.

H This wiſe anſwer increaſed the affection which the King had allready conceived for him: whereupon he commanded that he ſhould be lodged in his own Palace, and that daily he ſhould accompany him at his Table.

The year of the World, 3770, before Chriſt's Nativity, 194.

As ſoon as the King came back to Alexandria, the Lords of Syria ſeeing Joſeph ſitting near unto the King, were diſpleaſed: and the day drawing near wherein they were to know what they ſhould pay for their tribute, they that were of the greateſt quality in their countrey farmed it; ſo that the Tributes of Cœloſyria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria, amounted together to eight thouſand talents. Whereupon Joſeph ariſing, blamed the farmers, becauſe they had deſigned amongſt themſelves to beat down the price of the tributes, promiſing to give double; and that he would likewiſe return the I forfeitures that were levied upon the goods of ſuch as offended; which were farmed together with the tributes. The King gave ear to this diſcourſe of his with great content and ſaid, that he approved the ſale of theſe tributes unto Joſeph, who would hereby ſo conſiderably augment his revenue. When therefore he was asked whether he could give ſuretie?
he made him anſwer with great confidence: O King (ſaid he) I will give thee ſuch pledges as are both worthy and honorable, and ſuch as you cannot miſtruſt. When therefore the King deſired him to produce them: I will (ſaid he) O King, preſent thee for ſureties, thy ſelf and the Queen thy Wife, that one of you may be ſurety for me to the other. Ptolomey ſmiling hereat, granted him the farm of the tribute, without farther ſurety. This favor of his diſpleaſed thoſe Governours of the Cities that were come into Egypt, in that K they ſaw themſelves contemned and conſtrained to return with ſhame unto their houſes. But Joſeph obtained 2000 footmen from the King; that he might by their aſſiſtance levy the tribute from thoſe Cities, who were negligent in their payments: and after he had borrowed five hundred talents of the Kings friends in Alexandria, he departed into Syria.

The tributes of Cœloſyria committed to Joſeph.

As ſoon as he came to Aſcalon, he demanded the payment of the tribute at the Citizens hands, which they not only refuſed, but moreover upbraided him with injurious words. Whereupon laying hold on about twenty of the principal among them, he put them to death: and having gathered their ſubſtances together, he ſent the King ſome thouſand talents, certifying him of that which he had done. Ptolomy admiring L at his wiſdom, and approving what he had done permitted him to diſpoſe of all things at his pleaſure. The Syrians when they heard this began to fear the like ſeverity; and perceiving that the Aſcalonites were ſlain by Joſeph, they opened their gates, and received him willingly, and payed him their tributes. Whereas alſo the Scythopolitanes contumaciouſly refuſed to lay down, according to order, their accuſtomed tributes, he ſlew the chiefeſt amongſt them: and ſent the confiſcation of their goods unto the King.
When therefore he had gathered much ſilver and made great gains of the farming of the tributes, to the intent he might eſtabliſh and make his power of longer continuance, he liberally employed his gains, conſidering with himſelf, that it was a part of wiſdom to ſeccure his good fortune, by thoſe riches which he himſelf had gotten: For he ſent M many preſents both to the King and Queen, and gave liberally to their friends and favorites, and to all thoſe which had any authority or credit in the Court, that he might win and bind them unto him by his benevolence. And in this felicity continued he twenty two years; during which time he was the father of ſeven children by one wife, and of another called Hircanus, by another Wife who was the Daughter of his Brother Solymius, whom he married upon this occaſion.

The Aſcalonites and Scythopolitanes puniſhed for their contempt.

Going once to Alexandria in the company of his brother (who carried with him his daughter already marriageable, intending to beſtow her upon ſome Jew of good quality whileſt he ſate at meat with the King, a fair Damſel coming into the room danced ſo well that ſhe gained the heart of Joſeph, whereupon, he told his brother of it, praying N him ſince by the laws of their Countrey it was forbidden to a Jew to marry a ſtranger, that he would hide his fault, and be an aſſiſtant unto him, that he might procure her for his Miſtriſs. His brother promiſed him his aſſiſtance and in the mean time he dreſs'd up his own daughter, and brought her, by night, unto his bed: whereupon he lay with her (not knowing who ſhe was, becauſe he had drunk over much,) and had her company.
His love ſtill increaſed, and not knowing how to conquer his paſſion he told his brother that he feared the King would not beſtow this Damſel on him. His brother told him that he need not trouble himſelf, promiſing that he ſhould enjoy her whom he loved, and that allready ſhe was his wife; letting him know the whole contrivance, and how he had rather wrong his own daughter than to ſuffer his brother to fall into diſhonor.

Joſephs wealth and children.

O After that Joſeph had commended the kind and natural affection of his brother towards him, he took his daughter to Wife, who bare him a Son called Hircanus, as it hath been ſaid. Who being thirteen years old, gave teſtimony of that natural ſpirit, and dexterity that was in him; by reaſon whereof his brethren conceived an hatred againſt him A and the rather becauſe he excelled them in all things, and thereby inſtead of gaining their love he raiſed their jealouſy and hatred. Whereas Joſeph was deſirous to know which of his children had the ripeſt Judgement, and underſtanding; he ſent them one after another to thoſe maſters, who were moſt renowned for Science in that time; but all of them returned back unto him rude, and illiterate, becauſe they were negligent and idle. Whereupon he ſent Hircanus the youngeſt of them into a deſart place diſtant from the high way ſome ſeven dayes journey, and gave him with him three hundred couple of Oxen, to ſow the ground in that barren place, concealing from him the yokes that ſhould couple them together.

When therefore he came unto the place, and perceived that the yokes were miſſing B he asked advice of ſome of the husbandmen: who counſelled him to ſend ſome one back unto his Father to fetch the couples. But he ſuppoſing he ought not to loſe ſo much time as would be ſpent in ſending back a meſſenger, he made uſe of a contrivance which ſeemed much beyond his years. For he cauſed ten couple of the oxen to be ſlain, and diſtributed the fleſh amongſt his workmen, and made them cut the Skins, and faſhion couples thereof, and having yoked his Oxen, he cauſed the land to be manured, according to his Fathers direction; and afterwards returned home unto him. Whereupon he loved him the more intirely, by reaſon of his wiſdom and the ſubtlety of his underſtanding; and eſteemed him as if he had no other child but him alone, but this increaſed the malice and envy of his brothers. C Joſeph ſendeth his Son Hircanus to Ptolomey.

When news was brought unto Joſeph, that about that time King Ptolomey was bleſſed with a young Son, and how all the chiefeſt Lords of Syria, and the Countries under his obeyſance, repaired to Alexandria in great pomp to celebrate the birth-day of the Kings Son; he being of himſelf unable (by reaſon of his age) to go thither, he asked his Children, whether any one of them would go and compliement the King. When therefore the eldeſt Sons had excuſed themſelves, and refuſed to undertake the journey, pretending they were unfit to performe the meſſage, and underſtood not the manner of living at Court, all of them adviſing that their brother Hircanus might be ſent: Joſeph was well pleaſed thereat, and calling for Hircanus asked him if he would go to King Ptolomy: he promiſed to undertake the journey, and told his Father he needed no great ſum of D money to perform it, becauſe he ſhould travel frugally, and content himſelf for the whole expence with ten thouſand drachms. Joſeph was very glad to hear of his Sons prudence; and after Hircanus had kept ſilence for a while he adviſed his Father, that he ſhould not preſent the King with any thing out of Judea, but that he ſhould write unto his factor in Alexandria, commanding him to deliver ſuch ſummes of money as he thought convenient to buy that which he found to be moſt magnificent and of beſt eſteem in the City. Joſeph imagining that perhaps he would imploy about ten talents in preſents and approving of his Sons Counſel, wrote unto his factor Arion (who had the uſe of almoſt three thouſand talents of his in Alexandria.) For gathering up his money in Syria, he was wont to ſend it thither; and as oft as the prefixt time came E wherein the Kings tributes were to be paid, he commanded Arion to pay them. Having therefore letters of Credit unto him, he went towards Alexandria. Whereupon his brethren wrote preſently unto all the Kings friends, that by ſome means they would make him away.

Treaſon intended againſt Hircanus.

Hircanus apology for his actions.

As ſoon as he was arrived in Alexandria, and had delivered his fathers Letters to Arion; Arion asked him how many talents he would have? hoping that he would deſire but ten, or thereabout: but when Hircanus had told him he had need of a thouſand, he waxed wroth, and reproved him for his prodigality, telling him how his Father had gathered his goods with much labour and frugality, and refuſing to give it him, he prayed him to imitate his fathers example: and in a word he told him, that he would deliver him no more than ten talents; and that for no other uſe, than to buy preſents for the King. F Whereupon Hircanus was offended and cauſed Arion to be kept in Priſon. Whereof his Wife informed Queen Cleopatra and deſired her that the young man might be chaſtiſed for his inſolence (for Arion was in great eſteem with the Queen, ſo that ſhe acquainted the King with the matter.) Whereupon Ptolomey ſent for Hircanus, and ſaid unto him; That he marveiled, that being ſent unto hin by his Father, he had not as yet viſited him; and beſides that he had committed his Fathers Agent to Priſon: he therefore commanded him to yield him a reaſon thereof. Whereunto he anſwered, that there was a law among the Jews that no man ſhould taſte of the ſacrifices that had not firſt of all viſited the Temple, and ſacrificed unto God; and that in that reſpect he had not hitherto viſited his Majeſty, becauſe he expected G certain preſents to preſent unto his Majeſty from his Father, who was his Servant. Furthermore, he alledged that he puniſhed his Fathers Servant, becauſe he had diſobeyed his command-

Hircanus apologie for his actions.

When Ptolomey heard theſe words, he roſe well pleaſed, and wondred at the magnanimity of the young man. Arion perceiving that the King roſe ſatisfied, and that he was like to have no aſſiſtance at his hands, delivered Hircanus the thouſand talents, and by this means he was ſet at liberty. Some three days after, Hircanus came and ſaluted both the King and Queen: who entertained him graciouſly, and feaſted him, for the kindneſs which they bear unto his Father. He enquiring among the Merchants, bought one hundred young Lads well learned, and in the flower of their age, paying a talent B for each one; and the like number of Virgins for ſo many talents. Being invited to a banquet by the King, with all the Princes and other Lords, he was placed beneath them all, becauſe that (by reaſon of his youth) they that aſſigned the places, according to every mans dignity, made ſmall account of him. The reſt that ſate at table, after they had eaten their meat laid all their bones before Hircanus, ſo that the table was covered round about him whereupon a certain Droll called Triphon (in whoſe railery the King took ſome delight) to divert the company, ſaid, Hircanus jeſts.

See here Sir what ſtore of bones lie before Hircanus whereby you may conjecture after what manner his Father hath fleeced all Syria. The King laughing at Tryphons words, asked Hircanus, how he came by ſo many bones before him? Not without good reaſon (ſaid he) O C King; for doggs devour the fleſh with the bones, as theſe do (poynting at thoſe who ſate with him at the Table, becauſe they had no bones before them:) but men eat the fleſh, and caſt the bones away, as I do, becauſe I am a man. The King was ſo well pleaſed with his diſcreet anſwer that he commanded the reſt not to offer him any affront for the future.

Hircanus ſounding what other men would give, gave more than the reſt; for which he receiveth another kingly reward.

The next day he ſought out all the Kings friends, and the principal Courtiers, and ſaluted them one by one, enquiring of their Servants, what preſents they would court the King with upon the birth of his Son? Who told him that ſome of them would give twelve Talents, and others that were in dignity, would preſent them according to their ability. Whereupon Hircanus ſeemed diſſatisfied as wanting power to offer ſuch a preſent, pretending that he had no more than five Talents. All which theſe Servants D preſently reported to their Maſters: who were very joyful thereat, in hopes that the King would not be well pleaſed to receive a ſmall preſent from Hircanus. Now when the day of ſolemnity was come, and they that pretended to preſent the King moſt magnificently, offred no more than twenty Talents: Hircanus preſented the hundred young Lads he had bought to the King, and the Virgins unto Cleopatra: for whom he had paid a talent by the pole. At this unexpected magnificence, all men were amazed: but beſides this, he gave gifts of divers Talents to the King and Queens favourites and Servants, and their attendants; whereby he ſecured himſelf from the danger that might fall upon him by their means. For the brothers of Hircanus had written unto them to murther him. Ptolomey was much pleaſed with the great magnificence of this young E man, and bid him ask whatſoever he pleaſed at his hands. But he required no other thing but that it would pleaſe the King to recommend him, by his letters, to his father and brethren. When therefore the King had particularly honored him, and had given him many rewards, he wrote unto his Father and brethren, and all his Governours, and Commiſſaries, and in that manner ſent him away. His brothers hearing how he had in all things highly pleaſed the King, and that he returned with great glory, they went out to meet him, with an intent to murther him, with their fathers knowledg. For he being diſpleaſed with him, by reaſon of his above mentioned large expence, took no care to ſecure him: yet concealed he his diſcontent for fear of the King. But when his brothers came and encountered him on the way he ſlew divers of thoſe that ac- F compained them, and two of his brethren alſo were left ſlain upon the place, and the reſt fled unto Jeruſalem unto their Father. And when upon his comming unto Jeruſalem, he perceived that no man welcomed him, he was afraid, and departed preſently from thence to the other ſide of Jordan, where he paſt his life in receiving and gathering the tributes of the Barbarians. In that time Seleucus ſirnamed Soter, the Son of Antiochus the great, reigned in Aſia. At that time alſo died Joſeph, Hircanus Father, who was a man of good repute and great courage; who eſtabliſhed the people of the Jews in a laſting Peace, and freed them from poverty and many diſaſters, and collected the Tributs of Syria, Phœnica, and Samaria, for the ſpace of twenty two years. His Uncle Onias died alſo about the ſame time; leaving the Prieſt-hood to his Son Simon; after G whoſe death, his Son Onias was made High Prieſt: to whom Arius King of Lacedemon ſent an Embaſſage and letters, the copy whereof heareafter enſueth.

Sedition among the people, after Joſeph's death.

After the death of Joſeph it came to paſs, that the people began to mutinie in the quarrel of his Children, For the elder brethren made War againſt Hircanus, who was the younger, by means whereof the People were divided: The greater part of them followed the Elder faction, and the High Prieſt Simon alſo, by reaſon of his affinity with them, followed their party. Whereupon Hircanus reſolved to repair no more un- K to Jeruſalem, but fixing his habitation on the other ſide of Jordan, he made continual War againſt the Arabians, ſlaying a great number of them, and taking many priſoners.
He built an huge Tower of white Marble from the bottome to the top and on it he placed the figures of many living Creatures in ſculpture of great height. About the ſame he cut a deep trench of water; and having hewed the front of the Rock that ſtood over againſt the bulding, he made divers caves therein, many furlongs long. He alſo made divers chambers therein, both to eat and ſleep and dwell in. He drew thither likewiſe currents of ſpringing water, in ſo great abundance, that it gave much delight to thoſe that dwelt there, and great ornament to the whole bulding. The mouth of every Cave was ſo little, that but one only man could enter at once: which he there- L fore made ſo narrow, becauſe they might the better ſerve for his ſecurity and refuge; that if ſo be he were at any time aſſaulted by his bretheren, he might avoyd the danger of ſurpriſal. Moreover, he built within his Caſtle many large halls, which he adorned with great and goodly Gardens: and this place thus built, was called by him Tyre and is ſcituate between Arabia and Judæa, on the other ſide of Jordan, not far from the Countrey of Eſſedon. He commanded in this Countrey ſeven years, all that time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. After whoſe death, his brother Antiochus, ſirnamed Epiphanes, obtained the Kingdom. Ptolomey alſo King of Egypt (who was likewiſe called Epiphanes) died and left two children very young behind him, of whom the eldeſt was called Philometer, and the younger Phiſcon. But when Hircanus perceived that Antiochus grew very powerful M ONias the High-Prieſt being dead about this time, Antiochus gave the Prieſthood to Jeſus, ſirnamed Jaſon, his brother. For that ſon unto whom Onias had left the ſucceſſion, was as yet very young (of whom we will ſpeak in convenient time and I place. This Jeſus, (Onias brother) was deprived of the Prieſthood, through the Kings diſpleaſure conceived againſt him, who gave it ſhortly after to his younger brother called Onias: For Simon had three ſons, who, as we have declared, ſucceſſively poſſeſſed the Prieſthood: this Jeſus cauſed himſelf to be called Jaſon, as his other brother cauſed himſelf to be called Menelaus, whereas his name was Onias. But Jeſus, who had firſt of all been eſtabliſhed in the place of the High-Prieſt, aroſe againſt Menelaus, who was elected into the place after him. So that the People were divided into Factions, and Tobias ſons were on Menelaus ſide; but the greater number of the People followed Jaſon: ſo that Menelaus, and the ſons of Tobias, being much troubled by them, retired to Antiochus, telling him that they intended to forſake the Religion and Ordinances of their fathers, K and to follow that of the King, and to live after the manner of the Greeks; exhorting him to give them licence to erect a place of Exerciſes in Jeruſalem. Which when Antiochus had granted them, they ſo behaved themſelves, that there appeared no more ſign of Circumciſion in them: ſo that at ſuch time as they were naked, there was no difference between them and the Greeks; and neglecting all the ordinances and cuſtoms of their own Countrey, they conformed themſelves to the behaviour and manners of other Nations. Antiochus having all things in his kingdom according to his hearts deſire reſolved to make War upon Egypt: he contemned Ptolomy's ſon age (who were not as yet capable to manage their affairs.) Arriving there near to Peluſium with a great power, he circumvented by a ſtratagem, the young Ptolomy Philometor, and ſubdued Egypt: for after L he had beſieged Memphis, and taken it, he came to Alexandria, with an intent to beſiege the City, and to lay hold of the King, who was therein. But he was driven, not only from Alexandria, but alſo out of all Egypt, by the ſummons that were ſent him by the Romans, who commanded him to depart, and withdraw his Army out of that Countrey, as we have heretofore declared in another place. Now will I more largely and particularly diſcourſe the acts of this King who overcame Judea, and ſpoiled the Temple: for having only made a brief mention of him in my former works, I think it neceſſary in this place to make a more exact recital of his Hiſtory.

AFter that King Antiochus was returned out of Egypt, and for the fear of the Romans had forſaken that Countrey, he led his Army againſt Jeruſalem, and encamped before the City, and took it by ſurrender, the Gates of the City being ſet open unto him by thoſe of his Faction: which haphed in the 143 year ſince the beginning of N the Reign of Seleucus. When he ſaw himſelf Lord and Maſter of Jeruſalem, he ſlew divers of the contrary Faction; and after he had gather'd together many great and rich ſpoils, he return'd back to Antioch. Two years after, in the 145 year of the Reign of that Family, on the 25 day of that month which we call Chaſleu, and the Macedons Apellæus, the Romans December: in the 153 Olympiade, he returned again to Jeruſalem; at which time, he ſpared not them who gave him peaceable entrance, and opened the Gates. But his inſatiable avarice tranſported him ſo far, that he feared not to violate the Temple, and to ſpoil it of all thoſe riches which he knew to be there laid up; being no leſs inſolent towards his friend, than to the offender, he ſpared neither. For having ſeen what quantity of Gold was in the Temple, and how great a number of Preſents O and precious Ornaments were there laid up, he was ſo covetous, that he brake and violated all covenants and conditions. After therefore he had ſpoiled the Temple, and carried away the veſſels dedicated unto God, the golden Candleſtick, the golden Altar, the Table of the Shew-bread, the Cenſers, and pulled down the Curtains made of fine linen and ſcarlet. After he had emptied the treaſures that were hidden, and left nothing behind him of any value, to compleat the miſeries of the Jews, he forbade them to offer their uſual and daily ſacrifice unto God, according to the order of the Law: and after he had ſpoiled the whole City, he ſlew a great part of the Inhabitants, and carried away the reſt of them into captivity, with their wives and children, to the number of 10000. Furthermore, he burnt the faireſt buildings of the City, and razed the walls, and raiſed a Fortreſs in the lower City. For the Temple was as it were a high Cittadel, commanding the reſt. For this cauſe, having incloſed it with high walls and towers, he placed a Gariſon of Macedonians therein, with whom remained the rabble and ſcum of the wicked Apoſtate Jews, who were given over to all impieties, and who alſo afflicted their Fellow-Citizens with many injuries. The King alſo commanded that an Altar ſhould be erected in the Temple, on which he cauſed Swine to be ſlaughtered, offering Sacrifice contrary to the Religion and Ordinances of the Jews. He conſtrained them likewiſe to forſake the worſhip of the true God, and to adore thoſe Idols whom he reverenced for gods, building in every City and Borough both Temples and Altars, on which he ordinarily cauſed Swine to be offered. He forbade them likewiſe to circumciſe their children, threatning to puniſh him whoſoever he were that was found to do the contrary. Moreover he choſe certain overſeers that ſhould compel them to obſerve his commands, ſo that a great number of Jews, ſome of their own accord, others for fear of puniſhment, conformed to the Kings commands. But thoſe men who were of upright hearts, and valiant minds, little regarded theſe menaces: For having more reſpect to their laws and cuſtoms, than to the torments wherewith they were threatned, if they obſerved not the Edict; they were beaten, and expoſed to moſt cruel puniſhments, for many dayes, amidſt which many times they yielded up the ghoſt. For after they were whipt, and maim'd in their bodies, they were crucifi'd and tortur'd alive: they ſtrangled the Women alſo with their circumciſed children, whom, according to the Kings command, they hung about the necks of their Parents, who were crucified: And if in any place they found any part of the ſacred Scripture, they defac'd and burnt it; and they with whom it was found, were put to a moſt cruel death.

The Samaritans ſeeing this affliction of the Jews, pretended no further alliance to them, and called their Temple of Garazim no more the Temple of God, but (as we have heretofore declared) they ſhewed their own corrupt and unconſtant natures, and derived their deſcent from the Medes and Perſians, as in effect they were; wherefore they ſent Ambaſſadors to Antiochus, with Letters to this effect:

The Devil ſeeketh to aboliſh the Bible. The variable wits of the Samaritans, which made them ſo odious in the ſight of the Jews.

To King Antiochus the viſible God, the requeſt of the Sidonians that dwell in Sichem.

But ſince that you have inflicted puniſhment on the* Jews, according as their wickedneſs deſerveth, the Commiſſaries of the King, ſuppoſing that we were tied to their cuſtoms, (by reaſon of ſome Alliance between us) join us with them, and charge us with the ſame Accuſations: whereas we are born Sidonians, as appeareth by our publick Records. We therefore beſeech you, who are our Benefactor and Saviour, to command your Governor Apollonius, and your Steward Nicanor, not to moleſt us any more, by charging us with thoſe Accuſations which are peculiar to the Jews: who neither are tied to us by Alliance, nor agree with us in Cuſtoms; but that our Temple, which hath not hitherto born the name or title of any god, may now be called the Temple of Jupiter of Greece: by which means, we ſhall be deliver'd from all trouble; and being at liberty to attend our Affairs, we may the eaſier and more willingly pay you the greater Tributes. To this requeſt of the Samaritans the King anſwer'd, ſending them back their own Letter:

The year of the World, 3799. before Chriſt's Nativity, 165.

AT this time there dwelt a certain man in Modin (a village of Jury) whoſe name was Matthias, who was the ſon of John, who was the ſon of Simon, the ſon of Aſmonæus I a Prieſt, of the rank of Joarib, born in Jeruſalem. This Matthias had 5 ſons, John call'd Gaddis, Simon call'd Matthes, Judas call'd Machabeus, Eleazar named Auran, Jonathan called Aphus. This Matthias oftentimes complain'd unto his ſons, of the deplorable condition to which their Nation was reduc'd, of the ruine of their City, the deſolation of their Temple, and the miſeries of the People, telling them, That it were better for them to die in the defence of the Laws and Religion of their Forefathers, than to live diſhonourably amidſt ſo many calamities. When therefore the Commiſſaries, deputed by the King, came unto Modin, to conſtrain the Jews to perform that which was enjoin'd them, and to command them to ſacrifice, according to the ordinance; requiring Matthias (who ſurpaſſed the reſt in honour, and other qualities, but eſpecially in excellency of deſcent and nobility) K to begin firſt of all to offer ſacrifice, to the end that the reſt might follow him, and be induc'd by his example; aſſuring him, That the King would teſtifie his being well-pleaſed with his compliance, by the rewards which he would ſuddenly ſend him. Matthias anſwer'd, That he would by no means commit that Idolatry; aſſuring them, That although all other Nations of the World, either for love, or fear of puniſhment, ſhould obey the Edicts of Antiochus; yet that neither he, nor any of his children, would be induc'd to forſake their fathers Religion. As ſoon as he had return'd this anſwer, he held his peace, and a certain Jew ſtepped forth to offer ſacrifice according to Antiochus ordinance; wherewith Matthias was ſo much diſpleas'd, that both he and his ſons fell upon him, and with their ſwords hew'd him in pieces. He ſlew Apelles the Kings Captain likewiſe, and the Soldiers which he brought with him, to compel L the people to commit impiety. And not content herewith, he overthrew the Altar, crying out with a loud voice, If (ſaid he) any one be affected to the Laws of his Fathers, and the ſervice of God, let him follow me: And this ſaid, he preſently retir'd into the Deſart with his ſons, leaving the Borough utterly unpeopled. The reſt, after his example, retir'd alſo into the Deſart, with their Wives and Children, and made their habitation in Caves. The Kings Captains having intelligence hereof, gather'd thoſe Forces that were at that time in the Cittadel of Jeruſalem, and purſued the Jews into the Deſart. And having overtaken them, they labour'd firſt of all to make them ſubmit themſelves, and to make choice of that which was moſt for their advantage, rather than to endanger themſelves, and enforce them to chaſtiſe their diſobedience with blood. But the Jews nothing M mov'd herewith, reſolv'd rather to die, than commit ſuch an impiety: Whereupon they (who omitted no opportunity) aſſailed the Jews on a Sabbath-day, and burnt them within their Caves; who neither reſiſted their Enemies, nor ſo much as cloſed up the mouths of their Caves, forbearing to make any reſiſtance, by reaſon of the day, reſolving with themſelves, not to violate the Sabbath-day (for we are commanded to ceaſe from all labour on that day.) There were therefore about a thouſand ſtifled in their Caves, with their Wives and Children. Yet notwithſtanding divers eſcaped, and joined themſelves with Matthias, whom they choſe for their Captain; who declared unto them, That they ought to fight on the Sabbath-day: aſſuring them, That if they did not, but ſcrupulouſly obſerved the Law, they themſelves ſhould be enemies unto themſelves, if perhaps the Enemy ſhould aſſail them N on that day, and they ſhould not ſtand upon their guard: for by that means they ſhould be deſtroyed without reſiſtance. Hereby he perſuaded them to do as he had ſaid: and until this day, it is a cuſtom among us, that if need require, we make no difficulty to fight on the Sabbath-day. Matthias therefore having aſſembled a ſufficient number of men about him, deſtroyed the Altars, and ſlew thoſe that had forſaken their Religion, as many of them as he could lay hands on. For divers were ſcatter'd here and there among the Nations, for fear; he commanded theſe to circumciſe their children that were not circumciſed, driving thoſe from every place whom Antiochus had ordain'd to ſee his Law executed.

this manner, God will not forſake you, but taking pleaſure in your virtue, he will once more eſta-bliſh you in your former peace and liberty, and will permit you to live again after the manner of your Anceſtors. True it is, our bodies are mortal, and ſubject unto deſtiny, but the memory of our virtuous actions will never periſh: being therefore ſtirred up with the love thereof, ſtrive and beſtir your ſelves to obtain honour, to the end that projecting mighty things, you make no difficulty to hazard your lives in the execution of the ſame. Above all things, I exhort you unto concord, to the end that in whatſoever one of you ſhall be found more naturally apt and fitted than for he ſhall revenge the injuries and outrages which have been done to our Nation, and put our of living, which they had in former times obſerv'd; he dyed, and was buried in Modin.

After the People had mourned for him for a certain time, and perform'd publickly ſuch honour at his funerals, as was agreeable to his quality, his ſon Judas Machabeus took upon him the management of the War, in the 146 year; and by the aſſiſtance of his brethren, and other Jews, he drave the Enemies out of the Countrey, and put thoſe of his own Nation to death who had forſaken their Religion, and purged the Countrey of all abomina- D tions which had been committed therein.

CHAP. X.

Apollonius General of Antiochus*'s Army, cometh into* Jewry, and is diſcomfited and ſlain; and alſo Seron Governor of the lower Syria.

Hedio & Ruſfinus, cap. 9. Judas Machabeus overcometh Apollonius in battel. Seron, Governor of Cœloſyria, is put to flight in Judea.

WHen Apollonius, who was Antiochus's General in Samaria, heard hereof, he gather'd his Army together, and invaded Judea: againſt whom Machabeus made head, and overcame him in a battel, wherein there died many, and amongſt the reſt Apollonius, E whoſe ſword Machabeus got as his part in the ſpoil. There were a great number of them alſo wounded, and much booty was taken in the Enemies Camp: after which victory, enriched with ſpoils, he retreated. But Seron, Governor of Cœloſyria, hearing hereof, and underſtanding that divers had joined themſelves with Judas, and that he had already about him a ſufficient power to keep the field, and give him battel; he thought that it concern'd him to begin to puniſh thoſe who obey'd not the Kings Edicts. Whereupon, after he had aſſembled all the Forces that he had, and beſides them, hired certain Apoſtates, or fugitive Jews, he marched forth againſt Judas, and came as far as Bethoron, a village in Jewry, where he encamped. Judas alſo came out to meet with him, reſolving to give him battel: and ſeeing that his Soldiers would hardly be drawn out to fight, (both by F reaſon of their inequality of number, as alſo becauſe they were faint by faſting a long time) he encourag'd them, ſaying, That the means to obtain victory, and to have the upper hand over their Enemies, conſiſted not in the greatneſs of their number, but in their dependance upon God: whereof they had a moſt eminent example in their Forefathers, who had oftentimes defeated with a ſmall number of men, divers thouſands of their Enemies, becauſe they fought for the defence of their Laws, and for their Children: for the greateſt power (ſaid he) that a man can have, is to be innocent, and without offence. By theſe words perſuaded he his Soldiers, ſo that without any fear of the multitude of their Enemies, they all together ran upon Seron, and encountring with him, they diſcomfited the Syrians. For their Chieftain being ſlain, all the reſt betook themſelves to flight, in which thing only conſiſted the ſafe- G ty of their lives. Judas therefore purſuing them as far as the Champain, ſlew about 800 of them. The reſt ſaved themſelves in thoſe quarters that bounded upon the Sea.

Judas Machabeus defeats a great Army which King Antiochus ſent againſt the Jews. Lyſias the next year returns with a much greater power. Judas *kills five thouſand of his men, and cauſeth him to retreat. He purifieth the Temple, and ſetteth it in order. Antiochus's preparation to invade Judea.

WHen King Antiochus heard theſe things, he was much diſpleaſed at that which had hapned: whereupon he muſtered all his Forces, and hiring divers ſtrangers and mercenary Iſlanders, he prepar'd himſelf to invade Judea about the Spring-time. But after the muſter of his Army, when he found that his treaſure failed him, and that he was in great ſcarcity of money, (for his Tributes were not duly paid him, becauſe the Nations were rebellious) being likewiſe in his own nature a man of great and magnificent ſpirit, which put him upon great expences, he reſolved firſt of all to go into Perſia, to gather his Tributes. He therefore left the charge of his affairs with Lyſias, (a man very much eſteemed by him, and one that govern'd all the Countrey from Euphrates, as far as the borders of Egypt, and the lower Aſia) giving him likewiſe a part of his Army, and ſome of his Elephants. To him had the King given charge to ſee his ſon Antiochus carefully trained up, until his return: commanding him expreſly, That when he had conquered Judea, he ſhould make the Inhabitants thereof his ſlaves, and ſell them to thoſe that would give moſt, and deſtroy Jeruſalem, and utterly aboliſh that race. The King having given this charge to Lyſias, led forth his Army towards the Countrey of Perſia, in the 147 year: And after he had paſſed Euphrates, he marched onward toward the upper Provinces.

Lyſias choſe Ptolomy the ſon of Dorymenis, Nicanor and Gorgias, (men of great power and authority amongſt the Kings friends) and gave them 40000 Footmen, and 7000 Horſemen, to invade Jewry. Who marching as far as the City of Emaus, encamped in the Plain near unto it, and ſtrengthned their Army with divers Allies out of Syria, and the Countries thereabouts, and with divers Jews alſo who were Apoſtates. There came alſo certain Merchants with them, with an intent to buy thoſe that ſhould be taken Priſoners, bringing Gives with them, to manacle thoſe that ſhould be captivated, and money to pay for them.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 10. Ptolomy, Gorgias, and Nicanors War in Judea.

When Judas had view'd the Camp, and numbred the Enemy, he encourag'd the Soldiers, exhorting them to repoſe their confidence and hope of victory in God, willing them to invocate and call upon him, according to their Law; and that cloathing themſelves in ſackcloth, they ſhould humble themſelves according to their accuſtomed manner in ſuch extreme dangers, and call upon God with ſupplications and prayers; and that in ſo doing, God would have compaſſion on them, and give them power to ſtand againſt their Enemies, and put them to flight. When therefore he had order'd his battel according to the cuſtom of his Countrey, by thouſands and hundreds, and ſent away thoſe that were newly married, and ſuch as had newly bought poſſeſſions, leſt the love of their Wives or Eſtates ſhould abate ſomething of their courage, he ſtood up in the midſt of them, and exhorted his Soldiers to fight valiantly, in theſe, or ſuch like words:

Judas's Oration to his Soldiers.

My Countreymen and Companions, never have we hitherto had any occaſion more neceſſary, wherein we ought to ſhew our courage, and contemn our dangers, than at this preſent. For at this time, if you fight couragiouſly, you may recover your liberty: which of it ſelf is ſo acceptable unto you all; and ought the rather to be deſired, becauſe thereby you will enjoy the free exerciſe of your Religion. As therefore you ſhall behave your ſelves at this time, you may obtain the victory, and enjoy a happy life, (which conſiſteth in living according to our Laws and ancient cuſtoms) but if you prove Cowards, you are to expect nothing leſs than the extreameſt infamy, and the utter extermination of all your race. Think therefore with your ſelves, that if you fight not, you muſt die: and on the other ſide, aſſure your ſelves, that in fighting for your liberty, for your laws, and for piety, you ſhall obtain immortal glory: prepare your ſelves therefore, that to morrow morning you may give your enemies battel. Thus ſpake Judas to his Army, to encourage them.

1 Mach. 4.

Whil'ſt he was intent upon the battel, certain tydings was brought him, that Gorgias was ſent with 1000 Horſemen, and 5000 Footmen, to the end that under the conduct of ſome fugitives, he might by night, and when he leaſt ſuſpected him, ſet upon him: whereupon he reſolved the very ſame night to break into the Enemies Army, eſpecially ſince he knew that their Forces were divided. Having therefore refreſh'd both himſelf and his Army, and left a number of fires in his Camp, he marched all that night, and ſought out the Enemy, who was at Emaus. Gorgias perceiving that the Jews had forſaken their Camp, ſuppos'd they were retir'd for fear into the Mountains to hide themſelves: ſo that that he reſolved to proceed, and ſearch for them diligently. But early in the morning, A Judas, accompanied with 3000 Men, (who were ill arm'd by reaſon of their poverty) came up unto his Enemies, who were at Emaus; and after he had ſeen their warlike diſcipline, and mighty number, and how Soldier-like they were encamped, he exhorted his followers, telling them, That they ought to fight, although they were naked: for although they were in that condition, yet God (who took pleaſure in the greatneſs of their courage) had already given them the victory againſt a number of armed Soldiers. And forthwith he commanded the Trumpets to ſound; ſo that ruſhing in upon his Enemies on the ſudden, the ſurprize and aſtoniſhment was ſo great, that he ſlew divers of them who reſiſted, and put the reſt to flight; he purſu'd them as far as Gadara, and the Plains of Idumea, of Azor, and of Jamnia. In this Encounter there dyed about 3000 of the Enemy. Notwithſtanding, Judas would not permit his Soldiers as yet to take the benefit of the ſpoil, becauſe B they were to fight againſt Gorgias and his Army, aſſuring them, That as ſoon as they ſhould have defeated him, they might take their booty, without fear, becauſe they ſhould have no more Enemies to expect.

Judas gathereth a huge prey.

Lyſias once more invadeth Judea, and loſeth 5000 of his Soldiers.

Whil'ſt he thus ſpake unto his Soldiers, they that were with Gorgias, perceived from the top of an hill, that the Army that was left behind them, was put to flight, and that their Camp was on fire: for although they were far off, yet did the ſmoke aſſure them of it. Which when they underſtood, and perceiv'd Judas and his fellows in battel aray, expecting their coming, they feared, and betook themſelves to flight. When as therefore Judas perceived that Gorgias Troops were diſcomfited, without ſtroke ſtrucken, he went C out to gather the pillage; and after he had gotten together great ſtore of gold, ſilver, ſcarlet, and purple, he returned to his quarters with joy, praiſing God for their happy ſucceſs: for this victory did not a little advantage them, towards the attainment of their liberty. But Lyſias, to repair the diſhonour which he had ſuffer'd by this defeat, raiſed the next year another Army of almoſt 60 000 choſen Men, and 5000 Horſemen, to invade Judea. After he had therefore made his entry by the Mountains, he encamped in Bethſura, a village of Judea.

The Temple of Jeruſalem.

The Temple left deſolate for 3 whole years ſpace. Dan. 12.

Judas having notice thereof, came forth againſt him, accompanied with 10 000 Men; and diſcovering the number of his Enemies far to exceed his, (after he had beſought God by Prayer, That it would pleaſe him to aſſiſt him in the battel) he charged the Vanguard of the Enemy with ſo great courage, that he diſcomfited them, and ſlew about 5000, D leaving the reſt in great fear. Lyſias knowing the reſolution of the Jews, and how they were reſolved to dye, except they might enjoy their liberty; and fearing their deſperation, more than their force, he gather'd together the reſt of his Army, and returned back to Antioch: where he ſojourned, hiring many Foreign Soldiers, to make a greater Army to invade Jewry. After that Antiochus's Captains had been diſcomfited ſo many times, Judas aſſembled the People together, and told them, That after they had obtained ſo many victories through the mercy of God, it behoved them to go up to Jeruſalem, and to purifie the Temple that was left deſolate, and to offer thoſe Sacrifices ordained by the Law. When he came thither with a multitude of people, he found the Temple like a Deſart, and the E Gates thereof burnt, and Graſs growing within it; ſo great a deſolation drew ſighs from his heart, and he wept with all thoſe that accompanied him: And having choſen out certain of his beſt Soldiers, he commanded them to aſſault the Gariſon that were in the Fortreſs, whiles he himſelf purged the Temple. Which command of his being exactly and reſolutely fulfilled, he ſent for new Veſſels, a Candleſtick, a Table, an Altar of Incenſe, all made of Gold. He put alſo veils or hangings to the doors, accuſtomed to be ſpread abroad, and made Gates to the Temple. And having thrown down the Altar of burnt-offerings, which had been prophaned by Antiochus, he built a new one of all ſorts of ſtones, neither hewen, nor hammered, according to art. The 25 day of the month of Chaſleu, (with us September) there were lights ſet upon the Candleſticks, and F perfumes laid upon the Altar, and loaves upon the Table, and ſacrifices offer'd upon the new Altar. All which hapned the ſame day three years, wherein the ſacred Religion was changed into prophaneſs and impiety. For the Temple was ruinated and left deſolate by Antiochus, and remained in that ſtate for the ſpace of three whole years. For this deſolation hapned in the 145*th* year, and the 25*th* day of the month call'd Apellæus or Auguſt, in the 153 Olympiad: and the Temple was purified the ſame day, in the year 148, and the 154 Olympiad. This deſolation of the Temple hapned, according as Daniel had foretold, four hundred and eight years before: for he declared that the Macedonians ſhould deſtroy it.

The feſtival ſolemniz'd for the re-eſtabliſhment of the Temple.

After that Judas had re-eſtabliſh'd the ſervice of the Temple, both he and his G Countreymen ſolemniz'd a feaſt for eight dayes, omitting not any kind of lawful pleaſure, banquetting ſumptuouſly, and honouring God in Hymns and Pſalms. Thus rejoyced they H at this re-eſtabliſhment, ſeeing that contrary to all hope, after ſo long time, they had recover'd the cuſtoms of their Countrey, and their ancient Religion: ſo that a Decree was made for thoſe that ſhould come after, whereby it was commanded, That for the ſpace of eight dayes the rebuilding of the Temple ſhould be ſolemnized, with the ceremonies and ancient ordinances: And ever ſince that time, until this day, we celebrate this feaſt, called the Feaſt of Lights, for this reaſon, in my opinion, becauſe this ſo great felicity began to ſhine unto us as a light, contrary to all hope. He incloſed the City likewiſe with a wall and built high Towers thereon, in which he placed Gariſons againſt the incurſions of the enemies. He fortified the City of Bethſura alſo, that it might ſerve as a Fort againſt the enemy.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 13. Machab. 5. Judas maketh continual War with the neighbouring Nations.

I Whil'ſt theſe things paſſed thus, the Nations round about diſpleaſed with the re-eſtabliſhment and power of the Jews, ſlew divers of them, whom they ſurprized by ambuſhes and treachery. On thoſe Judas made continual War, to hinder their incurſions, and to make them partakers of thoſe evils they had inflicted upon the Jews. So that invading Acrabathan, he ſlew the Idumæans that were deſcended from Eſau, and brought away a great prey out of their Countrey, and ſhut up the ſons of Baan their Prince, who lay in wait for the Jews; and having beſieg'd them, he overcame them, ſetting fire on their Towers, and killing all the men that were therein. After this, he departed from thence, and made War upon the Ammonites, who had a great and mighty Army, under the conduct of Timotheus: Theſe he encounter'd and overcame, and took their City of Jazor, K and burnt it, and led away their wives and children into captivity, and afterwards returned into Judea. The neighbouring Nations hearing of this, aſſembled themſelves together in Galaad againſt the Jews, who inhabited the frontiers of Galaad; who having retired to the Fort of Dathema, ſent Letters unto Judas, to let him know, That Timotheus intended to ſurprize the place whereunto they were retreated, and requeſted him to deliver them from this danger. And whil'ſt he was reading of theſe Letters, certain meſſengers came unto him out of Galilee, to inform him, that they were aſſaulted by the Inhabitants of Ptolemais, Tyre, Sidon, and other People thereabouts.

CHAP. XII.

The Exploits of Simon the brother of Judas Machabeus in Galilee. Judas, accompanied with Jonathan his brother, obtaineth a victory over the Ammonites. Some other performances of Judas.

Judas, that he might ſend relief to theſe two parties that were aſſaulted both at the ſame time, commanded his brother Simon to take 3000 choſen men with him, and to go and ſuccour thoſe Jews that were aſſailed in Galilee: and himſelf, accompanied with Jonathan his other brother, and 8000 fighting men, repaired unto the Countrey of Galaad, leaving the government of the reſt of the Forces in the hands of Joſeph the ſon of M Zachary, and Azarias, commanding them to have a careful and diligent eye to Judea, and not to engage with any one until his return. Simon coming into Galilee, fought againſt his enemies, and diſcomfited them; and afterwards purſuing them that fled as far as the gates of Ptolemais, he ſlew about 3000: and after he had gather'd the ſpoils of ſuch as were ſlain, he ſet many Jews at liberty who were Priſoners; and having reſtor'd them to their goods, he retir'd back again to his Countrey. But Judas Machabeus, and Jonathan his brother, having paſt Jordan, and marched on the other ſide thereof for the ſpace of three dayes, came at length to the Nabathæans, who peaceably came out to meet them; by whom he underſtood the ſtate of thoſe that were in Galaad, and how divers of them were in extreme want, incloſed and beſieged in Caſtles and Cities of the Countrey by N their enemies. Theſe likewiſe beſought him to make haſte, and encounter the ſtrangers, and to ſeek the means to ſave their Countreymen. Hereupon he returned into the Deſart, and firſt of all aſſailed the Inhabitants of Boſra, and took their City, and ſet it on fire, killing all the men that were therein, who were able to bear Arms. Neither was he contented therewith, but when night drew on, he marched towards another Caſtle where the Jews were incloſed, and ſhut up by Timothy and his Army; and coming up to them about break of day, he ſurprized the Enemy at ſuch time as they were raiſing their ladders to ſcale the walls, and made ready their engines for battery: whereupon he cauſed the Trumpets to ſound, and after he had encouraged his People to fight valiantly and faithfully for their kinſmen and friends, being in great danger, and had diſtributed his O Forces into three Battalions, he ſet upon the Enemies reerward. Timotheus's Soldiers perceiving that it was Machabeus, whoſe valor and good fortune they had already experienced to their great loſs, they, without delay, betook themſelves to flight. his Army, followed after them, and ſlew about 8000 of them; and marching toward Malla, (a City of the enemies) he ſurprized it, and ſlew all the men therein, and afterwards conſumed it with fire. After this, departing thence, he took and deſtroyed Chaſpoma, Boſor, and divers other places in Galaad.

Shortly after, Timothy levied another great Army, and drew out with him all his Allies to his ſuccor, and a number of Arabians, whom he had hired: with this Army of his paſſed he the River, and encamped near unto a Town called Rapha; exhorting his Soldiers to behave themſelves like valiant men againſt their Enemies the Jews, and to hinder their paſſage, becauſe all their hopes of victory depended upon the ſecuring of that Paſs. Judas underſtanding that Timotheus was prepared to fight, took with him all his Forces, and marched haſtily againſt the Enemy; ſo that having paſſed the River, he ſet upon them, killing divers of them that reſiſted: and terrifying the reſt, who caſting away their Arms, were conſtrained to flie. There were ſome of them who ſaved themſelves by their ſwiftneſs; and ſome by retreating into a Temple called Carnain, where they were in hope to be ſecured, and ſo to eſcape: but after that Judas had taken the City where the Temple was, he ſlew them, and burnt it, and cauſed all his Enemies to periſh either by the ſword or by fire. After this overthrow, he led away with him from Galaad all the Jews, their wives and children, and ſubſtance, and brought them with him unto Judea. When as therefore he drew near unto the Town of Ephron, which was ſcituate directly in his way, ſo that it was impoſſible for him to march any other wayes in his return home, without going very much about, and putting himſelf to great inconveniencies; he ſent Meſſengers to the Inhabitants, to pray them to open their gates, and to grant him free paſſage through their City: for they had made barricadoes of ſtones to cut off the paſſage. But when therefore the Ephronites would give no ear unto him, he beſieged their City for a day and nights ſpace, and took and burnt it, and ſlew all the men that were therein, and afterwards went onward on his way; and ſo great a number was there of thoſe that were ſlain, that he marched upon the bodies of dead men.

The Jews are brought out of the Countrey of Galaad into Judea. Ephron beſieged and burnt.

An admirable victory of Judas Machabeus, who, in all theſe conflicts, loſt not one man.

After they had paſt Jordan, they came into a great Plain, wherein the City of Bethſan (by the Greeks called Scythopolis) ſtood; from whence they departed, and came into Judea with joy and gladneſs, ſinging and praiſing God, and uſing their accuſtomed paſtimes and ſongs of victory. This done, he offer'd up ſacrifices of Thankſgiving for their happy ſucceſs, and the ſafety of his Army; eſpecially ſince in all thoſe battels and encounters he had not loſt one Jew.

Joſeph and Zachary overcome by Gorgias, loſe 2000 Soldiers.

In the mean while two Captains, to wit, Joſeph the ſon of Zachary, and Azarias, who were left for the guard of Judea, (whil'ſt Simon went into the Countrey of Galilee againſt thoſe of Ptolemais, and Judas and Jonathan his brother were in Galaad againſt the Ammonites) deſirous alſo to obtain the honour and reputation of valiant men by ſome notable exploit, marched with the Forces under their command towards Jamnia. Againſt theſe came forth Gorgias, who was Governor in that place, and charg'd them in that manner, that the Jews loſt 2000 men, and fled as far as the Marches of Judea. This miſchief fell upon them, becauſe they had diſobey'd Judas's commandment, who had prohibited them to fight with any before his return. And this gives us juſt cauſe more and more to admire the providence and excellent conduct of this great Captain of the Jews.

Chebron and Mariſſa beſieged.

Judas and his brethren making War againſt the Idumeans, gave them no reſpite, but continually charging them on every ſide, they took alſo the City of Chebron, and deſtroyed all the fortifications thereof, and burnt the Towers, ſpoiling all the Countrey of the enemies, and razed the City of Mariſſa likewiſe. Afterwards coming to Azor, they took and ſpoiled it, and carried away a great quantity of booty from thence, and returned back into Judea in ſafety.

King Antiochus Epiphanes being forced ſhamefully to raiſe his ſiege from before Elymais a Town in Perſia, (where he deſigned to pillage a Temple conſecrated to Diana) and troubled for the defeat of ſeveral of his Captains which he ſent againſt the Jews, dyeth for grief.

The year of the World, 3801. before Chriſt's Nativity, 163.

AT this time Antiochus paſſing through the upper Provinces of his Kingdom, underſtood that there was a very wealthy City in Perſia called Elymais, in which I there was a Temple dedicated to Diana, full of all ſorts of Preſents: wherein alſo he was inform'd, that the ſhield and Cuiraſſe of Alexander was kept, who was Philip King of Macedons ſon. Hereupon he reſolv'd to make himſelf Maſter of the place, and forthwith beſieg'd it. And the Inhabitants thereof being neither affrighted with his approach, nor terrifi'd with his ſiege, made a ſtout reſiſtance, ſo that he failed of his purpoſe.
For they drave him from their City; and ſallying out upon him, they purſu'd him ſo hotly, that he fled back to Babylon, and loſt a great number of his men. After this defeat, and fruſtration of his hope, news was brought him of the overthrow of his Captains, whom he had left to War againſt the Jews, and how they of Jewry were now the ſtronger, and had the upper hand. This trouble ſeconding his former diſcontent, K touched him ſo nearly, that he fell ſick; and his diſeaſe, aggravated with other accidents, increaſing, he knew well that he ſhould die: and therefore he call'd for his moſt familiar friends, and told them, That his ſickneſs was violent and deſperate, and that he deſerv'd this affliction, becauſe he had perſecuted the people of the Jews, and deſtroyed their Temple, committed horrible Sacriledge, and contemned that God which they adored: And whil'ſt he thus ſpake unto them, he gave up the ghoſt. So that I wonder at Polybius the Megalopolitane, (who is in other things a good Hiſtorian) who writeth, That Antiochus died, becauſe he would have ſpoiled the Temple of Diana in the Countrey of Perſia. For ſince he had only intended to commit Sacriledge, but had not effected it, he merited not to ſuffer puniſhment for it. And if it ſeemeth good unto Polybius, that Antiochus was puniſh'd by death L upon this occaſion; it is far more likely to be true, that his death befell him for the Sacriledge he had committed in the Temple of Jeruſalem. But our purpoſe is not to argue againſt thoſe that maintain, that Polybius's reaſons are of greater truth and conſequence, than ours are.

Antiochus Eupator ſucceeds his father Epiphanes. Judas Machabeus lays ſiege to the Cittadel at Jeruſalem. Antiochus comes againſt him with a great Army, and beſiegeth Bethſura; they both raiſe their ſieges, and come to a pitch'd Battel. The wonderful takes Bethſura, and beſiegeth the Temple of Jeruſalem; but when the Jews were reduced to the greateſt extremity, he raiſeth the ſiege, upon the news that was brought him of Philip*'s having* cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed King of Perſia.

BEfore Antiochus gave up the ghoſt, he called for Philip one of his chief friends, and made him Governor of his kingdom. And having deliver'd his Diadem into his hands, his Royal Robe, and his Ring and Jewels, he charg'd him to deliver them to his ſon Antiochus, entreating him to take care of his education, and to ſecure the kingdom N for him, until he came to years of diſcretion. This done, Antiochus died the 149 year of the kingdom of Syria. After that Lyſias had certifi'd the people of the Kings death, he proclaim'd his ſon Antiochus (whom at that time he had in his protection) King, ſirnaming him Eupator, (according to the inſtructions that were given him.) About that time, the Gariſon and Apoſtates that were in the Fortreſs of Jeruſalem, did much miſchief unto the Jews. For ſetting upon them that went up to the Temple to worſhip and offer Sacrifice, they ſlew them: for the Fortreſs commanded the Temple. For this cauſe, Judas reſolved to cut off theſe Gariſons, and to that intent he aſſembled all the people, and beſieged it. This enterprize was undertook in the year 150, after that Seleucus had uſurped the government of thoſe Countries. Having therefore made him certain Engines, O and raiſed divers Platforms, he induſtriouſly continued the ſiege: But divers of thoſe Apoſtates that were revolted, and of that Gariſon, came out by night, and aſſembling together ſuch men as were as malicious as themſelves, they came unto King Antiochus, beſeeching

The Macedonians in the Caſtle of Jeruſalem, do much harm to the Jews. Judas Machabeus beſiegeth the Caſtle.

The year of the World, 3803. before Chriſt's Nativity, 161.

The fugitive, Jews flie out of the Caſtle, and require Antiochus's aſſiſtance. Antiochus marcheth into Judea with his Army. Bethſura beſieged. Judas with his forces encountreth the King at Beth-zacharia.

ſeeching him, That he would not ſuffer them to be abuſed by thoſe of our Nation; nor to be neglected A by him, ſince their ſufferings proceeded only from their having devoted themſelves to his fathers ſervice; for whoſe ſake they had forſaken their own Religion, and follow'd his Laws and Ordinances. Furthermore they told him, That the Fortreſs was in danger to be ſurprized by Judas, and his Aſſociates, except ſome preſent ſuccors were ſent unto them. When Antiochus the younger had notice hereof, he was diſpleaſed, and ſent for his Captains and Friends, commanding them to hire ſtrangers, and to liſt all thoſe in his kingdom who were of years to bear Arms; ſo that he gather'd in ſhort time an Army of 100000 Foot, and 20000 Horſe, and 32 Elephants: and with this equipage marched out of Antioch, committing his Army to Lyſias. As ſoon as he came into Idumæa, he went up unto Bethſura, a walled City, and very difficult to be taken, which he beſieged: but with ſuch a diſadvantage, that the B Bethſurians reſiſting him valiantly, and ſallying out upon him, burnt thoſe Engines which he had prepar'd for the battery of the Town. When therefore a long time was conſumed about the ſiege. Judas having intelligence of the Kings approach, raiſed his Camp from before the Caſtle of Jeruſalem, and marching forward to meet the Enemy, he encamped in a certain ſtreight, in a place call'd Beth-zacharia, about 70 furlongs from the Enemy.

The King having notice thereof, raiſed his ſiege from Bethſura, and marched toward the ſtreight where Judas's Army was encamped, and about the morning he ſet his Soldiers in battel aray. He firſt of all cauſed his Elephants to march one after another through the ſtreight, for that it was impoſſible for them to march in a ſquare body. About every Elephant were 1000 Footmen, and 500 Horſemen. Theſe Elephants bare high Towers on C their backs, fill'd with Archers. The reſt of his Forces he cauſed to march two ſeveral wayes by the mountains, under the conduct of his moſt truſty friends, commanding them to charge their Enemies with a great ſhout, and to diſcover their golden and brazen bucklers, to the end the reflection thereof might dazle the eyes of the Jews: whereupon, the mountains reſounded with the fearful cryes of Antiochus Army; yet was not Judas any wayes diſcourag'd at it. For receiving the charge with a great courage, he ſlew almoſt 600 of the forlorn hope. But Eleazar ſirnamed Auran, Judas's brother, ſeeing a huge Elephant among the reſt with trappings ſomewhat extraordinary, and ſuppoſing that the King was mounted thereon, he made towards him with a mighty courage; and after he had ſlain divers of thoſe that invironed the Elephant, and ſcatter'd the reſt, he thruſt D his ſword into the belly of the beaſt, and wounded him to death; but the Elephant falling upon Eleazar, ſlew him with his weight: and thus honourably died this worthy man, after that he had ſlain a great number of his Enemies, and ſold his life at a dear rate. Judas ſeeing his Enemies Forces ſo great in number, retir'd back to Jeruſalem to continue his ſiege: and Antiochus ſent part of his Army to Bethſura to take it, and with the reſt he himſelf marched toward Jeruſalem.

Eleazar, Judas's brother, killeth an Elephant. Judas returneth to Jeruſalem, and Antiochus followeth him.

The Bethſurites yield up their City. The Temple of Jeruſalem beſieged.

The Bethſurites being afraid of this mighty Army of the King, and ſeeing their neceſſary proviſions failed, yielded up their City, after they had taken the Kings oath, that he would offer no violence; ſo that when Antiochus was Maſter of the City, he offer'd them no injury; only he thruſt them out diſarmed from the City, and placed a Gariſon E therein. He ſpent a long time alſo in beſieging the Temple of Jeruſalem, for they who kept it, defended it valiantly. For againſt every Engine the King built and raiſed up againſt them, they erected a contrary Engine. They only wanted victuals, becauſe their old proviſion was conſumed, and the ground had not been manured that year, becauſe it was the ſeventh; in which, according to the Law, the Countrey ought not to be tilled; which was the cauſe that divers of thoſe that were beſieged, fled away privately for want of victuals, inſomuch that very few remained for the defence of the Temple. In this condition were they who were beſieg'd in the Temple.

Antiochus hearing news of Philips intent to invade Perſia, giveth over his ſiege to meet him.

But when King Antiochus and Lyſias the General had received notice, that Philip coming out of Perſia, intended to make himſelf Lord of the Countrey; they concluded to give F over the ſiege for that time, and to march forwards againſt Philip, without giving any notice thereof to his Soldiers. He only commanded that Lyſias ſhould call a Council of his Captains, and without diſcovering of his deſign againſt Philip; to tell them, That he raiſed the ſiege, becauſe the place was very ſtrong, and his Army began to want victuals, and the publick affairs required his preſence in other parts of his Dominions. Furthermore, he thought it expedient to capitulate with the beſieged, and contract friendſhip with all the Nation of the Jews, promiſing them the free exerciſe of their Religion, becauſe they rebelled only that they were deprived of it; and he was aſſured, that having the grant thereof, they would live peaceably, and he might ſafely return into his own Countrey. When Lyſias had declared theſe Reaſons, G all the Army and the Captains approved thereof.

CHAP. XV.

King Antiochus Eupator makes peace with the Jews, but, contrary to his promiſe, he demoliſheth the Wall that encompaſſed the Temple. He cuts off the head of the High-Prieſt Onias ſirnamed Menelaus, and confers that honour upon Alcim. Onias the Nephew of Menelaus retires into Egypt, where the King and Queen Cleopatra his Wife, permit him to build a Temple at Heliopolis, in imitation of that at Jeruſalem.

I IN purſuance of this reſolution, King Antiochus ſent a Herald to Judas, and thoſe that were beſieged with him, promiſing them peace, with permiſſion to live according to their Religion. Which conditions they willingly embrac'd: and having taken an oath of aſſurance from the King, they ſurrendred up the Temple. Whereupon Antiochus entred into it, and ſeeing it to be a place ſo well fortifi'd, he, contrary to his oath, commanded his Army to level the Wall that inviron'd it even with the ground: which done, he return'd to Antioch, leading away with him the High-Prieſt Onias, who was called Menelaus. For Lyſias had counſelled the King to murther Menelaus, if he intended that the Jews ſhould live in peace: and the rather, becauſe it was he only who was the Author of all thoſe evils, by reaſon of the counſel he had given to Antiochus his father, to inforce the Jews to forſake their Religion. The King for that cauſe, ſent Menelaus unto Beræa, K a City of Syria, where he commanded him to be put to death, after he had enjoy'd the High-Prieſthood ten years. He was a wicked man, and to raiſe himſelf to that great honour and authority, had cauſed ſeveral of our Nation to violate our moſt holy Laws. As ſoon therefore as Menelaus was dead, Alcim was made High-Prieſt, who was called Jacimus. Now when Antiochus found that Philip had already conquer'd a great part of his Countrey, he fought with him, and taking him Priſoner, he put him to death. But Onias the ſon of the High-Prieſt, (whom, as we have heretofore declared, was left an Orphan in his infancy) ſeeing that the King had ſlain his Uncle Menelaus, and given the Prieſthood to Alcim, who was not of the race of the Prieſts, and had transferred this honour into another family at the perſuaſion of Lyſias, he fled unto Ptolomy King of L Egypt, where being honourably entertained by the King and his Queen Cleopatra, he obtained a place at Heliopolis, where he built a Temple like unto that which was at Jeruſalem: whereof we ſhall hereafter have a more fit opportunity to ſpeak.

Antiochus maketh peace with Judas. The wall of the Temple defaced. Onias, otherwayes called Menelaus, led away Priſoner.

Demetrius the ſon of Seleucus, eſcapes from Rome, comes into Syria, and cauſeth himſelf to be crowned King, and puts to death King Antiochus and Lyſias. He ſends Bacchides with an Army into Judea, to exterminate Judas and his party, and to eſtabliſh Alcim in the High-Prieſthood; he proceeds with great cruelty, but Judas compels M him to retire to Demetrius for freſh ſupplies.

AT that time Demetrius the ſon of Seleucus fled from Rome, and took poſſeſſion of Tripolis in Syria; and after he had ſet the Diadem upon his own head, and had levied and hired certain Soldiers, he invaded the Kingdom: where he was received to the general content of all men, who ſubmitting themſelves unto him, laid hold on the King Antiochus and Lyſias, and brought them alive unto him; but he forthwith commanded that they ſhould be put to death, after that Antiochus had reigned two years. To this new elected King, divers Jews, (baniſh'd for their impiety) and with them the High-Prieſt Alcim reſorted; who in general accuſed their own Nation, and principally Judas N and his brethren, objecting againſt them, that they had ſlain his friends, and all ſuch as were on his ſide; and that among all thoſe that were in the kingdom, and expected his coming, ſome of them were ſlain; and the reſt being driven from their native Countrey, were baniſh'd into other places: Wherefore he deſired him that he would ſend ſome one of his friends to take notice of the outrages committed by Judas and his brethren. Demetrius was much moved by theſe reports, and for that cauſe ſent Bacchides (who was in times paſt much eſteemed by Antiochus Epiphanes for his valor, and to whoſe government at that time all Meſopotamia was committed:) To whom he gave an Army, joining with him the High-Prieſt Alcim, with Commiſſion to kill Judas, and his Confederates. Bacchides departing from Antioch with his Army, came into Judea, and ſent an Herald unto O Judas and his brethren to treat with him upon certain Articles of Peace, becauſe his intent was to ſurprize them by ſome treachery. But Judas ſuſpecting his deſign, gave little heed unto him: for in that he came thither with ſo great an Army, he eaſily conjectured that he unto the peaceable Proclamation of Bacchides; and ſuppoſing that there was no ill deſign in Alcim, who was their Countreyman, they ſubmitted themſelves unto his government. And having received an oath from them both, that neither they, nor any of their followers, ſhould any wayes be endamaged by them, they committed themſelves to their protection. But Bacchides ſetting light by his oath, ſlew 60 of them; and by this breach of his faith towards theſe, he cauſed others (who intended to ſubmit themſelves) to forſake and flee from his government. As ſoon as therefore he had removed his Army from Jeruſalem, he came unto the village of Bethzeth, and there apprehending many of thoſe which had fled, and ſome others among the People, he ſlew them all, commanding B all thoſe that lived in the Countrey to obey Alcim, to whom he left in that place, for the guard of his perſon, a part of his Army: and that done, he returned unto Antioch to King Demetrius. In the mean while Alcim intending to ſecure his government, and ſuppoſing that it would be ſo much the better confirmed, if he could obtain the good will of the People, he uſed all kind of plauſible and familiar ſpeech unto them; and converſing with every man pleaſantly and graciouſly, he joined in a ſhort time great Forces to thoſe which he had before: amongſt whom, there were many fugitives and ungodly men, by whoſe help and aſſiſtance he marched through the Countrey, killing all thoſe whom he found to be of Judas's faction. Judas perceiving that Alcim having gather'd great Forces, had already ſlain divers of the moſt worthy men, and ſuch as feared God, he prepared himſelf alſo to over-run the Countrey, and ſlew as many of Alcim's party as he could C meet with. At length finding that he alone was unable to ſtand againſt Judas, he thought fit to ſeek after the aſſiſtance of Demetrius. For which cauſe, he repair'd to Antioch, and incenſed Demetrius exceedingly againſt Judas, accuſing him for offering many injuries unto him: proteſting that he ſhould ſuffer many more, except he were prevented and puniſhed by a good Army ſent out againſt him.

Demetrius ſendeth Nicanor againſt Judas.

Nicanor diſſembling with Judas, labor'd to ſurprize him.

Demetrius imagining, That if Judas ſhould increaſe in power, it would be ſome prejudice to his ſtate, ſent Nicanor his moſt faithful friend, to make War againſt him: (who was one of them who accompanied him in his flight from Rome.) And having furniſh'd him with a ſufficient Army, and able to make head againſt Judas, he commanded him to ſpare no one of that Nation. When Nicanor came to Jeruſalem, he would not proclaim an open War againſt Judas, but deſign'd to ſurprize him by ſome ſubtilty: to this intent he ſent him a peaceable meſſage, telling him, That he knew no reaſon why he ſhould engage E himſelf in the dangers of a tedious War, ſince he was ready to aſſure him with an oath, that he would offer him no injury; and that he came thither with his friends, only to expreſs the good affection of the King Demetrius towards him, and his kindneſs to the Nation of the Jews. Judas and his brethren believed this deluſion of Nicanor, and ſuſpecting no harm, they gave credit to him, and entertain'd both him and his Army. When therefore Nicanor had ſaluted Judas, he conferred with him, and in the mean while gave a ſign unto his Soldiers to lay hands on him: who perceiving his Treaſon, brake from him, and fled unto his Soldiers. When Nicanor ſaw that his intentions were diſcover'd, he reſolved to make open War upon Judas, and to give him battel near unto a borough called Caphar-ſalama: in which place obtaining the victory, he conſtrain'd Judas to retreat into the Fortreſs at Jeruſalem. F
On a certain day when Nicanor came down from the Fortreſs, and went towards the Temple at Jeruſalem, certain of the Prieſts and Elders went out to meet him, and after they had done their reverence, they ſhew'd him thoſe Sacrifices, which (as they ſaid) they intended to offer unto God for the Kings proſperity and health. But he blaſpheming, threatned them, That if the people did not deliver Judas into his hands, he would deſtroy the Temple upon his return; and with theſe menaces he departed out of the City. Which when the Prieſts heard, they wept bitterly, and intreated God, That it might pleaſe him to defend his ſacred Temple, together with thoſe which called on his Name therein, from the violence and outrage of their Enemies.

Nicanor threatneth the people, that except they yield up Judas, he will deſtroy the Temple.

Nicanor departed from Jeruſalem, and came unto Bethoron, and encamped there, where G he received great ſupplies of Soldiers which came unto him out of Syria. Now Judas was encamped in another village called Adas, about 30 Furlongs diſtant from Bethoron, having

H having with him at the moſt not above 100 men. Notwithſtanding he exhorted his Soldiers not to be afraid of the multitude of their enemies; nor ſo much to conſider againſt how many they were to fight, as againſt whom, and for what recompence, to the intent they might altogether couragiouſly ſet upon the enemy, at ſuch time as he ſhould lead them forth to battel. Whereupon aſſailing Nicanor, there aroſe a dangerous conflict between them, wherein Judas had the better; for he ſlew a great number of the enemy: and finally, Nicanor himſelf fighting couragiouſly, was ſlain; and as ſoon as he fell, his Army betook themſelves to flight. For having loſt their Captain, they diſperſed themſelves, and caſt away their weapons: Judas ſpeedily purſuing them, made a great ſlaughter, and by ſound of Trumpet, certifi'd thoſe of the neighbouring villages, That I he had diſcomfited the enemy. Whereupon the Inhabitants betook themſelves to their weapons, and meeting with thoſe that fled, they ſlew them, ſo that not one eſcaped from this battel, although the Syrian Army conſiſted of 9000 Men. This victory hapned on the 13 day of the month Adar, as our Countreymen call it, and the Macedonians Diſtre: And hereof each year there is a ſolemn feaſt and memorial obſerved. From this time forward, the Nation of the Jews were in quiet without any invaſion, and lived in peace for a little time: but afterwards they were troubled with the like incurſions. Whereas therefore the High-Prieſt Alcim intended to beat down an old wall of the Sanctuary, which had been built by the holy Prophets, he was ſuddenly ſtrucken by God; ſo that he loſt his ſpeech, and fell to the ground; and after he had endured many torments, at laſt K he died miſerably, after he had enjoyed the Prieſthood for the ſpace of four years.

After his death, the people with a general conſent conferred that office upon Judas; who hearing of the great power of the Romans, and how they had conquer'd Gaule, Spain, Carthage, Grece, and the Kings Perſeus and Philip; and beſides all theſe, the great King Antiochus, he reſolved to procure their friendſhip, and to that purpoſe he ſent Eupolemus the ſon of John, and Jaſon the ſon of Eleazar, his two moſt intimate friends, unto Rome, to entreat the Romans to be their Allies and Confederates, and to write unto Demetrius, That he ſhould forbear to make War againſt the Jews. When the Ambaſſadors that were ſent from Judas were arrived at Rome, the Senate received them; and after they had diſcourſed with them upon the occaſion of their coming, they accepted their alliance, L and made a Decree, the Copy whereof was then brought into Judea, and the original reſerved in the Capitol, engraven on a Table of braſs. Which Decree of the Romans, concerning their alliance with the Jews, contained theſe Articles:

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 17. 1 Mach. 8. Judas covenanteth a peace with the Romans.

That no man under the obedience of the Romans, ſhould maintain War againſt the Nation of the Jews: nor ſhould furniſh thoſe with victuals, ſhips, or money, that ſhould make War againſt them. And if any enemies ſhould aſſail the Jews, the Romans ſhould give them ſuccor to the utmoſt of their power: and that likewiſe if any one ſhould make War againſt the Romans, the Jews ſhould ſuccor them. That if the Jewiſh Nation would add or diminiſh any thing of that aſſociation, it ſhould be done with the common advice of the people of Rome; and that that which ſhould be ordained, ſhould remain irrevocable.

The decree of the Romans touching ſociety and friendſhip of the Jews.

M This Copy was written by Eupolemus the ſon of John, and by Jaſon the ſon of Eleazar, at ſuch time as Judas was High-Prieſt, and his brother Simon General over the Army. Thus the firſt amity and alliance was contracted between the Romans and the Jews.

King Demetrius ſends Bacchides with a new Army againſt Judas Machabeus, who reſolves to give him battel, although he had but 800 men.

N WHen Nicanor's death, and the defeat of his Army was told Demetrius, he ſent a new Army into Judea, under the conduct of Bacchides: who departing from Antioch, and coming to Judea, encamped in Arbela a City of Galilee; where having taken captive a great number of thoſe that were retir'd into Caves, he departed from thence, and went to Jeruſalem: And underſtanding that Judas was encamped in the village of Berzeth, he marched out againſt him with 20000 Foot, and 2000 Horſe. Judas had not on his ſide in all above 2000 men, the greater part whereof being afraid of the numerous Army of the Syrians, forſook their Camp, and fled away: by which means there remained no more with Judas, than 800 men. He ſeeing himſelf abandoned by ſo many of his men, and preſſed by his enemies, who gave him no time to reinforce his Army, he O reſolved to engage with thoſe 800 which remained, whom he exhorted to be of good courage, and to fight valiantly; but they anſwer'd, That they were not able to make head againſt ſo great an Army, and counſelled him to retire, and ſtand on his guard for that time, until he had gather'd Forces that might be able to face the enemy. But Judas replied plied to this effect: God forbid (ſaid he) that the Sun ſhould ſee me turn my back upon mine enemies. And if by this means I meet with my death, and that I muſt needs ſpend my laſt blood in this battel, I will never ſullie ſo many notable actions ſo worthily atchieved, nor diminiſh that glory which I have obtained, by one ignominious flight. And having in this manner exhorted the ſmall remnant of thoſe Soldiers that were with him, he commanded them that without any apprehenſion of danger, they ſhould make head againſt the enemy.

CHAP. XIX.

Judas Machabeus with 800 men, engageth againſt the whole Army of Demetrius. He is ſlain, after he had performed actions almoſt incredible. His praiſe.

Bacchides diſpoſeth his Army, and fighteth with Judas.

B*Acchides* drew out his Army, and ranged them in battel, placing the Horſemen on both the wings, his light-armed Soldiers and Archers in the front of the Army, and after theſe a ſtrong Band, called the Macedonian Phalanx; and he himſelf led the right wing of the battel. And in this aray he approached Judas's Camp, and cauſed the Trumpets to be ſounded, commanding his Soldiers to give a great ſhout, and to charge their enemies. Judas did the like, and encountred Bacchides; ſo that on both ſides there was a moſt cruel conflict, which continued until the Sun-ſet. And when Judas perceiv'd that Bacchides, and the flower of his Army fought in the right wing, he choſe out a certain number of his moſt reſolute Soldiers, and drew towards that quarter, and ſetting upon them, he brake their ſquadron; and afterwards thruſting into the midſt of them, he forced them to flie, and purſu'd them as far as the Mount Aza. They of the left wing perceiving the flight of thoſe in the right, went after Judas, and incloſed him behind. So that being unable to flie, and ſeeing himſelf incloſed by his enemies, he reſolved to fight it out. And after having ſlain a great number of his enemies, he found himſelf ſo feeble by the wounds which he had receiv'd, that he fell to the ground, and crowned all his other great and immortal actions by a glorious death. His Soldiers ſeeing him dead, and having no Commander of note left amongſt them, after the loſs of ſo valiant a Captain, betook them all to flight. Simon and Jonathan his brothers, upon intreaty, recover'd his body, and carried it to Modin, (a place where his father was buried:) there was he interred by all the people, who wept for him divers dayes, and honour'd him publickly, according to the cuſtom of their Countrey. Such was Judas's end, who was a valiant man, a great warrior, and very reſpective of the commandments of his father Matthias, having done and ſuffer'd all that was poſſible, to recover the liberty of his Countrey. Being therefore after this manner accompliſhed, he had left behind him a perpetual renown of his worthy acts, and an honourable memory of himſelf obtained by the liberty, in which he re-eſtabliſhed his Nation, delivering them from the ſervitude of the Macedonians: He died, after he had diſcharged the office of the High-Prieſt for the ſpace of three years.

Judas diſperſeth the enemies Army, killeth ſome, and at laſt is ſlain himſelf.

CHAP. I.

After the death of Judas Machabeus, Jonathan his brother is by the Jews choſen General of their Army. Bacchides, the Commander of Demetrius's Army, attempts to kill him treacherouſly; but failing, he aſſaults him openly. A great battel, and a fair retreat, managed

WE have declar'd in the former Book, how the Nation of the Jews (after they had been under the ſubjection of the Macedonians) recovered their liberty: we have likewiſe related the great wars of Judas their Captain, and in which he was at laſt ſlain in the defence of their liberty: how likewiſe (after the death of Judas) all the wicked Apoſtate Jews, who had revolted from their Religion, took courage, moleſting and doing many injuries
O to the reſt of their Countreymen. Finally, how beſides their malice, the Famine raged in the Countrey; ſo that divers being unable to ſuſtain theſe two ſcourges of Famine and War, were conſtrain'd to ſubmit themſelves unto the Macedonians. In the mean while, Bacchides gathering together the Apoſtates, (who were fallen from the Religion of the Jews, with an intent to live after the manner of the Heathen) committeth the government of the Countrey unto them, who laying hold on Judas's friends and partakers, betrayed and deliver'd them to Bacchides: who firſt of all tormented and beat them, and afterwards put them to death. This ſo great affliction (than which, the Jews had never endured a worſe, ſince their return from Babylon) was the cauſe that thoſe of Judas's faction, who were yet alive, fearing the total ruine of their Nation, addreſſed themſelves to Jonathan his brother, exhorting him to imitate his brother Judas*'s virtues, and to have no leſs care of his Countrey, than him who dyed in the defence of it: beſeeching him, that he would not ſuffer his Nation to periſh for want of a Captain, ſince he himſelf was ſo well qualified to command them.* Jonathan anſwer'd them, That he was ready to dye for them; and being in all things eſteemed no leſs valiant and politick than his brother Judas, he was proclaimed General and Captain of the Jews.

The Jews compelled by the Apoſtates, and by famine, ſubmit themſelves to the Macedonians. Bacchides murthereth thoſe of Judas's faction.

Jonathan, by the publick inſtigation of the Jews, undertaketh the government. Bacchides complotteth to betray Jonathan, and his brother.

Bacchides having notice hereof, feared leſt Jonathan ſhould be no leſs troubleſom to the King and the Macedonians, than his brother Judas before him had been, for which cauſe he ſought means to make him away by Treaſon. But both Jonathan and his brother Simon gat intelligence thereof, and having diſcover'd his practice, they took all their families with them, and fled into the deſart that confin'd upon the City of Jeruſalem: and retiring near unto a water call'd the Lake of Aſphar, they remained in that place. When Bacchides perceiv'd that they miſtruſted him, and were driven thither; he went out againſt them with all his Forces, and being encamped on the other ſide of Jordan, he gathered his Army together. Jonathan knowing well that Bacchides came out to ſeek him, ſent his brother John (ſirnamed Gaddis) unto the Arabians and Nabatheans, to commit the truſt of their goods into their hands, until the end of the War betwixt him and Bacchides: for the Arabians were his friends. Whil'ſt therefore John marched towards the Nabatheans, (who were of the City of Medaba) the ſons of Amareus laid an ambuſh for him; and after they had furiouſly ſet upon him on the way, and laid hold on whatſoever he brought with him, they at length ſlew him, and all his company: for which fact of theirs, they were ſhortly after puniſhed by his brethren, as we ſhall relate hereafter.

Bacchides draweth out his Forces againſt Jonathan. John, the brother of Judas, is ſlain by Amars ſon. Bacchides aſſaileth Jonathan on the Sabbath-day, and loſeth 2000 of his men.

When Bacchides knew that Jonathan was encamped in the Marſhes of Jordan, he made choice of the Sabbath-day to ſet upon him, hoping that he would not defend himſelf on that day, becauſe of the prohibition of the Law. But he, contrary to his expectation, encouraged his Soldiers, and declared unto them how it concerned their lives to be valiant, for that it was impoſſible for them to eſcape, becauſe they were ſhut up in the midſt betwixt the River and the Enemy: for they had the Enemy before them, and the River on their backs. As ſoon therefore as he had made his Prayer unto his God, That it might pleaſe him to grant him the victory, he ſet upon the Enemy with great reſolution, and ſlew a great number of them: and perceiving how Bacchides aſſaulted him with great fierceneſs, he ſtretched out his right hand to ſtrike him; but he preventing the ſtroke, by ſtepping aſide, Jonathan and his companions leapt into the River, and ſo ſaved themſelves, by ſwimming over to the other ſide of Jordan, becauſe the Enemy durſt not paſs the Water to purſue them. Whereupon Bacchides returned incontinently to the Caſtle of Jeruſalem (after he had loſt about 2000 of his men.) After this, he fortifi'd divers Cities (which were before ruinated) namely, Jericho, Emaus, Bethoron, Bethella, Thamnata, Pharathon, Techoa, and Gazara, and built in every of them certain Towers, and great and ſtrong Walls, and afterwards he planted Gariſons therein, to ſally out upon the Jews, and vex them; but eſpecially he fortifi'd the Cittadel of Jeruſalem, in which he kept for hoſtages the children of the principal men of Judea.

The Caſtle of Jeruſalem fortified.

Simon revengeth his brother Johns blood on the ſons of Amaræus.

About that time there came a certain man to Jonathan and his brother Simon, bringing them news, that the ſons of Amareus, would ſolemnize their Nuptials, and were to lead the Bride, which was daughter to one of the nobleſt amongſt the Arabians, from the City of Gabatha: and it was intended that ſhe ſhould be conducted with great magnificence and pomp. Jonathan and his brother ſuppoſing that a fit opportunity was offer'd them to revenge their brothers death, and to puniſh the Medabanes for the wrongs they had done unto their brother, they took with them the greateſt Forces that they could, and marched towards Medaba, where they lay in ambuſh under the ſide of an hill. But when they ſaw them that led the Bride, and accompanied the Bridegroom, and a great Troop of their Friends likewiſe, according to the manner of Marriages, they brake out of their ambuſh, and put them all to the ſword; and after they had ſeized their jewels, and all the other booty of that company that follow'd them, they retired back again joyfully, having accompliſh'd their deſign: and thus revenged they the death of their brother John, upon the ſons of Amareus. For not only theſe alone, but their friends that accompanied

H panied them, with their Wives and Children, were all of them ſlain, to the number of 400. And in this manner Simon and Jonathan returned into the marſhes aforeſaid, and abode there. But Bacchides having fortified all the Gariſons of Judea, returned back unto the King. And at that time the ſtate of the Jews was in peace, for the ſpace of nigh two years.

The year of the World, 3880. before Chriſt's Nativity, 156.

But the wicked, and ſuch as were revolted from the Religion of the Jews, ſeeing that Jonathan and his followers converſed in the Countrey with great aſſurance, by reaſon of the Peace; they ſent certain Ambaſſadors unto King Demetrius, requiring him to ſend them Bacchides, who might apprehend Jonathan; declaring that it might eaſily be done: and that in one night breaking in upon them, he might murther them all before they I were aware. When Bacchides, by the King's commandment, came into Jewry, he wrote unto all his Friends, both Jews, and alſo his other Allies, requiring them to lay hold on Jonathan: but when by no policy, nor proweſs of theirs, they were able to apprehend him, (for that Jonathan having notice of their ambuſhes, ſtood upon his guard) Bacchides the Macedonian was diſpleaſed with the Apoſtates and Fugitives, objecting againſt them, that they had deceived both the King and him: and laying hold on fifty of the principal of them, he put them to death. But Jonathan and his brother, with thoſe of their company, retired themſelves into Bethalaga, (a certain village in the deſart) for fear of Bacchides; in which place he built Towers and Walls to keep his Gariſon in more ſecurity. Bacchides having notice of it, took the Army that he had with him, and thoſe K Jews that were his Confederates, and marched forward againſt Jonathan; and approaching thoſe fortifications that were made by him, he beſieged him for many dayes. But Jonathan, for all his ſiege and violence, was not a whit terrifi'd, but ſtood out valiantly; and leaving his brother Simon in the City to make head againſt Bacchides, he ſecretly ſtole out, and gather'd a great number of Soldiers that favor'd his proceedings, and in the night-time courageouſly brake into Bacchides Camp; and after he had there ſlain a number of his men, he gave his brother Simon notice of his coming: who, as ſoon as he heard the noiſe in the Enemies Camp, haſtily iſſued forth with his Soldiers, and burnt all the Macedonians Engines, and made a great ſlaughter of them. Bacchides ſeeing that he was circumvented by his Enemies, and that both before and behind he was preſſed L by them, being aſtoniſhed at this ſo unexpected an encounter, was almoſt out of his wits; ſo much was he troubled at the iſſue of his ſiege, that fell out altogether contrary to his expectation: for which cauſe he diſcharged all his choler upon thoſe Apoſtates, ſuppoſing he was abuſed by them, who had ſent unto the King, and had cauſed him to be ſent thither: ſo that he thought of nothing now, but raiſing the ſiege, and returning home with as little diſhonour as he could.

Demetrius, by the ſollicitation of the fugitives, ſendeth Bacchides againſt Jonathan, with an Army.

Bacchides diſpleaſed with the Apoſtates, for that they could not ſurprize Jonathan, killeth 50 of them.

Jonathan and his brother beſieged in Bethalaga.

Jonathan ſtealing out of the City, aſſaileth Bacchides by night.

Bacchides revengeth himſelf on the fugitives, and is enforced to retreat.

CHAP. II.

Jonathan conſtraineth Bacchides to make peace with the Jews, and to depart out of the M Countrey.

WHen Jonathan knew his intentions, he ſent an Ambaſſador unto him to conclude a Peace betwixt them, with this condition, That they ſhould each of them deliver up thoſe Priſoners that were taken on either ſide. Bacchides judging the Propoſal to be honourable, and that a fit occaſion was now offered him, whereupon he might raiſe his ſiege without any diſgrace, promiſed Jonathan his friendſhip; ſo that both of them ſwore from that time forward, never to make War the one againſt the other, and each of them reſtored their Priſoners. Thus returned Bacchides into Antioch unto his King, and after that retreat, he never made War again upon Judea. But Jonathan having obtained his N ſecurity, went and dwelt in the Town of Machmas: where, during his government, he executed ſuch ſevere juſtice on thoſe that were revolted from the Religion of their Countrey, that he purged the Nation from Apoſtates.

CHAP. III. A

Alexander Ballez, the ſon of King Antiochus Epiphanes, enters with an Army into Syria. The Gariſon of Ptolemais ſet open their gates to him, by reaſon of their hatred to King Demetrius, who prepares himſelf for War.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 11. Alexander, the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes, cometh into Syria, and ſeizeth Ptolemais.

IN the hundred and ſixtieth year, Alexander, ſirnamed Ballez, the ſon of Antiochus Epiphanes came into Syria, and ſeized the City of Ptolemais, by the reaſon of thoſe Soldiers that were therein, who were ill-affected towards Demetrius, by reaſon of his arrogancy, which was ſuch, that he granted no man acceſs unto him: for being locked up B in a Royal Fort, fenced with four Towers, (which himſelf had built near unto Antioch) he ſuffered no man to approach his preſence, but was careleſs, and wholly negligent in his affairs, living in pleaſure and idleneſs: whereby he was much hated by his Subjects, as we have already declared in another place. Now when Demetrius knew that Alexander had ſeized Ptolemais, he gathered all his Forces, and marched forth againſt him.

CHAP. IV.

King Demetrius deſireth the Alliance of Jonathan, who makes uſe of this occaſion, to repair the Fortifications of Jeruſalem. C Demetrius's War againſt Alexander. 1 Mac, 10.

IN the mean time he ſent Ambaſſadors unto Jonathan, that might make an alliance, and ratifie a friendſhip betwixt them: for he determined with himſelf to prevent Alexander, for fear leſt he capitulating with him firſt of all, ſhould obtain his aſſiſtance. And this did he eſpecially for the fear he had of Jonathan, leſt remembring thoſe injuries he had before received at his hands, he ſhould oppoſe himſelf againſt him. He therefore ſent unto him, requiring him to aſſemble his Forces, and to make preparation for the War: commanding likewiſe, that thoſe Jews ſhould be delivered into his poſſeſſion, whom Bacchides had ſhut up for hoſtages in the fortreſs of Jeruſalem. After that Demetrius had demeaned himſelf in this ſort, Jonathan came to Jeruſalem, and in the preſence D of all the people, and of the gariſon that was in the fortreſs, he read the Kings Letters; and after the reading thereof, the wicked and revolted Jews that were in the fortreſs were afraid, ſeeing that the King permitted Jonathan to levy an Army, and to receive hoſtages. But he receiving them into his hands, reſtored each of them to their fathers and mothers: and by this means remained Jonathan in Jeruſalem, where he made divers reparations, and built according as he pleaſed. For he built the City-walls of hewen ſtone, to make them more durable againſt the aſſaults of War. Which when they perceived who were in the Gariſons throughout all Judea, they forſook them all, and retired back to Antioch, except they that were in the City of Bethſura, and thoſe in the Fortreſs of Jeruſalem: for they conſiſted for the moſt part of thoſe Jews that had abandoned their E Religion, who for that reaſon feared to forſake their Gariſons.

The Macedonians forſaking their Gariſons, reſort to Antioch.

CHAP. V.

King Alexander Ballez deſireth the friendſhip of Jonathan; and to oblige him, confers on him the office of High-Prieſt, void by the death of his brother Judas Machabeus. King Demetrius on the other ſide, makes fairer Propoſals unto him, and thoſe of his Nation. The two Kings come to a battel, in which Demetrius is ſlain.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 8.

BUT Alexander knowing what promiſes Demetrius had made unto Jonathan, and be- F ing well aſſured how valiant he was, and how he behaved himſelf againſt the Macedonians, and how he was perſecuted by Demetrius, and his Lieutenant Bacchides: he told his friends that it was impoſſible for him to meet with a better Ally at that time than Jonathan, who had approved himſelf a valiant man againſt his enemies, and particularly hated Demetrius, from whom he had received many injuries, and on whom he had ſeveral times taken revenge: wherefore if they thought it good to draw him unto their ſide againſt Demetrius, the time was very fit to make an Alliance between them; which advice of his being approved by his Favourites, he ſent a Letter unto Jonathan to this effect:

King Alexander to Jonathan his Brother, Health. G

We have long ſince heard of your valor and fidelity, which hath cauſed us to ſend our Ambaſſadors

H ſadors unto you, to treat with you of an alliance and amity betwixt us; and from this day forward, we elect and ordain you High-Prieſt of the Jews, and receive you into the number of our chiefeſt friends. Moreover, as a Preſent, I ſend you a Purple Robe, and a Crown of Gold, exhorting you, That ſince you are thus honoured by us, you will likewiſe yield us an anſwerable reſpect and friendſhip.

The year of the World, 3813. before Chriſt's Nativity, 151.

Alexander endeavoureth to draw Jonathan to his party, by making him High Prieſt.

Jonathan having received this Letter, inveſted himſelf in the habit of the High-Prieſt, on the day of the feaſt of the Tabernacles, which was the fourth year after the death of his brother Judas. (For during all that time there had not been any High-Prieſt.) He aſſembled alſo a great number of Soldiers, and cauſed a great quantity of arms and I weapons to be made.

When Demetrius heard this, he was much troubled, and accuſed himſelf of ſloth, and too much negligence in his affairs, becauſe he had not prevented Alexander, by drawing Jonathan to his party, but had ſuffered him to take the benefit of this occaſion. Nevertheleſs he forbore not to write to Jonathan, and the reſt of the people of the Jews, as followeth.

Demetrius ſtudieth by promiſes, to aſſure himſelf of Jonathans friendſhip.

King Demetrius to Jonathan, and to all the Nation of the Jews, Health.

Since you have obſerved the friendſhip that you bear unto us, and have not engaged your ſelves K with our enemies, notwithſtanding their divers ſollicitations, we praiſe your fidelity, and pray you to perſevere in the ſame eſtate, aſſuring you, that you ſhall receive the like favors from us, in all integrity. For I am content to remit the greater part of the tributes and taxes that you have uſually paid, either to the Kings my Predeceſſors, or to me; and from this time forward, I acquit you from thoſe tributes you are to pay hereafter. And, moreover, I releaſe you of the prize of ſalt, and of the gold which you were wont to give unto us for our Crown. We likewiſe acquit you of the thirds of the fruit of your lands, and the half of the fruit of your trees, which heretofore you have been accuſtomed to pay, that you may enjoy them peaceably from this time forward. I acquit you alſo at this preſent, for ever, of all that which the Inhabitants of Judea, and the three Provinces annexed thereunto, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa, are bound to pay me; wil- L ling and commanding that the City of Jeruſalem be held ſacred, and enjoy the priviledge of a Sanctuary; and that it ſhall be exempt from the payment of tythes, and all manner of impoſitions. And I commit the fortreſs in the ſame to the hands of Jonathan the High-Prieſt, permitting him to place ſuch a Gariſon therein, as he ſhall think fit, and ſuch as will faithfully keep it for his uſe. I will alſo that all the Jews, who are impriſoned in my Countrey, be ſet at liberty. Moreover, it is my pleaſure, that no Horſes of the Jews be taken up to run Poſt for us: I grant alſo that the Sabbaths, and feſtival dayes; and three dayes alſo before every one of thoſe feaſts, be dayes of liberty and freedom. And my will is, that the Jews, who inhabit within my dominions, be likewiſe freed from all moleſtations. The like priviledge grant I them that will bear Arms with me, to the number of 30000: who, in what place ſoever they ſhall be, ſhall have M no worſer entertainment than mine own Army: and part of them will I place in my Gariſons, the reſt ſhall be of my guard; and I will make them Captains in my Court, and will permit them to live according to the ordinances of their Country, which they ſhall obſerve: and I will alſo that the three governments annexed to Judea, be made ſubject unto the ſame laws. My pleaſure is, in like manner, that the High-Prieſt ſhall take order, that no Jew ſhall worſhip in any other Temple than that of Jeruſalem; and of my own charge I give every year an 150 000 ſicles of ſilver, to be employed in Sacrifices: and that which ſhall be over and above thoſe Sacrifices, my pleaſure is, that it ſhall be your profit. Moreover, I acquit the Prieſts and Miniſters of the Temple, of the 10 000 drachms of ſilver, (which the Kings levied on the Temple) becauſe they appertain unto the Prieſts who ſerve in the Temple, as I have been rightly informed. I grant N alſo to all thoſe who ſhall repair unto the Temple of Jeruſalem for refuge, and within the precincts thereof, (whether it be for money due unto the King, or for any other cauſe) that they be acquit thereof, and receive not any damage in their goods. I permit alſo, that the Temple be repaired and built at my charge. My will is alſo, that the walls of the City be re-edified, and that certain Towers be built about the ſame, at my expence. Furthermore, if there be any places fit to build fortreſſes and ſtrong holds in, thorow all the Countrey of Judea, and to place Gariſons in them, my will is, that all this be done and fortified, at the charges levied out of mine own coffers. Theſe are the promiſes and offers that Demetrius made unto the Jews.

But King Alexander having gathered great Forces, as well of ſtrange and hired Soldiers, O as of thoſe who in Syria had revolted from Demetrius, led forth his whole Army againſt the Enemy; and after the Enſigns were diſplayed, and the onſet given, the left wing of Demetrius compelled Alexanders Soldiers that fought againſt it to flie; and his men purſuing them, ſpoiled their Camp. But the Right Wing, in which the King himſelf was, being forced to retire, was diſcomfited; and as for the reſt, they betook themſelves to flight: but Demetrius fighting valiantly, ſlew ſome of his enemies; and in purſuing others, who could not endure his fierce aſſault, was in the end, by ſetting ſpurs to his Horſe, carried into a deep and muddy Bog, whereinto by chance his Horſe fell, and being unable to get out, he was ſlain in that place. For being diſcover'd by his enemies, they turned back upon him; and having incloſed him, they altogether ſhot their arrows againſt him: ſo that he being on foot, and fighting valiantly, was at length ſlain, after he had received divers wounds, and was no longer able to reſiſt. Thus died Demetrius, who departed this life the eleventh year of his Reign, as we have related in another place.

CHAP. VI.

Onias the ſon of Onias the High-Prieſt, builds a Temple in Egypt, of the ſame form with that at Jeruſalem. A contention between the Jews and the Samaritans, before Ptolemy Philometor, King of Egypt, concerning the Temple of Jeruſalem, and that of Garizim. The Samaritans loſe the cauſe.

Hedio & Ruffinus cap. 4.

Onias the ſon of Onias the High-Prieſt, ſeeketh to build a Temple in Egypt.

BUT Onias the ſon of the High-Prieſt, called alſo Onias, (who flying out of his Countrey, lived in Alexandria, with Ptolomey Philometor, as we have heretofore declared) ſeeing all Judea deſtroyed by the Macedonians, and their Kings; and intending to acquire immortal praiſe, determined to beſeech the King Ptolomey, and the Queen Cleopatra, by Letters, That it might be lawful for him to build a Temple in Egypt, reſembling in all things that at Jeruſalem; and that he might have liberty to place Levites and Prieſts in it of his own kindred: And hereunto was he eſpecially moved, by a certain Prophecy of Iſaiah, who more than 600 years before, had foretold that a Temple ſhould be aſſuredly built in Egypt, in honour of Almighty God, by a Jew. Being therefore encouraged by this Prediction, he wrote a Letter to Ptolomey and Cleopatra, to this effect.

During the time that I was employed in your Wars, and by Gods favourable aſſiſtance have done you many ſervices, I have viſited Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, and have beeen in the City of Leontopolis (which is in the Territories of Heliopolis:) I have alſo viſited divers other places, wherein the Jews have built Temples, without obſerving thoſe Rules that are neceſſary upon ſuch an occaſion, which is the cauſe that they agree not among themſelves: as alſo the like hath hapned among the Egyptians, through the multitude of Temples, and the great diverſity of Religions. And having found out a very convenient place near a Caſtle called Bubaſtis in the Plain, where there is ſtore of all ſorts of materials for building, and Cattel fit for ſacrifice; I beſeech you that it may be lawful for me to purifie the Temple that is ruinated in that place, and dedicated to no ſacred power: and that in ſtead thereof, to erect a Temple in honour of Almighty God, according to the form and dimenſions of that Temple which is at Jeruſalem, where we ſhall pray for the preſervation and proſperity both of your Self, your Queen, and Children. And this will certainly unite all the Jews within the Kingdom of Egypt, for they will all in this place aſſemble to celebrate the praiſes of God, according as it hath been foretold by the Prophet Iſaias, There ſhall be (ſaith he) a Temple for our Lord God in Egypt: many other things alſo hath he foretold touching this place.

This is the ſubſtance of that which Onias wrote unto King Ptolomey. And by his anſwer which he made hereunto, a man may eaſily conjecture what piety was both in him, and Cleopatra his ſiſter, and wife. For they have returned the ſin and tranſgreſſion of the Law, which through this means fell upon Onias's head, by this anſwer that enſueth.

King Ptolomey and Queen Cleopatra to Onias the High-Prieſt, Health.

We have peruſed your Letters, by which you deſire us to give you leave to cleanſe the Temple that is defaced at Leontopolis, in the ſeignory of Heliopolis, in the place called Bubaſtis in the Plain. We marvel very much, that a Temple built in a place ſo unclean, and full of execrable Beaſts, ſhould be acceptable unto God: but ſince that you inform us, that the Prophet Iſaiah did long ſince propheſie the ſame, we give you liberty, if it may be done according to the Law, and with this condition, that we commit not any ſin againſt God.

Upon this anſwer, Onias (taking poſſeſſion of the place) built therein a Temple, and erected an Altar unto God, according to the model of the Temple of Jeruſalem; but

H far leſs, and leſs rich. I think it no wayes requiſite to declare the dimenſions thereof, nor the veſſels belonging to it, becauſe I deſcribe them particularly in my ſeventh book of the Wars, and Captivity of the Jews: neither wanted there ſome Levites and Prieſts, who being of the ſame opinion with Onias, officiated at the celebration of Divine Service. But let this ſuffice for the preſent, touching the Temple.

The year of the World, 3813; before Christ's Nativity, 151.

But it came to paſs, that the Jews of Alexandria, and the Samaritans that brought in the Service and Worſhip of the Temple upon the mount Garizim, under Alexander the Great, diſſented from one another, and debated their differences before Ptolomey. For the Jews ſaid, That the Temple in Jeruſalem built according to Moſes laws and ordinances, was the lawful Temple; but the Samaritans maintained, That that which was built I on mount Garazim, was the true Temple. They therefore beſought the King, That it would pleaſe him to ſit in judgment, with the aſſiſtance of his friends, to hear their allegations in this behalf, and to condemn the party unto death, who ſhould be found faulty in his proceſs. Now the advocates which pleaded for the Samaritans, were Sabbeus and Theodoſius: and Andronicus, the ſon of Meſſalem, defended the cauſe of thoſe of Jeruſalem, and the other Jews. And both of them ſwore both by God and the King, That they would bring their proofs according to the Law, beſeeching Ptolomey to adjudge him to death, whom he ſhould find to have falſifi'd his oath. The King therefore ſat down with his friends, to hear the cauſe, and determine their differences. But the Jews of Alexandria were much diſpleaſed with them that had drawn the preheminence of the Temple K at Jeruſalem into queſtion, and were highly diſcontent, that a Temple ſo ancient and famous, and ſo eſteemed and honoured through the whole World, ſhould be ſo diſparaged.
When therefore the day of Audience was come, Sabbeus and Theodoſius ſuffered Andronicus to ſpeak firſt: who began to prove the lawfulneſs, holineſs, and religion of the Temple in Jeruſalem out of the Law; and by the ſucceſſive government of the High Prieſts, who from father to ſon, and from hand to hand, had received this honour; therein alledging, That all the Kings of Aſia had honoured the Majeſty of that place with preſents and rich oblations: whereas neither in the record of men, nor courſe of antiquity, the Temple of Garizim had been in any eſtimation. Hereunto he added ſuch other reaſons, as perſuaded the King, that the Temple of Jeruſalem was built according to L the ordinance of Moſes, and cauſed him to adjudge Sabbeus and Theodoſius to death. This may ſuffice to have ſpoken concerning the differences of the Jews of Alexandria, and ſuch things as befell them during Ptolomey Philometors time.

Alexander Ballez finding himſelf, by the death of Demetrius, in the peaceable poſſeſſion of the Realm of Syria, eſpouſeth the daughter of Ptolomey Philometor, King of Egypt. Great honour is done by Alexander to Jonathan the High-Prieſt.

M AFter that Demetrius was ſlain in the field (as we have already related) Alexander made himſelf King of Syria, and wrote to Ptolomey Philometor, deſiring his daughter, the Princeſs Cleopatra, in marriage, telling him, That it was not below his dignity, to contract affinity with him, ſince he had obtained his fathers Empire by the favor of God, and had overcome Demetrius. Ptolomey yielding a willing ear to his requeſt, wrote back, That he was very glad that he had recovered his fathers kingdom, promiſing him to give him his daughter in marriage; aſſuring him, that he would meet him at Ptolomais, and bring his daughter unto him to that place, and there celebrate the Nuptials. After he had written theſe Letters, Ptolomey made haſte to Ptolomais, and led with him his daughter Cleopatra, where meeting with Alexander, (according to their appointment) he deliver'd him his daughter, N and gave her a dowry worthy of ſo great a King. Unto the ſolemnizing of his marriage, Alexander, by Letters, invited the High-Prieſt Jonathan, commanding him to come to him to Ptolomais. He went thither, and preſented magnificent Preſents to both the Kings; he was highly honour'd by both, inſomuch as Alexander conſtrained him to put off his ordinary garments, and to put on a purple robe, and after that to ſit upon a royal Throne: commanding his Captains to march before him through the City, and to command by publick Edict, That no man ſhould dare to ſpeak any thing againſt him, nor offer him any cauſe of diſcontent. All which the Captains performed; ſo that they, who purpoſely and maliciouſly came thither to accuſe him, ſeeing the honour that was done unto him by the King, fled away, leſt the miſchief which they deſigned for him, ſhould fall upon O their own heads. This King Alexander loved Jonathan ſo intirely, that he afforded him the chief place amongſt his deareſt friends.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 6. Demetrius the ſon of Demetrius, paſſeth out of Grece into Cilicia, and ſeeketh to make himſelf Lord of Syria.

A man confident in battel.

Apollonius fighteth with Jonathan, and is put to flight.

Jonathan purſueth the enemy as far as Azot, and burneth Dagons Temple, and killeth 8000 men.

IN the 165th year (of the Reign of the Greeks) Demetrius, the ſon of Demetrius, (accompanied with divers hired Soldiers, whom Laſthenes, who was of Crete, furniſh'd him with) departed out of Candia, and came into Cilicia. Which news, as ſoon as Alexander heard, he was much troubled: whereupon he inſtantly poſted from Phœnicia to Antioch, with intent to ſecure the affairs of his Kingdom in thoſe parts, before the arrival of Demetrius. He left behind him for his Governor in Cæloſyria, Apollonius Danus: who coming unto Jamnia with a great Army, ſent a meſſenger unto the High-Prieſt Jonathan, to let him know, That it was very ſtrange, that he only ſhould live at his own eaſe, and in quiet, without ſubmitting himſelf unto the King; who would not long paſs by unpuniſhed that affront which he offered him, in not ſubmitting to his obedience. Wherefore (ſaid he) deceive not thy ſelf, neither hope thou by ſculking in the Mountains, or depending on thy Forces, to continue thy greatneſs; but if thou truſteſt to thy power, come down into the field, and engage with me and my Army in the Plain, to the end that the iſſue of the Victory may ſhew which of us is moſt valiant. Kneweſt thou not, that the chief Nobility of every City, bear Arms under one, who hath always overcome thy Predeceſſors? Wherefore I challenge thee to meet me in that place where we may uſe our ſwords, and no ſtones; and where the vanquiſhed ſhall have no advantage by his flight. Jonathan provoked by this bravade, choſe out 10 000 of his beſt Soldiers, and departed from Jeruſalem, accompanied with his brother Simon, and came unto Joppa, and encamped without the City, (becauſe the Citizens had ſhut the gates againſt him) for they had a Gariſon placed in that place by Apollonius. But as ſoon as he prepared to batter the City, the Inhabitants were afraid, leſt he ſhould ſurprize it by force, and therefore they opened the gates. Apollonius underſtanding that Joppa was taken by Jonathan, he took 3000 Horſemen, and 8000 Footmen with him, and came into Azot; whence he departed, leading out his Army with an eaſie march: and arriving at Joppa, he retired back to draw Jonathan into the field, putting great confidence in his Horſemen, and grounding his hope of victory upon them. But Jonathan coming forth boldly, purſued Apollonius as far as Azot; who finding himſelf in the open Countrey, turned back upon him, and charged him. Jonathan was not at all ſurprized to ſee the thouſand Horſemen that Apollonius had laid in ambuſh near unto a certain River, to the end they might charge the Jews behind, but diſpoſed his Army after ſuch a manner, that his Soldiers on every ſide turned their faces upon the Enemy; commanding his men to defend themſelves on both ſides, fighting with thoſe that aſſailed them either in the Van or the Reer. After that the battel had continued until evening, Jonathan gave his brother Simon a part of his Forces, charging him to ſet upon the Enemies battel: as for himſelf, he drew his Soldiers into the form of a Battalion reſembling a Tortoiſe, to the end that being covered with their bucklers, joined the one with the other, they might defend themſelves againſt the Horſemens arrows; to which all of them were obedient. The Enemies Horſemen ſhooting all their arrows againſt them, did them no harm; for they pierced not as far as the fleſh, but lighting upon the bucklers (encloſed and faſtned the one within the other) they were eaſily beaten back, and born off, and fell down, being ſhot all in vain. But when the Enemies were wearied with ſhooting all the day long, and that Simon perceiv'd they could charge no further, he ſet upon their Infantry ſo couragiouſly, that he put them all to flight. The Horſe of Apollonius perceiving that the Foot were diſordered, grew heartleſs likewiſe; and having loſt the hope they had in their Foot, they betook themſolves to flight in great diſorder and confuſion: ſo that they brake their ranks of themſelves, and were ſcattered thorow all the Plain. Jonathan alſo purſued them as far as Azot, and taking the City by aſſault, he ſlew divers of them, conſtraining the reſt that were in deſpair, to flie into the Temple of Dagon, which is in Azot; and taking the City by aſſault, he burnt it, with the Villages round

H round about, and ſpared not the Temple of Dagon, but burnt it, and all thoſe that were therein: The number as well of thoſe that were ſlain in the battel, as of thoſe that were conſumed by fire in the Temple, was 8000 Men. Having, after this manner, diſcomfited this Army, he departed from Azot, and marched toward Aſcalon: and as he was encamped without the City, the Aſcalonites came out unto him, and offered him Preſents; which he received, and departed from thence, and marched towards Jeruſalem, laden with great ſpoils.

The year of the World, 3818. before Christ's Nativity, 146.

As ſoon as Alexander heard that Apollonius the General of his Army was defeated, and forced to flie, he made a ſhew that he was glad thereof, pretending that it was without his knowledge that Jonathan had been aſſaulted, who was both his friend and his allie.
I Whereupon he ſent an Ambaſſador unto him, to let him know how much he rejoyced at his victory, offering him Preſents and Honours, with a chain of gold, ſuch as the Kings were accuſtomed to give to thoſe of their kinred: he likewiſe gave him Accaron, and the Countrey thereabout, to him and his heirs for ever.

Alexander ſendeth Preſents to Jonathan.

About the ſame time, King Ptolomey Philometor ſet out an Army by Sea, and another by Land, to go into Syria, and to ſuccor his Son-in-law Alexander: and in his way all the Cities received him with great joy, according as Alexander had commanded them, and conducted him as far as the City of Azot; but that place made great complaints unto him, and demanded juſtice at his hand, becauſe the Temple of Dagon was burnt and deſtroyed, accuſing Jonathan for the firing thereof, and the ſlaughter of many People therein.
K But Ptolomey hearing theſe accuſations, anſwered not a word: But when Jonathan came to meet him at Joppa, he courted him with Royal Preſents, and all the Honour that was poſſible; and after he had conducted him as far as the River called Eleutherus, he diſmiſſed him, and ſent him back to Jeruſalem. When Ptolomey was come to Ptolomais, he hardly eſcaped death, and that contrary to all expectation, by the contrivance of Alexander, and his friend Ammonius: which Treachery being diſcover'd, Ptolomey wrote unto Alexander, requiring him, That Ammonius might be puniſhed for his Treaſon and Conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, according to the heinouſneſs of the offence. But ſeeing that Alexander deliver'd him not up into his hands, he conjectured and concluded, that he himſelf was the Author thereof, and conceived a great diſpleaſure againſt this perfidious L Prince, who had heretofore very much diſobliged the Inhabitants of Antioch, by protecting this ſame Ammonius, from whom they had received a great deal of miſchief: but in the end, Ammonius was puniſht for theſe his outrages, and diſgracefully ſlain like a woman, whil'ſt in a womans attire he ſought to hide himſelf, as we have related in another place.

Hedio & Ruffinus, cap. 7. Ptolomey Philometor repaireth unto Syria with an Army, to aſſiſt his Son-in-law Alexander.

Jonathan meeteth with Ptolomey, and is honourably entertained by him.

Treaſon intended againſt Ptolomey, and diſcovered; for which cauſe he taketh away his daughter from Alexander, and giveth her to Demetrius for his wife.

At that time Ptolomey began to repent of beſtowing his daughter in marriage on Alexander, and for refuſing Demetrius to be his friend and confederate; ſo that he broke off the affinity that he had with him: and after he had withdrawn his daughter from him, he preſently ſent Ambaſſadors unto Demetrius, to confirm a league of peace and amity with him, promiſing him to beſtow his daughter upon him in marriage, and to eſtabliſh M him in his fathers kingdom. Demetrius very joyful to hear of this Embaſſage, accepted both of the league and the marriage. There only remained one difficulty for Ptolomey to ſurmount, which was, how he might perſuade the Antiochians to admit Demetrius, againſt whom they were ſo much incenſed, for the indignities which his father Demetrius had offered them; but this difficulty he overcame by this means. The Antiochians hated Alexander, becauſe of Ammonius (as we have related before) and by that means were the more eaſily drawn to drive him out of the City. He perceiving himſelf to be thruſt out of Antioch, came into Cilicia. Whereupon Ptolomey came unto Antioch, and was both by the Citizens and Soldiers therein proclaimed King, and was conſtrained to take two Diadems, the one as King of Aſia, the other as King of Egypt. But he being a man naturally N very juſt, prudent, moderate, and not at all ambitious, and unwilling to diſpleaſe the Romans, he call'd together the Inhabitants of Antioch, and prevailed ſo far with them, that at laſt he perſuaded them to accept of Demetrius for their King; aſſuring them, That if he ſhould receive that kindneſs at their hands, he would no more keep in memory thoſe things that had fallen out betwixt them and his father; proteſting, for his own part, that he would inſtruct him both how to order the courſe of his life honeſtly, and to manage his publick affairs with juſtice: and promiſing them, that if he attempted to do any thing that ſhould be unworthy of a good Prince, he himſelf would be the moſt ready to chaſtiſe him; for his own part, he would content himſelf to be King of Egypt. And by this means the Antiochians were induced to receive Demetrius.

Ptolomey perſuaded the Antiochians to accept Demetrius for their King, and refuſed the Diadem of Aſia.

O But when Alexander was departed out of Cilicia, with a great Army, and was come into Syria, and had burnt and ſpoiled the Countrey of Antioch, Ptolomey, accompanied with his ſon Demetrius, (for he had already married his daughter unto him) came forth with their Armies, and obtained a complete victory, by overcoming Alexander, who was conſtrained to flie into Arabia. It came to paſs in that battel, that Ptolomies Horſe hearing the noiſe of an Elephant, was troubled, and ſtumbled in ſuch a manner, that he threw his Maſter on the ground: which when his Enemies perceiv'd, they ran all together upon him, and gave him divers wounds in the head, whereby he was in danger to have been ſlain, unleſs his Guard had reſcu'd him; notwithſtanding he was ſo dangerouſly wounded, that for four days he remained without any ſenſe; on the fifth day, when he began to come to himſelf, Zabel the Prince of Arabia, who had beheaded Alexander, ſent his head unto Ptolomey; wherewith he was well-pleaſed: but this joy laſted not long, for ſome few days after he died himſelf. This Alexander, ſirnamed Balles, reigned for the ſpace of five years, as we have elſewhere related.

Demetrius, ſirnamed Nicanor, having obtained the kingdom, quickly diſcover'd his ill nature, and treated Ptolomies Army very unworthily, forgetting both the confederacy and affinity that he had contracted with him, by Cleopatra his wife, who was Ptolomey's daughter. But the Men of War hating his ingratitude, fled into Alexandria, for their own ſecurity, notwithſtanding they left the Elephants in his power and poſſeſſion.

Jonathan appeaſeth Demetrius by Preſents.

But the High-Prieſt Jonathan having aſſembled an Army of all the Countrey of Judea, began to beſiege the Caſtle of Jeruſalem, where there was a Gariſon of the Macedonians, and a great number of wicked Apoſtates that were fallen from the Jewiſh Religion, who, in the beginning, ſlighted the Engines that Jonathan had raiſed to take that place, in the ſtrength whereof they repoſed too much confidence: But, in the end, ſome of them breaking out by night, came unto Demetrius, and told him of the ſiege; at which he was diſpleaſed, and taking a ſtrong Army with him, he departed from Antioch, to make War upon Jonathan. When he came to Ptolomaïs, he wrote to Jonathan, and commanded him to come unto him: notwithſtanding Jonathan gave not over the ſiege, but took the Elders and Prieſts with him, with gold and ſilver robes, and a great quantity of Preſents, intended for Demetrius; and when he had deliver'd them to him, he appeaſed his wrath: and after he had received many honours at his hands, he obtained the confirmation of his Prieſthood, in as ample manner as he enjoyed it during the time of his Predeceſſors; and although the wicked Jews accuſed him, yet did not Demetrius give any credit to them. Moreover, Jonathan requiring, that for the whole Countrey of Jewry, and for the three governments of Samaria, Joppa, and Galilee, he might pay no more than 300 Talents for Tribute, he granted him a full exemption, and wrote his Letters Patents in theſe terms:

Demetrius's Letters to Laſthenes, in which he beſtoweth many priviledges on the Jews.

King Demetrius to Jonathan his brother, and to all the Nation of the Jews, Peace and Joy.

We have ſent you the Copy of the Letter that we have written to Laſthenes, our father, to the end you may know the Contents thereof, which is this:

King Demetrius to Laſthenes, his father, Joy and Peace.

Becauſe the people of the Jews are our Confederates, and obſerve our Ordinances, my intent is to requite their good affection, and to aſſign them the three governments of Apherema, Lydia, and Ramatha, with their appurtenances, which have been taken from Samaria, and annexed to Judea. Secondly, we remit all that which our Predeceſſors received of them that ſacrificed in Jeruſalem; and other Tributes likewiſe, which were gathered for the fruits of the earth, and the trees; the tribute of the Salt likewiſe, and the Gold that was levied for the Crown: ſo that it is our pleaſure, that henceforward nothing hereof be exacted at their hands. See you therefore give order, that the Copy of theſe our preſent Letters be ſent and deliver'd to Jonathan, to be affixed in ſome open and conſpicuous place in the ſacred Temple.

Demetrius incurreth the hatred of his Soldiers, by abridging their Pay in time of Peace.

Demetrius perceiving that the Countrey was in peace, and that he lived without fear of any War, he diſmiſſed his Army, and disbanded his Soldiers, hiring only certain ſtrangers, (who were muſtered out of Candy, and other Iſles;) whereby it came to paſs, that his own Soldiers conceived an hatred againſt him, in that he gave them no wages: whereas his Predeceſſors maintained them as well in Peace as in War, to the end that they might be the more affectionate towards them; and that if need required to employ them, they might ſhew themſelves more ready and couragious to fight for them.

WHen Diodorus, ſirnamed Tryphon, (an Apamean by Nation, and General of Alexanders Army) heard of the mutiny amongſt Demetrius's Soldiers, he came to Malchus the Arabian, who had the care of the education of Antiochus, Alexander's ſon, and endeavoured to prevail with him to commit Antiochus to his truſt, to the intent he might make him King, and eſtabliſh him in the government which belonged to his father.
And although upon the firſt motion he could hardly be drawn to believe it; yet, at laſt, K by the continual inſtance of Tryphon, he ſuffered himſelf to be overcome by his intreaties.
See here what this man pretended at that time. But Jonathan the High-Prieſt, deſiring that they within the Cittadel of Jeruſalem, and thoſe wicked and apoſtate Jews, and in general all thoſe that were in Gariſons throughout all the Countrey, might be removed; he ſent Ambaſſadors with rich Preſents unto Demetrius, beſeeching him to diſmiſs thoſe that were in gariſon in the fortreſſes of Judea: he not only granted this, but promiſed things of far greater moment, after that War which he had then in hand, ſhould be ended. For the preſent troubles at that time gave him no opportunity to do what he intended: he therefore prayed, at preſent, to ſend him ſome of his Forces, becauſe his own Army was revolted. Whereupon Jonathan choſe out 3000 fighting men, and ſent L them unto him. But the Antiochians hated Demetrius, both becauſe of the injuries they had endur'd under him, as alſo for the hatred they had conceived againſt his father, who had, in like manner, done them much wrong; ſo that they only expected an opportunity to caſt him off. Underſtanding therefore that the ſuccors that Jonathan ſent unto Demetrius were at hand, and foreſeeing that in a ſhort time he would gather a great Army, if he were not timely prevented; they betook themſelves to their Arms, and beſet the Kings Palace after the manner of a ſiege, and ſecured all the gates, with an intent to lay hold on the King. Who ſeeing himſelf beſet by the armed multitude of the Antiochians, took thoſe hired Soldiers, (with thoſe whom Jonathan had ſent him) and charged them; but he was forced to retire, being overpowred by the number of the Inhabitants.
M Whereupon the Jews perceiving that the Antiochians had the upper hand, they mounted upon the battlements of the Palace, and from thence ſhot againſt them, without any danger to themſelves (by reaſon of the diſtance and height of the place where they were) yet they much annoyed the Inhabitants, inſomuch as they drove them from the houſes near adjoining, which they incontinently ſet on fire, whereby the flame was ſpread through the whole City; ſo that the houſes that were cloſe built the one by the other, and for the moſt part framed of Wood, were burnt down to the ground. The Inhabitants perceiving that they could not put out the fire, betook themſelves to flight, and the Jews chaſed them from houſe to houſe. When the King perceived that the Citizens of Antioch ran here and there to ſave their Wives and Children, and had given over the battel, he N ſet upon them in divers places at once, whereby divers of them were ſlain, and all at laſt enforced to caſt down their Arms, and to yield themſelves to Demetrius's mercy, who pardoning their rebellion, appeaſed the ſedition. After this, he rewards the Jews with part of the pillage, thanking them as the only Authors of his victory. Whereupon he ſent them back to Jonathan, with no ſmall acknowledgment and teſtimony of their proweſs and virtue. But afterwards he diſcover'd his evil nature towards him, and broke his promiſes, threatning him to make War upon him, unleſs he paid him thoſe Tributes which the people of the Jews ought, and were wont to pay unto the Kings Anceſtors heretofore.
And that he had certainly done, had not Tryphon hindred him: for he was forced to turn thoſe Forces that he had prepar'd againſt Jonathan, to make War upon Tryphon: O who returning from Arabia into Syria, with the younger Antiochus, (who at that time was under age) he ſet the diadem upon his head. All the Army likewiſe that had abandon'd Demetrius, for contracting their Pay, came and follow'd him, and made open War againſt their Maſter, and under Antiochus and Tryphon fought with him, and overcame A him, ſeized his Elephants, and made themſelves Maſters of the City of Antioch. Whereupon Demetrius being wholly diſcomfited, fled into Cilicia. But the younger Antiochus ſent Ambaſſadors and Letters to Jonathan, calling him his Allie and Friend, confirming the Prieſthood unto him, and aſſigned him the four governments annexed to Judea; and beſides theſe, he gave him veſſels of gold, a robe of purple, with permiſſion to wear the ſame: he gave him alſo a pendent of gold, and aſſured him, that he eſteemed of him as one of his friends, and created his brother Simon General of his Army, from the marches of Tyre as far as Egypt. Jonathan finding ſuch honours as theſe heaped upon him, ſent Ambaſſadors both unto him and Tryphon, proteſting, That he was their Friend and Allie, and that he would fight on his ſide againſt Demetrius, of whom he had ſo great reaſon to complain, B in that he had made no other return but ingratitude, for all the ſervices which he had done him.

But after that Antiochus had granted him leave to levy a great Army out of Syria and Phœnicia, to fight againſt Demetrius, he went into the neighbouring Cities, and was by them very kindly received; yet did they not afford him any Men of War. Coming from thence unto Aſcalon, the Citizens in honourable aray came out to meet him with Preſents; whom together with the Cities of Cœloſyria, he exhorted to forſake Demetrius's part, and to follow Antiochus, to the end, that joining themſelves with him, they might all of them combine their Forces againſt Demetrius, and take vengeance of thoſe miſchiefs which they had oftentimes endur'd by his means: and which if they prudently examin'd, they had many reaſons to proſecute their revenge. After he had perſuaded C theſe Cities to enter into confederation againſt Demetrius, he came to Gaza, to induce them likewiſe, and reconcile them to Antiochus. But he found the Gazeans to be of a far contrary diſpoſition than that which he expected, for they flatly reſiſted him: and although they were intended to forſake Demetrius, yet would they not join their Forces, or ſubmit the City to his government. For which cauſe, Jonathan beſieged their City, and ſpoiled their Countrey: for with the one half of his Army he begirt Gaza, and with the other half he over-ran the Countrey, ſpoiling and burning the ſame. The Gazeans ſeeing theſe miſeries which they were conſtrain'd to endure, and perceiving that no ſuccors came unto them from Demetrius, but that their own overthrow was at hand, and their aſſiſtance far off: and that which was worſe, moſt uncertain; they thought it to be the D wiſeſt part for them, to forſake the one, and follow the other. Whereupon they ſent meſſengers unto Jonathan, proteſting that they would be both his friends and confederates. For men do unwillingly take knowledge of their profit, before they have bought it to their ſorrow; and that which they neglected at firſt, and was moſt expedient for them to perform before they were afflicted, that do they earneſtly hunt after, at ſuch time as they have been chaſtiſed. Upon this ſubmiſſion of theirs, Jonathan receiv'd them into favor, and took pledges of them, and ſent them to Jeruſalem, and from thence marched he along the Countrey as far as Damaſco. And whereas an huge Hoſt ſent by Demetrius, came out againſt him, as far as the City Cedaſa, near unto Tyre and Galilee, making their reckoning to divert Jonathan from Syria, by ſuccouring and relieving thoſe of Galilee, who were their confederates: Jona- E than went out ſpeedily to meet with them, recommending the ſtate of Judea to the charge of his brother Simon. Who aſſembling all the power that was poſſible to be gather'd throughout all the Countrey, encamped before Bethſura, a ſtrong Fort in Judea, and beſieg'd it (for Demetrius being before-time ſeized thereof, kept Gariſon therein, as before this we have declar'd.) When as therefore Simon raiſed his Bulwarks, and fitted his Engines to aſſault the City, and employ'd all his ſtudy to ſurprize the ſame, they that were beſieged waxed afraid, leſt if he ſhould take the Town by force, they ſhould loſe their lives. For which cauſe, they ſent an Herald unto Simon, requeſting him, that he would permit them to depart out of Bethſura, with the ſafety of their lives and goods, and go unto Demetrius: who ſatisfying their demands, they preſently departed out of the City, F and he planted a Gariſon therein of their own men, in place of the Macedonians. In the mean while Jonathan, who was in Galilee, cauſed his Army to diſlodge from a place called the waters of Genezareth, where he was encamped, and marched towards the Plain of Azot, without any ſuſpition that his Enemies had been planted thereabouts: When as therefore Demetrius's Soldiers had intelligence the day before, that Jonathan ſhould march forward againſt them, they laid an ambuſh for him, which they placed near the mountain, preparing the reſt of their Forces to bid him battel in the Plain. As ſoon as Jonathan perceiv'd their preparation to the battel, he arranged his Army as conveniently as was poſſible; but when they that lay in ambuſh aroſe, and charged the Jews upon their backs, they fearing to be encloſed, and conſequently eaſily ſlain, began to flie, ſo that all of them G abandoned Jonathan, except ſome few, to the number of 50, with Matthias the ſon of Abſalom, and Judas the ſon of Chapſeus, Lieutenant-Generals of Jonathan; who boldly entred, H entred, and, like deſperate men, charged the Enemy in the Vanguard with ſuch fury, that they made them amazed at their valour, and compelled them to truſt to their heels. Which when they that had abandoned Jonathan perceiv'd, they rallied, and purſu'd them as far as Cedaſa, where the Enemies were encamped.

When Jonathan had obtain'd this glorious victory, wherein there fell about 2000 of the Enemy, he returned to Jeruſalem, and (ſeeing that all things fell out according as he deſir'd) he ſent Ambaſſadors unto Rome, to renew the ancient league that was made betwixt the Romans and the people of the Jews: commanding his Ambaſſadors upon their return from Rome, to go likewiſe to Sparta, and renew their alliance with that City. As ſoon as they were come to Rome, and had preſented themſelves before the Senate, I they declar'd how they were ſent from the High-Prieſt Jonathan, who deſir'd to renew their alliance. Whereupon the Senate granted all which they demanded, and gave them their Letters of recommendation to all the Governors of Aſia and Europe, and to thoſe of each particular City, commanding them to grant them free paſſage to return into their Countrey; in their return they went to Lacedemon, and deliver'd thoſe Letters which Jonathan had written to that State, which were to this effect:

Jonathan putteth Demetrius's Soldiers to flight.

Jonathan reneweth his friendſhip and confederacy with the Romans and Lacedemonians.

Jonathan the High-Prieſt of the Senate and People of the Jews;
To the Ephores, Senate and People of Sparta, Health.

K Foraſmuch as heretofore we have received a Letter by the hands of Demotheles, written from Arius your King, to Onias our High Prieſt, making mention of that alliance which is between you and us (the Copy whereof we have here under inſerted) we received thoſe Letters with great joy, and teſtified the ſame both to Demotheles and Arius, (notwithſtanding we were not ignorant of this conſanguinity long before, becauſe we were informed thereof by our ſacred Scriptures:) And whereas we have not firſt of all acknowledged our alliance, it was for no other reaſon, but that we might give you the opportunity of preventing us. Since which time wherein we have contracted friendſhip with you, we have on our holy and ſolemn days ſacrificed unto our God, beſeeching him to continue and keep you in proſperity; and foraſmuch as we have been environed with many Wars, cauſed by the inordinate deſires of our Neighbours, we have not L thought it meet to be troubleſom unto you, or to any other of our Allies. But ſince we have obtained an happy iſſue of all theſe troubles, we have ſent Numenius, the ſon of Antimachus, and Antipater, the ſon of Jaſon, Men honourable amongſt our Counſellers, both to the Romans, and to you alſo; to whom we have given our Letters to be preſented unto you, in our behalf, to the end they might renew the amity which is between you and us: you ſhall therefore do well if you write back unto us, and certifie us wherein we may ſerve you, there being no good office which we are not ready to perform.

Theſe Ambaſſadors were kindly entertained by the Lacedemonians, who made a publick ordinance touching their aſſociation and amity with the Jews, which they delivered M unto them.

At this time there were three Sects among the Jews, who had different and contrary opinions touching humane affairs: the firſt was that of the Phariſees, the ſecond of the Sadduces, and the third of the Eſſenians. The Phariſees affirm, That ſome things are directed by deſtiny, and others are left to our liberty. The Eſſenians ſaid, That deſtiny govern'd all things; and that nothing hapned amongſt men, that was not diſpoſed thereby. The Sadduces avow, That there is no deſtiny, and that humane affairs cannot be governed and diſpoſed thereby, but that all things depend upon our ſelves; ſo that we are the Authors of all the good or evil that hapneth unto us, according as we follow good or evil counſels. But hereof have I treated more exactly in my ſecond Book of the Wars of the Jews.

N Demetrius's Captains being deſirous to wipe off the diſhonour of their defeat, and recover the loſs that had lately befaln them, gather'd together a greater power than the former, and went out againſt Jonathan; who having intelligence of their coming, marched ſpeedily to encounter them near unto the Plain of Amath: for he reſolved to prevent their incurſions into Judea. Whereupon he encamped about 50 Furlongs from the Enemy, and ſent out Spies to diſcover of what force they were, and how they were encamped. Who, when they had by a moſt diligent view known all that poſſibly they could, returning, took certain Priſoners, and brought them away by night with them: by whoſe confeſſion, the deſign of the Enemies was diſcover'd to Jonathan; which was, to ſet upon him on the ſudden. But Jonathan, with a provident care, ſpeedily fortifi'd O his Camp, placed his outguards, and prepared all things neceſſary for defence, keeping his Soldiers up in Arms all the Night, and exhorted them to be valiant, and ready, if there ſhould be a neceſſity of fighting by Night, to prevent the ſurpriſal of their Enemies. But when the Captains of Demetrius underſtood that their deſign was diſcover'd unto Jonathan, and knew that they were not ſtrong enough to give him battel in the open field, they decamped in the Night, and left a great number of fires burning, that they might the better conceal their retreat. On the morrow, when Jonathan came to attack them in their Camp, and ſaw it abandoned, and conjectured thereby that they were fled, he follow'd after them; but he could not overtake them, becauſe they had already paſt the River Eleutherus, and were retired into their ſtrong holds and places of ſecurity. Returning therefore from thence into Arabia, and making War on the Nabatheans, he ſpoiled their Countrey, took great Booties, and led away many Priſoners: and from thence came to Damaſcus, and there ſold all that he had taken. About this time, Simon (his brother) marching throughout all Judea and Paleſtine, as far as Aſcalon, placed his Gariſons in ſuch places as he thought for his purpoſe, and fortifi'd them both with men and munition, and at length came to Joppa, which he took by force, and planted a great Gariſon therein, becauſe he was advertiſed, that they of Joppa intended to ſurrender the City to Demetrius's Forces. When Simon and Jonathan had ſignalized themſelves by ſo many great actions, they returned to Jeruſalem, and aſſembled the People together in the Temple, and perſuaded them to repair the Walls of the City, and to rebuild that of the Temple that was ruinated, adviſing them to fortifie the ſame with ſtrong Towers: and beſides this, he cauſed another Wall to be built in the midſt of the City, to ſecure it againſt the Gariſon of the Cittadel, to the intent that by that means they might cut off and ſtop up the paſſages to victual the Fort. He adviſed them likewiſe, to build far ſtronger Fortreſſes throughout the Countrey, than thoſe that were already finiſh'd. All that he propoſed was well approved of; whereupon he took care of the City himſelf, and committed the Countrey to his brother Simon. But Demetrius paſſing the River, came into Meſopotamia, with a deſign to make himſelf Maſter of Babylon, intending to make that the ſeat of the Empire, when he ſhould have ſubdu'd the other Provinces. For the Greeks and Macedonians, who inhabited that Countrey, had ſollicited him often by Ambaſſadors to come unto them, promiſing him to ſubmit to his authority, and to ſerve him in the War againſt Arſaces King of the Parthians. Demetrius flattering himſelf with thoſe hopes, marched towards them with great ſpeed, preſuming that if he could overcome the Parthians, he might eaſily vanquiſh Tryphon, and drive him out of the kingdom of Syria. Being therefore entertain'd by thoſe of the Countrey with great joy, he levied a great Army, and made War againſt Arſaces, but he loſt the day, and was himſelf taken Priſoner, as we have elſewhere declar'd.
